REFLECTIONS ON THE OLD YEAR.

BY D. D. S. BROWN.

The world seemed hushed in the calm slumbers of death. No noise was heard to disturb the last sad moments of the dying year. The earth moved on apace, and the year 1842 was engulfed in the mighty vortex of that which was, but is no more to be! The magic spell which bound us together is broken, and oblivion has stamped the seal of the spoiler upon her every page. She has gone—old Time has sung the funeral dirge and laid her in the tomb. She is numbered with the things before the flood, and the recording angel has registered in the archives of Death the tale of her dissolution. How transient was her existence—how rapid was her flight! The tones of her funeral dirge, echoing over the expansive ocean of "by-gone ages," and reverberating upon the waves of the unfathomable future, finally died away upon the ear unheeded and forgotten. The requiem of her death, though uttered in accents distinct and audible, awoke not man from his idle reverie. He wanders on, regardless of his destiny. Oh vain, unthinking mortal! why slumber thus? Awake from your unconscious apathy, and in her untimely fate read thy unfailling doom. Turn back and read the pages of her youth, her glory and decline. How eloquent with instruction is the story of her being. The morning of her existence was ushered in with the songs of joy and gratitude—at her meridian she was clothed in the flowery robes of innocence and beauty, and the melodious eloquence of her myriads of musical attendants indicated that happiness reigned unalloyed. But the unrivalled wheels of Time rolled on, and he wrought his changes upon her smiling appearance. Her former golden locks turned sear—her shining garments lost their lovely hue—the chills of age palsied her powers—her sands of life were nearly run—finally the potentate, Death, consigned her to the pall of oblivion, and who of us mourned her departure! She has gone,

"Glimmering by like the dream of things that were,
A school-boy's tale, the wonder of an hour."

Amid all this, what has been passing in our nether world? How many hopes have been blighted—how many projects abandoned—how many resolutions unfulfilled—how many anticipations not realized—how many hearts have rejoiced—how many bosoms heaved with anguish—how many families torn asunder—ay, how much bliss and misery has there been in the world? But the tragedy is ended, and all the vain imagination and wild ambition of man retarded not the progress of old imperious Time. At his fiat, the whole was hurled into the abyss of forgetfulness, the "grave of the year."—What associations rush upon the mind as we turn back at memory's bidding, and review the chequered scenes of the past year. Its commencement was ushered in with the jovial cheer, the merry laugh, the mazy dance, the joyous shout, the cheerful song. Sprightly forms moved gaily through the festive hall, bright countenances looked upon smiling visages, and all seemed unconscious that the chariot wheels of Time were rolling on, and that decay was working ruin in their midst. Spring came with all its blandishments and allurements. The warm gale from the land of flowers loosened the gelid fetters of the earth—the genial rays of the returning sun expanded the embryo bud into blossom—the winding valley and the distant hill echoed with the din of husbandry—the groves reverberated with enchanting music of nature's melody—the air was filled with the odorous perfume from "flowery Arcadia," and all the scenes of earth were clothed with the variegated tints of beauty and delight. But decay is the inevitable fate of all sub-lunary things. Dark clouds from the icy regions of snow and frost swept over the land—the warm zephyr-gale was changed into the hoarse muttering growl of the northern blast—the then flowery vales and green clad hills are now clothed with the silvery white robes of congealed waters—all the brightness and beauty of nature has departed, and the whole creation seems mantled in the mournful habiliments of sadness and decay. The melancholy moaning of the wintry winds was the prelude of the funeral anthem of the dying year.

"Oh, sad and doleful is the sight, to see the flowrets fade,
To view fair nature late so gay, in funeral garb array'd."

What a true emblem of man's existence. "Thus it is with temporal things; as for man his days are as the grass, as a flower of the field so he flourisheth, for the wind passeth over it and it is gone, and the place thereof shall know it no more." In the morning of our existence we enter upon the theatre of life with vivid expectations and visionary hopes; we bask for a season in the mellow light of prosperity, and finally flatter ourselves that earth is our abiding place. Alas, how sudden the transition! How true, that the embroidered scenery, the works of human greatness and the glory and sublimity of man's ingenuity must vanish "even as the mists of the gay morn' before the rising sun, that pass away and perish." The beautiful and lovely maiden of sylph-like form and glowing features, who glided as if by magic in the social circle, the pride and admiration of all; who to her natural beauty had added the graces of intellectual refinement, she who was radiant in the morning light, now lies in the cold confines of the sepulchral urn. She slumbers now,

"Sweet as the cradled infant's rest.
No shadows cross that settled brow
On which the unfelt cloud is pressed."

The thoughtful student upon whose brow genius sat enthroned, and who by the flickering light of his glimmering taper pored over the abstruse theories of science and explored the recesses of mystic thought; now sleeps the dreamless slumbers of forgetfulness; his fancy's flight scaled up in death. The sailor boy, whose elastic step upon the deck of his iron bound ship, showed forth his activity and sprightliness, and whose countenance was emblematic of nobleness and contentment, now reposes in the deep profound of ocean's blue waters, there to lie with the sea-weed for his winding sheet, and the coral rock for his pillow, until the "war of elements, the wreck of matter, and the crash of worlds" shall be the prelude of that era, when the "sleepers" shall be awakened from their graves, and the sea give up its dead, when the trump of God shall sound the dawn of the resurrection morn.

What a lesson does the past year unfold to us, of the sublimity nature of all earthly glory and grandeur. We have seen the innocent child—the noble youth—the lovely female—the middle aged and the hoary headed, all in their turn, fall by the mysterious archer's dart, and borne by their fellows to the dark shades of the valley, the narrow house of the dead. The vigorous and the weak—the wise and the illiterate—the smiling countenance and the portentous look of sorrow—the eloquent and the mute, all are subject to death's imperial sway.

Amid the ten thousand lessons which we daily witness, let us not forget that "dust we are and unto dust we must return." Many who were with us at the commencement of the departed year, whose countenances glowed with enthusiasm, and whose communion added a zest to the domestic circle; we now miss from our sides—their benignant smiles beam not upon us—they are reposing with the "sleepers," their voices hushed in death. Let us reap instruction from the volume of the past—let us press forward in the attainment of that knowledge which will fit us for the untried realities of the future—let us treasure up that wisdom which will prepare us for the great and final change which man is destined to undergo. Let us seek for the immutable and imperishable principles of truth, which are as immovable as the rock of ages and as illimitable as God's immensity. And may the bright scintillations of the Sun of Righteousness beam upon the path of future life, dispel the dark mists which earthly passions may engender—roll back the clouds of error and ignorance—and with its refulgent radiance light us in our upward march of intellect. Finally, when our souls shall enter upon the untried ocean of eternity, may its irradiating effulgence direct us to the goal of unending felicity, the throne of the great I AM, where sorrow and sighing shall cease—where decay and death are unknown—there to bask in the irradiation of Jehovah's love throughout the unending ages of eternity.

CHILDHOOD: A RETROSPECT.

BY MRS. M. B. BIRDSALL.

How delicious a season of life is childhood! Then the heart is free from guile, and all things wear a hue of brightness, which sheds a halo of happiness over every object. Then the heart overflows with love and joy, and renders every thing which presents itself to the eye, delightful. Even after childhood has passed away, the retrospect affords us many pleasing recollections. Fond memory loves to linger with tenacious hold on each of childhood's happy scenes, and to sweetly retrace every trivial transaction.

How delightful to recall each much loved spot; to have again before our mind's eye, the bright green lawn where we have so often sported; the babbling brook, with the venerable old trees overhanging its banks, beneath whose shade we were wont to gambol in those days when we were strangers alike to care and trouble. But in retracing those by-gone scenes we miss many of those friends who were wont to greet us with friendship's brightest smiles. The question arises, Where are they? Where are the friends of our early youth? Where are those with whom we rambled in childhood's bright and sunny hours, o'er hill and dale, engaged in chasing the gaudy butterfly, or in some employment as characteristic of childhood as the pursuit of the gay flutterer? Many times did we pause to gather the wild flowers that grew around us, and twine for each other, fragrant garlands; and many times would we amuse ourselves in forming brilliant anticipations of the future. In those blithe-some days we were ignorant of the many cares incident to maturer years.

But we have asked where are those much loved companions of our early years? Some remain in our familiar circle, but others are gone, the places they once occupied are now empty. Many are scattered in various directions over our land, some have wreathed the garland of fame upon their brows, and have seemingly forgotten the home, and the friends of their opening youth. Others are at various institutions of learning, storing their minds with the richest of genius, those of knowledge and virtue.—Yet we still miss many well known and beloved forms. We look around for them in vain. Where are they? The village church-yard claims them for its inhabitants. There, engraved on many a tombstone, we see names endeared to us by tender recollections—many of them, those of fond, familiar friends. The high hopes which they a short time since entertained, are withered. Their brilliant prospects are blighted in the bud, by the unrelenting hand of death. A few years ago, with them we roved, and hope beat high in every heart. Their day-star of life then gleamed as brightly as our own, but the shadows of death have forever enveloped its brightness. It has gone down; their day of life was overtaken by the dark, dark night of death.

But we still see those around us, who claim the highest place in our affections. They also are the friends of our youth, those with whom we sported away childhood's happy hours, and they are dear. We may—nay, we have undoubtedly formed many sweet friendships since that joyous period; but we still feel that the friends of our youth are dearer far, than these. Their forms are entwined in the fond recollections of other days which come to our minds. Association places them with all that rendered childhood happy. They were the partners of our early joys and griefs, and in short of all that pertains to memory. Ask the aged what part of their life has passed in the happiest manner, and they will answer childhood. They will tell us of fairy scenes of bliss enjoyed in those by-gone days which they have encircled with memory's brightest garlands, and they will seem to live those hours again. Even now, when we are in the midst of youth's sunny hours, the half-formed suspicion, that all of our high hopes will not be realized, makes youth's bright season inferior to the guileless period of childhood, which may well be called the opening bud of our existence.

DOOMED MOMENTS.

BY MRS. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

Are there not moments in the life of every one, when he feels that all which are called pleasures, are but gilded bubbles, which though beautiful when viewed in the distance, vanish ere they are fairly grasped—ay, moments when he feels as did the gifted Burns and that to die would be gain? Moments we say, for hours are by far too great a portion of time to spend in this manner. Life is too short when we reason, to think of mourning away its shortness; besides there are many true enjoyments and real pleasures in this world, which, if we will, we may taste; and innocently too, though they may be called worldly; but then there are times when forgetful of these, we sink in sadness. Darkness then seems to brood around us, and to cast its shadows into the already darkened future. Hope seems to have forgotten her mission on earth, and even memory sheds not one gladdening ray to illumine with peace our desponding spirits. I care not if our efforts have been rewarded with the hoped for success, and our hopes crowned with the anticipated joys; yet these doomed moments, as messengers of sadness, will return.

"O life! thou art a galling load

Let it be the one whose great object through life has been the attainment of wealth. That object has been accomplished, and the shining dust has been poured into his coffers in far greater abundance than he had dared to wish; and it may be that, as a general thing, he looks upon it with satisfaction, while in spite of the care and toil which attend him, he still presses onward, thinking that one more degree of attainment in his heart's desire, will bring an increased amount of happiness. But it is not always thus. Though success may continue, still there are times when he looks upon all with sadness. "Away," says he, "with an enumeration of my hundreds; for my possessions fill not this aching void—tell me not of my riches; for they can not purchase content to my heart—flatter me not because of abundance; for 'tis all vanity and vexation of spirit! At this moment I am tired of the world, wearied of my wealth, and wish for nothing so much as solitude and forgetfulness!"

Or the person may be one who has panted for fame—a literary fame. The midnight lamp has been a witness of that devoted one's efforts, and the glare of day, of his incessant toil. Tried thoughts and a racked brain with throbbing temples and a debilitated system, have been followed by a word of applause, or a universal awarding of genius—and what then? Ah! there may be times when this will satisfy; and he feel that he has received a reward commensurate with his labors; but on him also steal these doomed moments, and what to him is now the world's applause? A sickening sound! "Give me," says he, "a place apart from all else, where no impudent gazing eye shall note my sadness, and you may have all that has been added to my name. I care not for fame now, melancholy has taken possession of my soul!"

Others there are, who have never been lured by either the genius of wealth or fame, but none are exempt from moments like these. It may be true that they occur less frequently than to those of the classes already mentioned, but are there any who have never desired friends and friendship? If so, then it may indeed be, that they are those who have never felt melancholy—they are those who have never felt that they were lone, isolated beings, or that there was but one or two at most who clung to them with other than selfish or interested motives—yes they may be those who have never felt wearied or desponding! But, no; such are not to be found. All, all, have borne the weight of sadness! And what then? shall we when thus oppressed, sit calmly down and "nurse our grief" till "doomed moments" are lengthened into hours? Shall we say to the famishing soul when it cries, "give me water, or I die"—there is no remedy? Ah no! Religion as a healing physician, is ready to give water freely from the fount of everlasting life. Let us listen then to her prescription!

"See," says she, "yon poor and afflicted widow—hasten to her; relieve her wants and bid her rejoice;—yon weeping orphan, too—onward; inquire the cause of sorrow, remove it, and with a kindly hand wipe the falling tear;—yon captive to sin—haste ye, and break the galling chains—set him who is confined in the darkened dungeons of iniquity, free—bind up the broken hearted—and tell yon faint and doubting soul, the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth! Look within thine own heart, and with unfeigned repentance, wash each spot and blemish free—do justly with thy fellow men—bow in humbleness before thy God; and, stop!—dost thou wish thy days shortened or hast thou wounds or pains to cure?"

Thy answer mortal! "O religion thou hast a balm for every wound, and a cordial for every pain! Let my days be lengthened that I may follow thy precepts; and my life be prolonged that I may enjoy thee!"

Here of a truth we have found a remedy. Arise then, O man! when sadness is enshrouding thy spirit in gloom, and hasten onward to the performance of what is not only thy duty, but what shall also prove thy greatest pleasure. The darkness of despondency shall then give place to the light of peace and satisfaction—no longer shalt thou look upon life as a burden, or the enjoyments thereof as unworthy thy patronage; and no longer shall thy heart ask for solitude, or shrink from communion with thy fellow beings; for thy faith and thy practice, will have already "made thee whole."

HUMANITY.

BY REV. H. TORREY.

Man never appears more exalted in the scale of existence, than when engaged in performing acts of kindness, dictated by humanity. The true nobleness of his nature is thus exhibited. We may see him engaged in chivalry, and admire his valor; we may see him exploring the works of nature, and bringing out its hidden mysteries, and for this we call him philosopher and venerate his name; we may see him in the great places of the nation, engaged in the exposition of law, and lifting his voice for our country's good, and for the rights of man, and then we call him wise and learned, and class him with the great ones of the earth. In all these, and many other situations, we may see man, and feel to rejoice that we too are human, and that our natures are capable of such exhibitions of greatness and glory. But a tenderer chord is touched, sympathy awakened, and the pure affections of the heart well up from their deep fountains, when we see man actively engaged in aiding the suffering, distributing with a liberal hand to the wants of the poor, and pouring the balm of kindness into the sorrow-stricken and disconsolate heart.

Those men who have lived for the good of others, and spent their lives and fortunes in adding to the sum of human enjoyment, have shed the brightest halo around their names, which will glow brightly in future ages, and receive the grateful admiration of the good and virtuous, when others, which in their day and generation appeared in dazzling splendor, will be forgotten and blotted from the page of history. Such names as Howard, who labored for the depraved and forsaken, and Girard, who left a rich legacy for the orphan, will be cherished in the hearts of the remotest posterity, and will be pointed to as examples, when the exhortation is made—"Go thou, and do likewise."

It is a happy thought that we have some, yea, many such men in the world—men who, like the sun in the heavens, shed a cheering influence around all, over whom they have influence. And these are the men we want, these are the men who reflect honor on our race, and show us humanity in the true dignity of its elevation. We are too prone to think evil of man, and put too low an estimate on the capacities of nature. We look at the corruptions and vices of the world, and say that such is human nature. But alas! how mistaken the notion. They originate from vitiated tastes, ignoble propensities, and wrongly directed faculties. They are the results of being educated under bad influences; and are not the legitimate fruits of original human nature—of that nature which was created the image of the Invisible. Humanity has something noble in it, something generous, something godlike. It is not a moving, breathing mass of corruption, only fitted to do violence and wrong; but it is imbued with capacities and powers worthy the source from whence they emanated. This is what the world should learn and realize; and when they have learned it, then will "violence no longer be heard in our land, nor wasting and desolation in our borders."

The most noble feature of humanity, and the one which partakes mostly of the Divinity, is its beneficence. Man is truly a beneficent being—he has innate promptings of goodness in his soul. And the fact that he always feels to sympathize with the wretched and the miserable, proves that he was not created a selfish being, and that he has a nobler purpose to answer in his existence, than to be a "dweller apart" from his race, or isolated from his kindred. There are generous emotions in the human heart, which demonstrate the goodness of our nature, and which, by directing us in the way of well-doing, crown our lives with happiness, and render our names a blessing to generations yet unknown.

If the philanthropist, therefore, desires to see humanity rise up in the true greatness of its original nature, he should be sedulous in teaching mankind to act in perfect accordance with the pure impulses of the heart. The heart—the feelings seldom dictate wrong, and he who lives in obedience to the beneficent promptings of the heart, will be the most happy; for goodness and happiness are inseparably connected. When these truths shall become generally known and appreciated, then will we begin to entertain some hopes that humanity will finally triumph in throwing off the corruptions with which it has been fettered for ages, and stand forth, as it was in the beginning, when it came from the hand of the Creator, in the image of God.

While we entertain bright hopes for the future, let us not forget that we have something to do for the present; for this consummation, "so devoutly to be wished," can only be effected by individual exertion. We must all endeavor to widen out the mantle of charity, that it may shield many a bosom from the darts of accusation and falsehood. In this respect we can do much towards lessening the spirit of persecution and hatred. Charity for all, is the first lever that must be applied in removing the errors of the age, the selfishness of man, and in producing the desired reformation. And this charity should not be exhibited alone by the sentiments of the mind, but it must be felt in the heart. Benevolent principles must be reduced to practice, and we must do with our hands. Each individual in every community can do something to promote the welfare of the whole. Their acts may not be of the same kind or degree of goodness, yet, by a reciprocity of kindness, the whole will be benefited.

Some may say that they have no influence—or, that they are not able to give so much as others for the relief of suffering humanity, and hence, will do nothing at all. But let such reflect, that whatever they may do, or contribute, will help to swell the current of human kindness, and perchance, may cause another tear of gratitude to course down the care-worn cheek of some disconsolate widow, or destitute orphan. Withhold not thy mite from the poor and destitute, because it is seemingly inconsiderate, for by its bestowment thou mayest give joy to many a saddened heart, and save many of the hopeless and despairing, who are standing upon the very threshold of degradation and crime, where they had been forced by the cold repulsiveness of the world. Little causes help to produce great results, as little streams contribute of their waters to form the mighty river. So, likewise, do the little acts of kindness, which every one is capable of performing, help to produce an incalculable amount of good. Say not, then, that thy exertions will be utterly useless and unavailing.

"What if the little rain should say,

So small a drop as I

Can ne'er refresh those thirsty fields—

I'll tarry in the sky ?

"What if a shining beam of noon

Should in its fountain stay,

'Because its feeble light alone

Can not create a day ?

Doth not each rain-drop help to form

The soul-refreshing shower,

And every ray of light to warm

And beautify the flower ?"

May all, therefore, do good according to their capacity, and as they may have opportunity. Now that cold winter is throwing over the world its icy fetters, humanity will be frequently called upon to stretch forth its beneficent hand to aid those poor, unfortunate beings who are barely sheltered from the pitiless blast and driving storm. And let not the appeal be made in vain—turn not, with a deaf ear, from the widow and the orphan, from the suffering and those who have none to help, when they cry for bread, but let the kind sympathies of the heart have sway, and open with a liberal hand to the destitute, remembering that "he who giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord," and your abundant reward shall consist in the consciousness of having done your duty, lessened sorrow, and augmented the sum of human happiness.

For the Magazine and Advocate, PRACTICE.

BY REV. S. J. GIBSON.

"By their fruits ye shall know them."

It is an old proverb, that actions speak louder than words, and no less true than old, for certainly there is no better method by which to judge of the sentiments within, than by the actions without. And mankind are aware of this fact; for if they are called upon to pass sentence upon an individual, almost invariably will they look at his deeds, in preference to his professions, for a guide by which to come to a decision. Even the skeptic, though he has no faith in the Gospel, will avail himself of its teachings—lay them along side the actions of the professed Christian, and condemn him by the contrast which may thereby be exhibited. And one would naturally suppose that the followers of the Saviour, aware of this mode of procedure by the enemy of their faith, would study for the purpose of making their actions harmonize with the precepts of their master; yet often, too often is it the case, that no profit is secured from the lesson so frequently taught them, and hence, the doubting individual anon throws aside revelation as an unmeaning sound, because his neighbors have acted in a hypocritical manner!

Were Christians more sanguine in making their conduct agree with the instructions of the Saviour—were they to study for the purpose of doing away those wrangling contentions which so often exist between those of different denominations; and were they to show by their actions, that their religious faith was not an empty sound merely, how soon would the opposer of the doctrines of Christianity, be deprived of one of the most powerful weapons, by which he now assails the temple of divine truth. But alas! too many there are, who seem to move upon the principle, that religion has naught to do with every-day life, but it is only to be employed upon the Sabbath, and in the sanctuary of public worship. Acting upon such a principle, they are very sanctimonious upon Sundays, yet when they go out and engage in the busy affairs of the week, one would judge, that instead of being followers of the great founder of the Christian religion, they were the offspring of him of whom it was declared, "his hand shall be against every man." They overstep the bounds of integrity in their dealings with their fellow men, by polishing the truth so highly, that, by its glowing brightness, it is rendered almost invisible, and the hallowed emotions of charity have not a dwelling place in their hearts. "Every man for himself; and the most sordid, the best fellow," is the prominent article in their creed until Saturday night comes around, when the coat is exchanged for the broad cloak of religion, in which they wrap themselves, and upon Sabbath morning, start for church, vainly supposing that thereby will be proclaimed, that they are of those who love the Lord with their whole hearts, and their neighbors as themselves. The services of the day over, they return to their homes, and this accommodating cloak is absolved from the office of hiding a multitude of sins; and hung up in readiness for use when another week shall have passed away! But, "by their fruits ye shall know them;" exclaims the looker on, and immediately arrives at the conclusion, that they are arrant hypocrites, or that religion is all a farce, and more generally the latter. How detrimental, indeed, is such a course to the progress of that cause, which in its simplicity, beautifies the faculties and refines the feelings of man! (Were it not for the Lots, here and there scattered abroad, soon would Christianity sink like the cities of the plain, and naught remain to tell that it ever had been. Perhaps this latitude may be too much extended, but still all will allow, that there are by far too many in every denomination, of this stamp, and their practice is a dead weight to any cause in which they may be engaged. One such individual will pull down faster than any three others can build up; for society is more prone to look upon the vices than virtues of men.

People of this class, may be found in all societies of the Christian community—in ours as well as in others; but we sincerely trust and confidently hope, that the time is not far distant, when we shall be bereft of them—when every member of the Universalist denomination will measure his conduct by those heavenly principles and precepts which an all-wise Being has bequeathed to the world for the moral and religious improvement of man. Then will our cause flourish, exceedingly—then will the prejudices of a doubting public, sink to rise up no more, and Universalism be acknowledged as having a foundation deep in philanthropy and benevolence, and the religion thereof to be the religion of our Saviour.

Too many there are, who suppose that the up-building of Universalism, is alone to be the work of the preacher, while all the obligation resting upon the laymen, is merely to administer to his wants. And though we acknowledge that the success of our cause depends greatly upon the ministry, yet the laymen may do something for its advancement, aside from merely paying the preacher, which will urge onward the good work and develop its beauties.

In proof of this, I will relate an instance which transpired within the circle of my acquaintance. Br. S. is a man whose whole heart is in the good cause of Universalism, and in order to see if he labors judiciously for its promotion we will let Mr. B. his neighbor of the Baptist denomination, bear testimony; for surely he would not be disposed to give a Universalist credit for something which he did not possess. He speaks of him as follows—

"But there's neighbor S., who is too good a man to be a Universalist, and he does more to keep back our cause in this neighborhood than any Universalist preacher could do; for he is as honorable a man as I know—he never swears, nor does he cheat those that he deals with, and is charitable, and, in fact, if I want a favor I can't apply to a better one for success; for he strives to do to others as he would that others should do to him. Now those who are out of the Ark of Safety, see this, and as they know he is a Universalist, they conclude that his doctrine is a good one, and therefore think that they are safe enough. I am sorry that he is a Universalist, for he is too good to be one."

Here, then, we have the effect produced by the practice of one who lives, as well as professes his religion; and how much does it speak in favor of that system of faith which we have embraced, and loudly does it call upon others, to go and do likewise. "Too good, to be a Universalist!" I long for the approach of that time when such will be the expression relative to every one who professes to be a member of our body. Then will the many prejudices of the people be overcome, and they will learn that such a course of conduct—such practice, is but the immediate effect of the glorious principles of our doctrine, operating upon the human heart, and pointing the wayward children of humanity to their great Leader who has gone before them:—And then, too, will that bitter opposition, with which we at present have to contend, give way, and the feelings of Christian kindness occupy its place. Let no one be disposed to think that he can not make his conduct speak as loudly in favor of Universalism as this man has done; for surely it requires not so much labor to be honest, as dishonest—to be temperate, as intemperate—charitable, as uncharitable—and, in a word, far more easy to do as you would be done by, than to do as you are done by—and the result will be productive of far more happiness and peace to yourself, and be more beneficial to those by whom you are surrounded. Let every one who professes belief in Universalism, live as dictated by the principles of that faith, and he will do more to aid and advance the cause than by a thousand professions without a corresponding practice.

LIFE A VOYAGE.

BY OLIVER WAGGONER.

We are as it were, sailing down the stream of time with a velocity unheeded and unprecedented. The voyage is full of dangers, and many are the difficulties to be surmounted; notwithstanding, the believer in God's impartial and unbounded goodness apprehends no fears, for believers in the glorious restitution have assurance in abundance, that "Our Father is at the helm." Revelation, that glorious chart, delineates the coasts by which we sail. God has given us reason adequate to understand the chart, (or the principles of divine Revelation,) so that by a strict compliance with the precepts therein given, we may avoid those rocks and shoals with which they are beset and which generally prove destructive to mariners who sail without chart or compass. In Heb. vi: 19, as in a mirror, we see the Gospel hope, which is the anchor that holds our ship, and makes it outride the storms and tempests of an unfriendly and uncharitable world. This hope, is an anchor to the soul. Hence, by one of the richest and most beautiful figures, the soul of man is compared to a ship; and many are the instances in which the parallel will hold, though in some, the analogy is destroyed. The one is a piece of animate matter, the other a pure spirit; hence dissimilar in this respect, and perhaps in a few others; but the similarity in many respects is very apparent. What the main mast is to the ship, reason is to the soul; the lading of which are the gifts and graces of the holy spirit, the breezes which waft her are the gales of heavenly love, which fill the soul. The ocean on which she sails is the life-time or pilgrimage of man. Reader, is not the stately ship, which skims the foaming billows, or "walks the water like a thing of life," one of the grandest and noblest works of man—and is not the soul one of the noblest of God's works? Yea, its value is incalculable; its origin, is divine; its destination, is heaven—the polar star that guides it thither, is the Star of Bethlehem, which will direct it to its haven of rest, where we have assurance that every nation and kindred shall appear, after a wearisome pilgrimage through this turbulent and boisterous ocean of life—where shipwrecks are no more, and where the worn-out mariner shall find peace, through the grace and mercy of the great Captain of his salvation

Palatine, Montgomery Co., Dec., 5th, 1842.

It is so long since we have heard of a real, furious, fanatical, indecent and outrageous revival of Partialism in this section, that we give the following letter a speedy insertion as a curiosity—or, rather, as describing what would now be a curiosity in this region. We have protracted meetings here as usual, but they have become a tame, flat, dull, stale, stupid, decent kind of meeting to what they "used to was" a few years ago—and are generally conducted by the Pastor of the society in person, or by some neighboring clergyman known to be a pretty decent sort of a man. The truth is, the members of our Partialist churches are not totally depraved. They are not so anxious to build up their sect as, for the sake of that, to run the risk of having their wives and daughters seduced by these ranting roaring revivalist preachers. This Mr. Raymond may be a slandered man; or the Rondout Baptists may be determined to learn wisdom by experience. Time will show.

GREAT REVIVAL IN RONDOUT.

BR. GROSH—We are in the midst of a revival, which has been in progress about a month. About four weeks since, notice was given out in the Baptist church in this village, that a series of meetings would be held in that church, and a protracted effort made for the salvation of sinners, and that the Rev. Lewis Raymond, a very pious and godly minister, would be here to direct their efforts. Accordingly the meeting commenced, and "the pious and godly" Mr. Raymond entered upon his work. As the Baptist society in this place was very small, and as they had lately completed a small church to the erection of which I had contributed my mite, and as the members of that church were all my neighbors, and some of them my most intimate friends, when myself or family attended church, we usually attended that church; and the first evening Mr. Raymond preached my wife and I went to hear him. He took a text, and after making a few remarks on it, he commenced relating anecdotes of individuals and families in Cooperstown, Butter-nuts, Sackets Harbor, etc! Meeting was dismissed, and we came home. As yet I had formed no opinion of the man, and expressed none, not even to my wife, nor she to me. The next evening I asked her if she would go again, and she refused, stating she did not like the minister and did not wish to hear him again. I went alone the second and third time. Then I came to the same conclusion. Several of my Baptist friends asked me how I liked Mr. R. I told them I did not like him, and gave my reasons—he was too fond of low, vulgar anecdotes. Here I committed the unpardonable sin. Notice was given that Mr. R. would preach the next evening about the devil. That drew in a full house, (as I was informed, for I did not attend to hear "the Devil" preached), I was informed by several members of other denominations, that it was one continued torrent of abuse of Universalists and Universalism. Well, that was unnecessary in this place, as there is but one man besides myself in this whole town, that professes to believe in that doctrine. This Mr. R. was a total stranger to me. I did not know there was such a man in existence until he came into our village. But, about this time a report was in circulation here, that the "pious" Mr. R. had taken certain liberties with a female in Delaware county, not a hundred miles from here, which, if true, were very improper for a minister or a gentleman. Another report was also stated of a death-bed scene which is said to have occurred in or about Cooperstown—of a young woman who had lived in his family, and who, on her death bed, cautioned her female friends to beware of Mr. R.—that he was not what he professed to be. I can not say these reports are true, but they come from respectable persons, who resided in that immediate vicinity. (This death-bed scene should not be mentioned even if true; as it was not a renunciation of Universalism!) I related these reports as I heard them, to some of my Baptist friends, in connection with the abuse of Universalists, and stated that when a minister came into a strange place to ridicule and denounce a whole denomination of Christians who were somewhat respectable in numbers, morals, intelligence, and Christian virtues, he should come with clean hands and a reputation untarnished. This was too much for the pure ears of my Baptist friends, and I was told repeatedly that myself and family were the subjects of many prayers; and soon after this conversation had time to reach the minister, Mr. R., he carried me away to the throne—not of grace and mercy, but of the prince of darkness. In one of his afternoon meetings he came to one of the back slips of the church, in which Mr. Suydam, one of the members of the Legislature elect from this county, was sitting, and knelt down before him, and prayed in this wise—that James S. McIntee, the proprietor and keeper of the Rondout Mansion House, might be clothed in some inhuman shape, and that God would give him a cloven foot, in order that the people of Rondout might know his true character—that he might be a living monument of God's displeasure, serving as a beacon and a warning to others, &c. Now I am on the most intimate terms with the deacons of the Baptist church in this place, and all its members; and some of them I had supposed to be my warmest friends; but they say this is all right. When I ask them what crimes I am guilty of, or what great sin I have committed, they charge me with none but the awful sin of being a Universalist, and oh, my influence! If I would believe it, and keep it to myself, it would not be so bad; but I keep others out of the kingdom! The meetings have continued more than four weeks, night and day, and some nights all night. Individuals are named, and they are told in harangues which are called prayers, that God is in Rondout, that Christians are praying for them, and if they do not come to the anxious seats now, they will go to hell—that if Christians give them over and cease to pray for them, their case is hopeless, and they must be damned. A great many have gone forward, and twenty or more have been baptized—and wo, wo, unto any person who has the boldness to question the propriety of the means used. It is more than twenty years since I embraced the doctrine of God's impartial grace. I have lived in this place seventeen years, and it is a pleasing reflection, that my neighbors can charge me with no greater sin than that of believing, and some times endeavoring to defend, the doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all men. But the pleasure of the reflection would be greatly enhanced if I could charge myself with no greater sin than this. Now, Br. Grosh, I have been a subscriber and a reader of Br. Price's excellent paper ever since he published the first number of the Christian Messenger; and of Br. Skinner and yours for several years; and I suppose I am obnoxious to the charge made by this "godly" Mr. R. from the pulpit in this place, that if conviction was to enter the heart of one of these hardened Universalists, they would send to Grosh, or Skinner, or Sawyer, for one of their Universal shipplasters, and it would be all plastered over. But this is not my object in writing to you at this time—it is more particularly to let you know what a glorious revival we have had in our village, and what a very "pious and godly minister" we have in our midst. But I am constrained to believe it is a revival of fanaticism, envy, hatred, and malice. My neighbors who, a few weeks since, were kind, friendly, and cheerful, are now sour, morose and bitter enemies; and they complain to my friends of other denominations, and tell them it is their duty as Christians to run me down; and all for what they conceive to be an error in doctrine! They carry it to such lengths, that all the rational and thinking portion of our village are disgusted with their extravagance. J. S. McENTEE.

SOPHISTRY EXPOSED.

As sophistry always defeats its own purposes, and invariably injures the cause which it intends to benefit; and as there is a superabundance of evidence to prove to every rational and impartial mind, the existence of a moral Governor of the universe, it behooves every true theist, who wishes to annihilate atheism, and to establish a general belief in the existence of the Deity, to examine thoroughly the register of theistical arguments, and to expunge from its pages, every thing that savors of sophistry. And as truth is the object of my researches, and being no slave to authority, I hope that I will not be accused of rashness, when I assert that the talented Dr. Dwight in his learned treatise on theology, has used arguments to prove the existence of the Deity, that are sophistical in the extreme, and ill calculated to elicit truth. The arguments to which I particularly allude, are the three following ones. 1st. If there has been an eternal series of things; each individual in the series, must be a unit; but every collection of units, however great, is with intuitive certainty numerable, and therefore can not be infinites. 2d. If there has been an eternal series of men, the first must have existed at an infinite distance from us. His son, who may be supposed to have been forty years younger, was either at an infinite distance, or at a finite distance from us. If at an infinite distance, then the infinite distance of his father, was forty years longer than the infinite distance of the son. If the son was at a finite distance from us, then forty years added to a finite distance, will make it infinity. 3d. If the planets have moved eternally in their present orbits, and the earth, for example, has performed an infinite series of revolutions, the moon in her circuit round the earth, has performed a series thirteen times, and the earth in its rotation round its axis, a series three hundred and sixty five times as great as that infinite series. In reference to the first and second arguments, the artifice is so palpable, that it scarcely needs a reply; because the same arguments that the writer has used to disprove the eternity of things, can, by the same parity of reason, be used to disprove the eternity of the existence of God, which eternity of the existence of God the writer himself admits; hence his arguments are of no avail. For the duration of the Deity's existence may strictly be compared to a fleeting and perpetually perishing parts of succession, each part of succession being a unit in the series of his existence. Now if there is any force in the argument, that every collection of units, however great, is with intuitive certainty numerable, and therefore can not be finite; it follows by this mode of reasoning, that the existence of God, is not eternal. And again it must be admitted by those who maintain that God's existence is eternal, that he has existed at an infinite distance from us. Now to prove the imbecility of the second argument, we will suppose, that the first thing that He created, is co-existent with himself; wanting forty years, which thing began to exist either at a finite or infinite distance from us. If at an infinite, then the infinite distance of God, is forty years longer than the infinite distance of the thing created. But if the thing created is at a finite distance from us, then forty years, added to a finite distance, will make it infinite. Both suppositions according to the professor's reasoning, involves a mathematical absurdity—therefore God is finite. But he admits the infinity of God, consequently his reasoning is grossly false. In reference to the third argument, I must confess, that if it proves any thing at all, it proves too much; for it involves palpable absurdities. The hypothesis, that the planets have moved eternally in their present orbits, does not imply that the duration of one planet, would be greater than that of another; neither does it so far as relative motion is concerned, involve an absurdity, but rather the contrary for the fact, that one numerical infinity, may be greater than another, is no supposition, but a plain deduction from the principles of mathematics. The fact that the earth performs three hundred and sixty five diurnal revolutions, to one annular, and the moon twelve times as many, and that this order of motion can be continued to eternity, if not interrupted by some opposing power, is self evident, and needs no proof. But as an illustration, we will suppose two numerical series to exist, the one twelve times greater than the other, and both increased by constant quantities ad infinitum. Let the number of terms in the series, represent the respective parts of the fleeting succession of the duration of the earth and moon, and the units in each term the relative number of their revolutions. Now it is palpably evident, that these fleeting parts of succession, in the motion and duration of the earth and moon, may be continued to any conceivable positive distance, and yet the relations of the two series will nevertheless hold good, still preserving the condition, that the one shall be twelve times greater than the other; and so we may by repeated additions, extend these series commensurate with our idea of infinity, and still the condition will be preserved, that the one series shall be twelve times greater than the other. Yet the number of terms which represent the successive parts of duration, are equal and identified. Hence we perceive the feebleness, and artifice of this manner of reasoning, and its unfitness to carry conviction to the dissenting mind, and conclude with the words of the learned Professor, that it is unnecessary to dwell any longer on this complication of folly.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

EDITED BY

Rev. A. B. Grosh, G. W. Montgomery and A. C. Barry.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JANUARY 6, 1843.

THE NEW VOLUME.

We enter on the fourteenth volume of the Magazine and Advocate, and the thirteenth year of our course as one of its editors, with no diminished affection for the cause in which we are engaged, and no lessened hopes of its onward successes and final triumph over all opposition. Every year's examination of its evidences and of the arguments brought to oppose it—every day's observation of its salutary influences and gradually advancing power to mould the opposing creeds around us into a more humane and Christian form—every trial of its adaptations to human wants and sufferings—every experience of its heavenly skill in developing and quickening all that is ennobling in the human soul, and in repressing and subduing the animal passions of human nature into conformity with the precepts of Jesus—all—all but render Universalism more dear to my heart, and firmly convince me that it is, indeed, the very and pure "bread of life that cometh down from heaven, and giveth life to the world"—that it is in very truth the full and unadulterated Gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of the living God. And this, alone—and especially added thereto the evidences above named—convince me that it is rapidly advancing among men—wearing away their prejudices—softening the harshness of their nature—refining their thoughts and sensibilities;—that it is, as leaven hidden among meal, or as light shining in darkness, working mightily though silently among other denominations, and gradually moulding their creeds into a greater conformity with its own principles;—that it is insensibly affecting Christian nations, and operating to produce a greater manifestation of humanity and righteousness in their laws;—that it is identifying civilization with its own heavenly and benevolent spirit, and gradually abolishing the bloody demon of war, and the dark shadows of moral and political slavery from Christendom.

It is true, its advances are slow—like the growth of the mighty oak from the small germ of the humble acorn—but they are no less sure than they are slow, even in regard to the whole world. But when viewed with reference to our own land, how rapid the progress of Universalist principles! Every benevolent and great moral movement, though commenced and carried on by our opposers, is successful only so far as they adopt the principles of Universalism. And even the giant writhings of error, in its convulsive efforts to destroy human peace and blast human hope, only awakens the conservative power of the creeds of our opposers, and drives them to take their battle-stand on our principles. Millenarianism is now doing more to compel Partialists to adopt Universalist principles of interpretation, than any other religious convulsion of the day. And we are confident that the skepticism produced by this and other legitimate children of fanatical self-styled Orthodoxy, must yet compel further our opposers to take our principles to meet and crush it forever.

We say, then, that with no diminished affection for Universalism, no lessened hopes of its final and complete triumph, do we enter on the labors of another year. We feel wearied with past labors and struggles—worn with many personal trials and difficulties—discouraged by decreasing support, and pecuniary hardness—so that often, we feel to sigh for repose, or to regret that many who could render our labors more pleasant, will not exert more zeal to aid and support us. We are but mortal—and we can not but feel that a want of promptness in compensating hard-working servants, on the part of many of our brethren, has added greatly and painfully to the weight of their burdens, and much crippled their usefulness. And we are satisfied that our cause can not advance as rapidly as it could, and should, and would advance, until these unjust and ungenerous brethren will obey the promptings of the faith they profess, and cease to withhold the laborer's hire, and to muzzle the ox that treadeth out their grain—in other words, until all Universalists will do, as they tacitly agree, or as duty requires, in paying their preachers, and printers, and editors. Were all our brethren as these wheel-horses are, our cause would have been backed clear down to the foot of the hill long ago! Thanks be to God, there have been, and yet are, many who have a faith which produces a proper share of zeal to do works becoming their professions of goodness! May the number increase, until all shall dear justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with God. Then will Zion put on her most beautiful garments, and reflect to all around the light of her truth, the beauties of her righteousness, and the glory of her God.

In the present year, we hope much of the apathy, lukewarmness and errors of past years will be removed, and compensated for, by an increase of personal interest and exertions in every believer of Universalism.—Increase the amount of your preaching, if possible.—Use exertions to induce others to attend your meetings. Fill up your Bible classes. Gather children into your Sunday schools. Make efforts to establish Conference meetings. Pay up, as much as possible, all arrearages to printers and preachers. See that your preachers have a support sufficient to enable them to devote all their time, their thoughts, and their exertions to serve you in the Gospel. Circulate books and periodicals among your neighbors. See that all who are able to afford it, take and pay for a Universalist periodical—and that those able to do so, take two or three. See that your societies attend promptly to all their business matters, and do them up right. Attend all the Conferences, Associations, and Conventions of the order that are held in your vicinity. These gatherings exert no small influences on the zeal and good feeling of the neighborhoods represented in them. In short—let every believer be also a doer of Universalism in his family, his society, his neighborhood—to himself, his friends, community and the world—and our cause will advance rapidly, our opposers be blessed with a conversion to it, and each believer will be a better and consequently a happier man, before the new year, 1843; grows old, and becomes ready to vanish away. Amen. A. B. G.

REVIVAL OF RELIGION—NO. I.

"O Lord, revive thy work in the midst of the years.

HAB. iii: 2.

It can not have escaped the notice of the most careless observer, that, notwithstanding the increase of knowledge and benevolence, there is yet much to darken the mind and lead it away from God. With all the influence that the Gospel exerts upon men, there is still bigotry, superstition and intolerance pervading every walk and condition in life, cutting asunder the bonds and ligaments of society; uprooting long existing friendships; alienating heart from heart; introducing discord and division into families, and pouring wormwood and gall into the bosom of every community. Look in upon the different sects and denominations of the day, and you will see them bitter and hostile toward each other—they have scarcely one single sympathy or feeling in common—the line of demarcation between them is broad and deep, and but few presume to cross it for friendly communion.

A single circumstance that has recently come to hand, shows the madness and recklessness of the sectarian feeling that is abroad. You have all heard of Wm. E. Channing, who is now asleep in his grave, and many of you have learned to love him for his labors in the cause of human good. As a man, he was all a man should be. As a philanthropist, he had "a big heart, and it was in the right place." As a Christian, he was humble and devoted; and his very life as a public individual shows how deep and fervent was his love for God and his fellow men. Wherever the influence of his labors have extended, there you will find a broader humanity, a kindlier spirit, and enlarged sympathies. Every energy and power of his great and benevolent mind were made to bend to one object—the increase of the knowledge and liberality and benevolence of the age. And in his last effort before the public, he advocated the cause of the oppressed, and down-trodden, and claimed for all classes of men those inalienable rights which God gave them to enjoy. And yet, scarcely had the grave closed over his earthly remains, and while hearts were bleeding fresh for their loss, the lamented Channing was given a place in the dark abodes of the damned!

O, the spirit of sectarian bigotry! It would consign to endless ruin the purest seraph that adores at the feet of God, if he did not worship by its creed! It would inflict eternal torture upon the holiest being in the universe, who would not subscribe to its doctrines! And this very spirit is abroad in the land, venting its curses and denunciations upon all who are not of its party, and carrying strife and confusion into every lane and avenue of society. O, what need there is to pray, "Lord, revive thy work in the midst of the years."—Let the kindness of the Gospel melt and subdue the heart! Let its influence bring men together in love, and banish bigotry and hate from the human soul!

It is a fact that ought not to be overlooked, that we are none of us better than we should be; our hearts are none too pure—our intentions are often none too upright or honest—our acts and dealings are none too righteous. And so far as we are able to discover, the same may be said of those around us. With all the professions that are made, sin and wickedness continue to prevail, and to manifest themselves even under the garb of religion. Few, very few are as faithful in all the relations of life as they should be; the convictions of duty are not always acted up to—the principle of uprightness and truth are departed from, and, as the consequence, wretchedness and disorder prevail. Why is it that the prison and the scaffold have their victims? Why is it that so many are rolling in the mire of infamy? Why is it that the peace of society is marred by strife and dissension between man and man? Why are so many homes desolate, and so many dying-beds comfortless? It is because we are not true to ourselves nor to each other. It is because the laws of God written on our Constitutions and in the Bible, are violated! It is because the principles of the Gospel, founded in love divine, are not cherished and acted up to as they should be.

These facts demonstrate to us the need of a genuine revival of religion—not one confined to this or that denomination; but one that shall extend to all denominations, and to all classes and conditions of men.

"But I thought," says one, "that Universalists did not believe in revivals of religion." I know this is the general impression among other sects, and a vast deal of pains is taken to make the public believe that we are a cold, careless and irreligious people; and it was said by a Rev. Mr. Laird, a few days since, that if it was not for public opinion, we would throw the Bible away! A more unfair, ungenerous, unjust and false accusation never was uttered; and if conscience be not dead in his soul, it will sting him for that act! There is not a Universalist in the land but what loves his Bible. He finds the evidences of his faith written upon its every page. The promises of a Father in which he trusts, are there; and there is his hope and his consolation. What! throw away the Bible through which the love of God has come to him; and in which the Saviour speaks and bids him live! Ask that old man if he would throw away his Bible if it were not for fashion's sake. But stay, you need not ask him—it would be insulting his gray hairs. When every thing else is forgotten, he will remember his Bible. As the darkness of the grave gathers around him, it is his light; and were every thing else to fail him, he knows that that would bring him off conqueror at last!

THE WESTERN LUMINARY.

We have received the specimen number of the second volume of this periodical, several days in advance of its date. It is changed from the quarto to the folio form, considerably enlarged, much improved in its mechanical execution, and printed on better paper, with new type. Br. James M. Cook, proprietor and principal Editor, will be aided in the editorial department by Brs. C. Hammond, J. Whitney, S. Goff and J. S. Brown. The price of the paper is one dollar per annum if paid in advance, to which will be added fifty cents for every four months delay of payment.

* * We regret that Br. J. M. Cook should have seen our remarks and conduct through such a distorted or discolored medium, as he evidently does by his sneering and sarcastic notice of our brief notice of the 16th ult. We saw his prospectus for the first time, (for at that busy season we had so much to do, that we could not read carefully all our exchange papers,) too late for insertion in that paper. We therefore marked it for insertion in the next paper, (when it was published at length,) and noted his intentions and reasons, briefly, in our news items, among some similar occurrences. Writing as we did in haste, we indulged a very slight expression of our melancholy feelings at learning that a number of our publishers were losing money by their labors; and of our fears that by increasing their expenses in the hope of gaining additional support, they will only lose faster and more; and of our astonishment that with all these cries of distress, and the wrecks of the past, around them, other brethren will begin new papers and swell the tide of losses, the cries of distress, and increase the prospects of ruin for publishers. This latter, particularly, appears to excite the sneers and ridicule of Br. Cook; and he speaks of our "loud sounding note ('new papers') which was struck in the old tune," and says that these proposals for new papers are "thorns" that "irritate" and "prick" us. It is perhaps natural that they should jest at scars, who never felt a wound; but we can not but feel that Br. J. M. Cook is ungenerous in these imputations of wrong feelings and motives to us—and that as he has not found our former fears for him prove utterly groundless thus far, it would be more prudent in him to heed the caution than to ridicule it. I call his remarks ungenerous; for he knows that I have no cause for being "pricked" or "irritated" by any new papers. He knows that I have not one cent invested in any paper now published—nor a cent to win or lose by any one that may be published. I have lost all I ever supposed I had made by publishing, and after twelve years of much toil, and care, and debt, feel no desire to try it again.

But while these misfortunes (which many of our publishers have also experienced, while others are experiencing them) remove me from the field of competition, rivalry, hope of gain, or fear of loss, they do not, and I hope never may, close my heart to sympathy with my fellow unfortunates, nor to sorrow for those whom I behold becoming candidates for the same unenviable condition with ourselves. If the expression of this disinterested sympathy is matter for ridicule and sneers, Br. Cook is landably engaged. And if the utterance of my regrets and fears, in the form of cautions or advice intended to save brethren from losses and ruin, deserves their scoffs and rebukes, Br. Cook is paying me well for past cautions already realized, and for present fears which I pray God his future success may disappoint. But I do not believe he will justify his remarks, except by imputing wrong motives, or on the ground that my judgment is greatly at fault. Of my motives, I have already spoken, by showing that I am disinterested. In vindication of my judgment, let the following suffice.

When the present pecuniary difficulties commenced, there was hope that, by a careful retrenchment of expenses, a lopping off of non-paying subscribers, and the united exertions of the friends of Universalism, nearly all our periodicals of extensive circulation might weather the storm. Experience has shown that where the old publishers had debts, they too had to be changed, to save their periodicals from wreck. If present times continue, or due prudence is not observed on all hands, they may fail after all the sacrifices and sufferings through which they have passed. Even before 1837, many of our new papers, though they did not much injure the older ones, (for subscribers were plenty,) yet failed, after draining the proprietors' pockets, and sometimes taxing even their subscribers to the amount of nearly a year's subscription for which he got no papers! But since then, the prospect for new papers is not only more doubtful, but the injury they do to the older papers, by drawing away the support they so greatly need, is more deeply felt—the injury is more dangerous. For now good subscribers are fewer in number, and less able to make extra exertions than formerly—and every paper needs all it has to sustain it. Every new paper, then, forms a drain, to a greater or less extent, on this already barely insufficient fund for the support of the older ones—and I presume no one will deny that the cause is injured when a paper breaks down—and that more injury will ensue from the failure of an old and widely known paper, than from a new one, of smaller circulation. But particularly will injury ensue if both fail; and, really, if new papers continue to spring up in every section, the general support may become so much divided, that both old and new will ruin their publishers, and fail together.

Who does not remember the injuries our cause suffered by the almost failure of the Herald of Truth, in the very city where the Luminary is now published? But for the purchase of its list by Grosh & Hutchinson, at a final loss to them of not less than $1000, the Herald would have entered on a third year, and perished mid-volume, increasing the injury to the cause tenfold beyond what it was. Yet the times and the prospects for a new paper were to all appearance far better then—in 1834—than they are now, in 1843. Br. Cook talks of "hopes." After he has lived on a publisher's hopes as long as some of us have done, he will know better what reliance to place upon them. He will find the discount deducted from them by the reality, no joking matter! What were his hopes last year, when he started the Luminary? What deduction has one year made from them, with all the extra aids which a new paper always finds? I sincerely wish that he may not find his hopes worse founded than my fears; and that a fortunate change of times may come in time to save all our papers in this State, and reward richly their self-sacrificing publishers. But certainly there is enough in the past and the present to engage all our exertions, that our papers may be barely sustained—enough to warrant the expression of feelings of sympathy, sorrow, and apprehensions for our publishers generally, which I have expressed, and which Br. Cook sneers at and ridicules.

Wishing him a vision clear from prejudice, a temper free from groundless suspicions, and a heart more attuned to sympathy with the broken-down of our suffering tribe, I take my leave of this painful subject, praying God that he may learn wisdom by some other means than his personal experience of the heart-wringing toils, cares and losses which have been the lot of so many of our publishers; but of which he has had, as yet, but a very slight foretaste.

TRUSTING IN GOD.

Turn over the pages of the sacred volume, from Genesis to Revelations, and you can not find a solitary passage which forbids men from trusting in God—which warns them against relying on his promises, or declares them in danger because they think too highly of his goodness. On the contrary, you will find frequent warm commendations of those who trust in God, and exhortations to the children of men to place confidence in him—to trust him—to believe his promises—to rely upon his goodness with childlike affection and filial trust. And as frequent are the denunciations against those who doubt, and fear, and distrust God's wisdom, goodness, providence and care—who rely on an arm of flesh, and trust to man's wisdom rather than God's—and who narrow down their faith, and limit their confidence in their heavenly Father.

It was thus with the children of Israel in the desert. They believed in God; but they trusted him not—they confided not in his character—they relied not on his promises—and it was for this distrust, and doubt, and unbelief that God chastened them so severely, and swore they should not enter into his rest. The Psalmist, in the 78th Psalm, has beautifully and powerfully set forth the causes of their punishment, and described their ungrateful and unjust want of confidence in God, and of gratitude for his benefits. He says—"Marvelous things did he in the sight of their fathers, in the land of Egypt, in the field of Zoan. He divided the sea, and caused them to pass through; and he made the waters to stand as a heap. In the day-time also he led them with a cloud, and all the night with a light of fire. He clave the rocks in the wilderness, and gave them drink as out of the great depths. He brought streams also out of the rock, and caused water to run down like rivers. And they sinned yet more against him by provoking the Most High in the wilderness. And they tempted God in their heart by asking meat for their lust. Yea, they spake against God; they said, Can God furnish a table in the wilderness? Behold, he smote the rock, that the water gushed out, and the streams overflowed; can he give bread also? can he provide flesh for his people? Therefore the Lord heard this, and was wroth: so a fire was kindled against Jacob, and anger also came up against Israel; because they believed not in God, and trusted not in his salvation." 12-22. "When he slew them, then they sought him; and they returned and inquired early after God. And they remembered that God was their Rock, and the high God their Redeemer. Nevertheless they did flatter him with their mouth, and they lied unto him with their tongues. For their heart was not right with him, neither were they steadfast in his covenant. But he, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity, and destroyed them not: yea, many a time turned he his anger away, and did not stir up all his wrath. For he remembered that they were but flesh; a wind that passeth away, and cometh not again. How often did they provoke him in the wilderness, and grieve him in the desert! Yea, they turned back and tempted God, and limited the Holy One of Israel."—34-41.

Shall I be excused for saying that a great many of our Christian brethren appear to me to resemble very closely the Israelites in the desert? They are surrounded daily with the exhibitions of God's wisdom and goodness—of his most free and unpurchased benevolence and mercy—and yet they act and converse as if they dreaded him above all other beings—as if they were in continual terror lest his patience, and goodness, and mercy be clear exhausted and changed into wrath, and cruelty and vengeance. He gives them existence in a world most gloriously beautiful, and stored on every hand with innumerable provisions for their happiness—he provides parents to watch over their helpless infancy—teachers to instruct their ignorance—friends to lend them the helping hand—brothers, sisters and other dear connexions to sweeten social and domestic joys by their participation—and adds to all these, ten thousand, thousand other blessings, which neither labor can produce nor wealth purchase, nor human worth merit. All these are the free, unpurchased gifts of God's bounty. And yet their daily and hourly recipient is asking in his heart, in the same doubting spirit that led the Jews to tempt God in the desert—Can God continue to love and bless me, without my performance of certain conditions? Will God bless in eternity as freely as he blesses in time? Will God be as kind and compassionate to sinners always, as he is now? Will not God be changed in his appearance and conduct in heaven, from what his works on earth declare he now is? God adds testimony to testimony of his fatherly love for man, and at last, as the greatest testimony of all, Christ, as the representative of God, comes and declares himself the sinner's friend and Saviour, and dies, and rises again in attestation of the truth of his mission. And still the question is asked, will Christ find those who are lost? Can he save the sinners? Is it any wonder, that a fire is kindled against Jacob, and that anger also comes up against Israel, because they believe not in God, and trust not in his salvation—because they, like the Israelites of old, turned back, and tempted God; and limit the goodness, and the wisdom and the moral power of the Holy One of Israel?

Filled with these wrong conceptions of the character of God, they, too, have injurious views of the commandments and laws given to the children of men.—They suppose that the manifestation of the divine glory and the exaltation of God's honor, is the only object of his moral government—and that this can be secured as well in connexion with the creature's endless sin and misery, as in the salvation of the creature. Consequently, they feel as if every command given them, did not involve so much their happiness, as the abstract honor and glory of the law-giver. The same view of God's character, extends through, and colors over, every gift of his bounty, every provision of his providence and his grace, and every administration of his government. All—all are seen to be emanations of a cold, selfish and calculating Deity, who blesses abundantly when blessing enhances his glory; but who damns to endless torture as freely, when an exhibition of his vindictive justice will exalt his honor—

"Who, as it pleases best himself,
Sends one to heaven and ten to hell,
A' for his glory;
And no for only gude or ill,
They've done afore" him.

I know 'tis satire—but the point of the satire is in the strict truth of the representation it furnishes.

"AN APPEAL"—EXPLANATION.

In the Appeal to all indebted to the late firm of Grosh and Hutchinson, published in No. 51, last volume, it was stated that Grosh and Hutchinson had paid Br. Skinner, about $7000 (principal and interest) on their contract for the Magazine and Advocate. It should have been stated (but probably a desire to be brief as possible, prevented Br. Hutchinson, who drew it up, from going into particulars,) that of that sum, about $4,600 was in the balance due on the contract purchasing the paper from me by the present proprietors. For at the time I sold the paper to Grosh and Walker, I assigned that amount of their contract to Mr. Skinner, who agreed to receive it as part payment of the contract of G. and H. with him. This explanation is necessary, lest the reader may suppose that the whole of that $7000 was paid in cash.

It is but just to add also, that Mr. Skinner has received but a very small payment as yet on the contract of Grosh and Walker transferred to him as above stated—that he has received but a few hundred dollars, as yet on the accounts transferred to him by Mr. Hutchinson and myself, and that he is really in great need of the money, to meet payments on personal debts, and on the indorsements made for us. We do therefore earnestly urge all against whom those accounts are, to pay as speedily as possible. Those indorsements should have been met before now had we been able; and we are anxious that they should be speedily met by the debtors aforesaid. If not soon paid, Mr. Skinner will be under the necessity of adding costs.

A CARD.

Myself and family can not but express thus publicly our gratitude for the fraternal kindness and good will lately evinced by a number of our friends in this city—some of them not even members of the Universalist congregation. We particularly remember the number that assembled at our house last Monday evening, on such short notice and in such unpleasant weather, and after spending an evening of hilarity and social intercourse, left us substantial evidences that they wished us "a happy new year." The teachers and pupils of the Sunday School sent in a beautiful quilt of their own manufacture. We can not particularize; but say to all who came and to all who would have come, God bless you now and ever. The gifts coming as they did at the close of my term of service with the society, all unsolicited and unexpected, were indeed gratefully received.

DEATHS.

In Lebanon, December 11th, Mr. THOMAS B. HURD, aged 62 years. The palsy hand of sickness bore heavily on Br. H. for years, but resting in the promises of his Father, he saw by faith the arrival of that period, when "Groans, and pains, and griefs, and fears,

And death itself shall die."

C. L. S.

In Madrid, September 8th, AMARILLA, wife of R. Hepburn, aged 54 years. Mrs. H. was one of the first settlers in this town, and she was long known as a kind and affectionate neighbor, and a devoted Christian. She died in the triumphs of that faith which receives a ransomed world in its capacious embrace. Her funeral was attended in the Universalist church on the 9th, and a large and sympathizing audience listened attentively to the ministrations of the word of life.

D. MOTT.

In Hounsfield, November 28th, of consumption, Mrs. NANCY, consort of Cornelius W. Ingleheart, and daughter of John and Lucy Phelps, in the 36th year of her age. The deceased never made an open profession of any particular system of religion; but was a pattern of that religion spoken of by St. James. She has left a husband and two children, who deeply mourn their loss; but they mourn not as those without hope. Funeral on the 29th, attended by the writer.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

ANSWER OF THE MELANCHOLY.

Oh! ask me not, why in my gaze
So much of wildness is displayed,
Which now thou viewest with amaze;
For should I tell, thou might'st upbraid.

Nor why my brow the obvious line
Of care and twice my years, has caught;
It could but move such breast as thine,
To know each mark with pain was wrought.

Oh! ask not why I love the gloom
That doth supplant my cheek's young smiles;
It was not cherished, yet did come,
Grim harbinger of many ills!

Nor why the lonely nook I seek,
And love the bird that humblest sings;
Of merriment, oh do not speak!
For mine was formed with truant wings.

Mine eye on vacancy hath gazed too long,
And on the image of unreal mildness;
Therefore 'tis faded, and its vision strong,
And youthful fire have given place to wildness.

The wasting form and strength, the waning health,
Have been the source of deep regret and pain,
But the auxiliary of disease whose stealth
Though sometimes slow, is always beauty's bane,

Hath been the agent, writing o'er the brow
Those characters which time may not control;
Yes, mind when palsied, or convulsed, will show
A face of gloom, and a distorted soul!

GLORIOUS WINTER REIGNS.

Winter, glorious Winter, reigns,
In robes of spotless white,
And earth is bound with icy chains
Of brilliancy and light.

The snow, the fair and heavenly snow,
Around us now it lies,
A mantle pure of light below,
Just fallen from the skies.

A welcome, then, to Winter's reign
Upon the earth below;
For life and joy are in its train,
Across the silvery snow.

Resplendent is the silvery sheen
The brilliant snow displays,
When o'er the wide and dazzling scene
Shine forth the sun's bright rays:

The costly jewels, rich and fair,
Afar in Eastern mine,
Can never with the gems compare,
That sparkling round us shine.

A welcome, then, &c.

And when, at night, the jewel'd sky
Doth vie the glittering frost,
And envious Cynthia weeps on high,
The glory she has lost—

It thrills the heart to ride along
The path of boundless white,
When merry bells pea! forth their song
To cheer us on our flight.

A welcome, then, &c.

SOWING AND REAPING.

"Reaping where you have not sown."

We took occasion, one of the fine mornings of last week, to make an excursion beyond the city limits, attracted by the freshness of the air, the cool crispness of which seemed to give new play to the lungs, and a new gush to the blood. The blue sky above had not yet put on the hazy dimness of Indian summer, though the gossamer was flitting away in the breezes, twisted and distorted by its rapid motion; and the lovely hues which the forest had lately worn, its variegated garments of autumnal beauty, were fading into sober brown, and the leaves were pouring down from the trees, shaken by the wind, and crisped and curled by the sun; till the stem could no longer hold them to the branch.

It was a day for a poet—we are none—and so we thought of poor Clark, and his rich fancy, that seized on all these attractive beauties of nature, combined them in song, and gave them to the world—to that world which learned to love nature from the loveliness of his verse. Clark is low: his foliage was shaken from the branches before the autumn storm had dimmed its beauty. It fell while it was receiving and giving charms; and we now, in the dryness of age, remember the richness and luster of his blossoms, that shall bring forth fruit, where no tempests deform the skies, and no autumn frosts wither the herbage.

Pursuing this idea, we leaned against a fence, and contemplated the brilliant, but fading, scene around us, and startled as a foot step denoted the approach of a man. It was an old man, too; he had come across the ploughed field, and seemed intent upon the tender grain just shooting up from the mellow earth. We saluted him respectfully—age and usefulness should command respect. He returned our salutation with a quiet courtesy, that induced conversation.

With the farmer, the talk about the weather is not a mere gossip. He looks to the winds and clouds, not to avoid labor, but to insure success; and the former and the latter rains are to him blessings, like the dew upon Hermon, and the dew upon the mountains. So we remarked that the weather had been remarkably fine during the present month.

"Delightful, delightful," said he, "delightful. The sun has shone out almost continually, and the air has been healthful and bracing. Now and then a cloud has gathered in the heavens, but it seemed scarcely large enough to cover the deep blue above, that hung upon its white skirts in lovely contrast, like the eye of infancy. And when it has rained, it seemed so sparing and so gentle, that the sun looked out upon the water drops before they had been absorbed, like the smiles of the same infant in the midst of tears."

"You have needed rain, then—more, perhaps, than you have had,"

"The earth has required much rain—it is dry and parched—the grass has been burnt out of the upland. But one of the worst effects of the exceedingly dry weather in September and October, is the difficulty of sowing our winter grain, and the still greater difficulty of its taking root, and springing up."

"That requires rain, then," said we.

"Frequent showers; indeed, we ought almost to scatter the seed in a shower, if we hope to have much pleasure in reaping."

"Que simenant in lachrymis, in exultationes metent," thought we rather aloud.

The man, when we looked up, was gazing in our face.

"Sow in tears, and reap in joy," said we, pointing to the field.

A slight smile upon the face of the farmer, faded away slowly into a thoughtful, melancholy look.

"I have, indeed," said he, "in this field, sown in an abundance of tears. Whether I shall reap in joy—whether I shall share in the glorious harvest, I know not."

"I trust you will, for many harvests," said we. "But has that come up which you sowed in the field?"

We both looked across the broad lot, till our eyes rested upon a stone wall at a distance, in the lower part of the field; and after a moments pause, our friend said—

"All has not come up that I have sowed here—sowed in tears, too, and sowed in hope."

"The earth clogs," said we, "seem to be strong and heavy; they probably prevent the fulfilment of your hopes."

"Yes, yes," said our friend, looking away again into the vale, and evidently speaking to himself, rather than to us; "the clogs of the valley do rest upon them. Will you walk across the fields?"

There was something so attractive in the melancholy of the stranger, that we accepted his invitation.

Entering the lower part of the field by another avenue, we found ourselves close to the stone wall that we had noticed at a distance, and we entered a narrow inclosure. It was a family burying ground. A few trees had grown up among the long grass, and they were pouring down their seared leaves upon the graves below.

My companion leaned over the headstone of a principal grave, and pointed to a smaller one at its side.

"The frost and wind," said he, "that are stripping the trees above us, can scarcely make them barer than I have been left. One after another they have dropped from me, and the last, the hardest, because the last."

A little hillock was swelling up, whose newly laid sod told of the recency of the poor man's affliction—wife, child, and grand-child.

"And these," said he, "I have planted in tears. Beyond the wall, the grain which my hand scattered abroad comes forward to repay my toil, and I may reap in joy; but from this narrow field, nothing springs up, and I can never reap with joy what I have planted with many tears."

The dryness of the season, and the melancholy fall of the leaf, had evidently conspired with recent affliction, to disturb the philosophy of my companion, and I sought to cheer him, but scarcely with effect; he seemed to cling to the comparison of the wheat.

"The grain," said we, "which you reap, is not that which you sow; the earth receives the decaying seed, and gives back a perfect harvest. And that which you have deposited here, must be garnered in incorruption, and you can reap in joy only where tears are unknown."

"I have, then," said the stricken man, "set up my expectations of happiness on earth! It was wrong, but unintentionally wrong. My declining years should have taught me other things. And I will, hereafter, make my faith superior to my earthly grief; and mark the signal," said he, pointing backward to the slender shaft just raised at St. Peter's Church, "mark the beautiful signal. The beams of the declining sun are reflected with lustre from yonder emblem, where the gilded cross stands brilliant above the globe, to show us how superior to earth is that faith which can sustain our infirmities."

"There is, then, a hope," said we, "that there will be a harvest in which you can share with joy."

He looked down upon the hillocks below, for a time, and then, raising his eyes till they rested again upon the emblem, said, "I shall go to them—they shall not return unto me."

REVOLUTIONARY ANECDOTES.—It will be remembered that a reward of 500*l.* was offered for the head of John Hancock. When he signed the Declaration of Independence, he did it with a bold hand, in a conspicuous manner, and rose from his seat, pointing to it, and exclaimed, "There, John Bull can read my name without spectacles, he may double his reward, and I put him at defiance."

When I visited Mr. Adams in November, 1818, his hand trembled similar to that of Stephen Hopkins, the Quaker patriot from Rhode Island, who had been afflicted with a paralytic stroke. Mr. Adams acted as his amanuensis, and asked him if he should sign his name to the Declaration of Independence for him. "No! I will sign it myself—if we are hung for signing it, you shall not be hang for it for me."

Mr. Adams, then, in imitation of Hopkins, took his pen, clasped his wrist with his left hand, went through the tremulous motion of signing his name, and in the language of Hopkins, emphatically said, "If my hand trembles, John Bull will find my heart won't!" which Mr. Adams said electrified all Congress, and made the most timid firm in their purpose.—Boston Daily Adv.

is thus at first as a person proving—showing—using with God in the beginning, and now manifesting His power, showing, becoming, as it were, Jesus, in the person of our Saviour.

Your particular in saying this fact, because our text is frequently quoted as being the very language of God himself—to which I would have no objection, were the words not still further perverted, in saying that he supposed the eternal state was the worst in the immortal state of existence. An examination of the language itself, will show the reasons for the latter opinion; and I believe the context of the context will completely establish the former error.

The address from whence our text is taken, and at which it forms a part, begins at the twentieth verse—"Wisdom crieth without: she uttereth her voice in the streets," etc. Now unless the Deity should be so condescended to as to assume a female, this is sufficient to show that the language here ascribed to wisdom is not that of God, himself. I say not this to avoid any conclusion legitimately flowing from the words of the text or context—but to impress on your minds a simple fact. For Exhibit freely, that as God is supremely wise, his is the language of wisdom; and that what may fairly be attributed to divine wisdom, may be regarded as belonging to "the only wise God our Saviour."

life, refused to heed the calls of wisdom—set at naught its counsels and would not hearken to its reproofs—it would spend eternity in inflicting on him all the tortures it could devise for him—in shutting him up from all holiness and goodness—in then laughing at his torments and agonies, and mocking his plaintive cries for mercy. Now—let us candidly ask—was this the end for which wisdom created us? Suppose, when creative power was at work, some being had whispered to divine wisdom, such a wretched, wicked termination as the result of man's being—the occupation of cursing his existence and blaspheming his God, as that which would employ the high and noble powers of man throughout immortality—would divine wisdom have said, "Go on with the work—such is the existence I desire to bestow on man—such is the employment for which I design the gifts I will bestow on him?" Such must have been the purpose—such the counsel of divine wisdom, if the common views concerning our text are true. There is no possible way, that I can conceive, of avoiding this conclusion. For infinite wisdom was able to foresee, certainly, the final result of its plans. I care not what that result was—but if clearly foreseen, and then deliberately adopted, the end was selected and decreed as its choice and scheme, by wisdom

We may be told of present evil, on the same grounds, by the objector: but say what you will of the matter, there is an infinite difference between evil as a mere means to establish a final, endless and universal good: and between evil as the end itself—an infinite evil too! On our views, present evil is that means—on the common view, infinite evil is the end. And if to design evil for any one's ultimate benefit thereby, is so abhorrent to the feelings of our Partialist brethren, how much more abhorrent must it be, to design evil for their injury—their ascending evil! Surely such evil is wickedness—at least, it is not godlike, it is not holy or benevolent, to laugh at and exult in the endless sin and suffering of any being.

Hence, on the ground of its wickedness, we can understand how it may have been the cause of the ruin of the vessel. The wisdom is in fact to be in good. There was good in this wisdom. It was a good wisdom—and was the more precious for the evil. How could it be possible that the vessel was destroyed on the ground of being the cause of evil as the result of its wisdom?—When the evil occurs, they can only say, "wisdom is in this about me."—Folly is in fact the cause of evil. Folly might denote a plan of useless wisdom and needless evil—the wisdom is in plan and in good. Folly might laugh at the ceaseless appeals of others, and mock their appealing cries for mercy—but wisdom is allied to goodness, and delights in mercy. Yet wherein does divine wisdom differ from the conceited folly of vain man, if it has designed the endless happiness of man, and is deceived, and disappointed: or, "having begun to build, was not able to finish?" Surely such wisdom, instead of leading down or away to the miseries of its victims, is, in the language of our Saviour, a fit subject for the derision of those who would be able to say of it—"it began to build, but was unable to finish."

For these, the great lessons that ought to be learned, were, I believe, very clearly and fully presented to us of the nature of divine wisdom. II. It is evident, also, that these views were not those of the writers of the text—their views, as he has said, were a genuine possession, the inheritance of their hearts, existing in the hearts of the writers, and not imposed on a cold and unfeeling Dr. Geo. Campbell, a Scottish Presbyterian, was correct when he declared of the Old Testament, the book of Proverbs included, of course,) that it preserved an inviolable silence in regard to the state of the dead—their joys or sorrows, their happiness or misery. He is not alone in this opinion. The most eminent Partialist commentators unite in declaring that the doctrine of endless misery is not taught in the Old Testament.

The very context favors this view of the subject. It does not mention the events of our text as taking place after the death of these foolish persons—or as existing in a world or state different from that in which the calls of wisdom were made. Far from it. For read onward to the thirty-first verse, and you will there find that they were to “eat of the fruit of their own way, and be filled with their own devices.” Surely it is not necessary for a man to go to the eternal state to do this—this language is invariably used of the punishment of the wicked in this world.

But this is not all—read the thirty-second verse—“For the turning away of the simple shall slay them, and the prosperity of fools shall destroy them”—and lest this slaying and destruction may be understood to mean something else than natural death, after the fulfilment of our text, read the thirty-third verse—“But whoso hearkeneth unto me, shall dwell safely, and shall be quiet from fear or evil.” This contrast confirms our rejection of the common views of our text. The text has its fulfilment in this life—before natural death takes place—and the contrast to it, is also in this life. III. In the third place, I will proceed to show what the text does mean—and how it has its fulfilments in this life.

I conceive it to be one of those passages in which truth is expressed precisely as it appears, not as it really is—viz. that to the man who has despised wisdom, every recollection thereof, rises up as if in mockery and derision before him. He feels that he has acted foolishly, absurdly—that he deserves taunts and reproaches, ridicule and laughter—and would even sooner have them than kindness!

Have none of you ever acted so foolishly toward a friend, as if he really were as if he would be laughing at you, and silent at you? And when he came to his senses and compassed more silence, did you not feel as if he was inwardly taunting you—laughing at your folly—and that his silence was far worse than would be his most cutting rebukes? Just so our text and context intends to represent wisdom as acting toward the ruined, foolish man, after he has gone so far in his folly as to be unable to return.

Take a too common case in the world—a man who makes fame or fortune his deity, and pursues it at the sacrifice of conscience, friendship, religion—every thing. A man may be almost any thing he wills to be, if he will but put his whole soul to the task, and persevere in it, and in it alone. In the language of another—"God gives to man, his idol in this world, if his heart is set upon it, and he pursues it without wavering; but, remember, it is given, not in mercy, but in bitter and blighting wrath—not as a blessing, but as a soul-destroying curse. Go out into the world, with a determination to be rich—God sees that determination, and sends the triumph."

So with our supposed young man. He narrows down his sympathies for human suffering; for they draw money from his purse. Instead of putting it there. He hardens his feelings of dignity: the money is often to be had in the filthy gutters of life! He bronzes his cheek against the blush of shame: for by a falsehood, or a trick, he can sometimes add a penny to his hoard. He blunts his sensibilities: for the cries of the starving poor are troublesome, when their last crust is snatched from them! He disregards the admonitions of conscience: for by only half-paying his laborers, he can add the remainder of their wages, to the profits of his own. In short—despite the admonitions of conscience, the dictates of heavenly wisdom, and the pleadings of Christian charity, he becomes a hard man—one who reaps, where he has not sown—one who gathers, where he has not sowed. He clips the orphan's portion—he scants the widow's wages—he takes the pittance of the poor, without giving compensation—he robs the weeping wife and children of their hard-earned gains, to pay for the poison he put into their husband and father's bottle. He plucks the morsel from the mouth of the hungry, and tears the tattered robe from the shivering shoulders of defenceless poverty. And thus, little by little, (and sometimes by a daring risk,) he becomes rich.

When he started in this career, he intended, at this point, to seat himself down in ease and comfort for the remainder of his life—and it was this intention that led him to disregard the outstretched hand, and to be deaf to the calls of wisdom. But how is it now? Can he sit down and enjoy his ill-gotten gains? No—the avarice which was his servant, has become his master—his tyrant—and he is its slave! He has fed the flame, till himself is involved in the conflagration. He now is obliged—in order to keep the station in society where his wealth places him, he is obliged to spend dollars, where he formerly spent but cents; and, alas, he now values cents as he formerly did dollars! Every cent he expends in useless pomp, is like draining his heart of blood, and minting its drops. Oh, who can tell the agony of the miser, when compelled to spend the god of his idolatry! Judas, only, when choking with anguish for having betrayed his Lord, is a fit comparison of the miser, when reflecting on his folly in having spent his gold for naught!

But there is a downhill, often, on the path by which the hard-hearted rise to wealth. "The sons scatter with a shovel, what the father has gathered with a fork"—says the old proverb. In vain he robs himself, as he has done others—lives meagrely—redoubles his exertions—faster than he can accumulate, the fashions of the times, or those around him, scatter abroad, till, with ravenous desires for wealth, he is surrounded with the fears of poverty and want! Or, hasting to be richer, and rendered confident by successful villany, he deceives—cheats himself, and becomes the victim of his own rascality.

Now is our text and context verified. The present, is all ruin and desolation—the future, but blackness and despair—he turns to the past for consolation. Does he receive it? No! Far off in the vista of life, he sees long despised wisdom, her hand pointing still to the sure path of integrity, industry, and rectitude, which certainly leads to peace and joy, but which he so heartily despised and so carefully avoided. Oh, what bitter thoughts roll in troublous waves of fire across his memory! But the pathway by which he has wandered from wisdom, can not be retraced—the past can not be lived over again. He therefore seems to hear wisdom—the wisdom he despised—calling to him—"Because I have called, and ye refused; I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded; but ye have set at naught all my counsel, and would none of my reproof: I also will laugh at your calamity: I will mock when you fear cometh; when your fear cometh as desolation, and your destruction cometh as a whirlwind; when distress and anguish cometh upon you. Then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer; they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me: for that they hated knowledge, and did not choose the fear of the Lord: they would none of my counsel, they despised all my reproof. Therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their own way, and be filled with their own devices. For the turning away of the simple shall slay them, and the prosperity of fools shall destroy them. But whoso hearkeneth unto me shall dwell safely, and shall be quiet from fear of evil."

Oh may God preserve us from inordinate desires for wealth or fame, and cause us to hearken to the voice of wisdom, and to walk as she directs—"for her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace." May ours ever be the wise prayer of Agur—"Remove far from me, vanity and lies; give me neither poverty nor riches: feed me with food convenient for me: lest I be full and deny thee, and say, Who is the Lord? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain."

But I desire to present you another case in which, too often, our text and context are verified: Let us hear the unhappy tale of the degraded, brutified sot—clothed by the bounty of others—loathsome by reason of self neglect and disease—and the piteous wreck of a man, in both mind and body.

Oh, what has thus turned the image of Almighty God into the semblance of an unclean beast; and lowered that intellect, which made him a fit companion for angels, into the unmeaning jabbering of silly idiocy and raving madness! Did he purposely degrade himself thus? Did he deliberately sell his birthright for this dishonorable station? No—oh, no—far from his thoughts was such a foolish intention—such a silly bargain. He deemed himself fully capable of seeking and securing his own happiness, and resolved to do it, in defiance of the instructions of the divine wisdom. He lived for excitement, and found it in the bowl of jollity—he loved mirth, and sought it in the company of the carousing—he wished to drown weariness and care, and steeped them in the burning waters of the still, or the rosy juice of the grape. But he would not become a drunkard! No—his soul loathed the name—his pride could not bear even the thought of such an end to his joy. But he derided the counsel of wisdom, and was often indignant at her reproofs. "The world had better mind its own business," said he—his friends impertinently interfered with his pursuits—his family was foolishly concerned about him—he knew what he was about—it was his own concern; and nobody need meddle with it! The periods of mirth came closer and closer together—the desire for excitement came more frequently, and increased in power—his restlessness under care grew more nervous, and demanded a speedier death in the riotous stupefaction of ebriety—at last, even the craving stomach desired a periodical taste of what was at first, but its occasional beverage.

"But he did not mean to be a drunkard—a sot!"—no; strong in self-confidence, he even seriously meditated breaking off altogether, and did, sometimes, break off for a while, to satisfy himself how strong he was in resolution. Succeeding in these temporary efforts, oh, how he laughed at the grave remonstrances of wisdom, and derided the serious anxiety of affection! "Did they think he could not do as he pleased—that he was such a fool as to become a slave to habit? Pooh! he knew better than that!" But habit began to add one link to another of her chain—to render this one stronger, and that one more secure—to repair more carefully the breaches occasional resolutions made in her shackles—until, finding himself incommoded by attempting to enlarge the freedom he enjoyed within the loosely hung chains, he forbore all efforts to break them, and took life quite easy, resolving to leave off drink at some future time. Alas, that time never came!

Pitying strangers looked on him with compassionate eyes, and shook their heads in wonder at his folly. Bosom friends, daring repulses and reproaches, spoke to him in every tone of entreaty. It troubled him; his feelings were wounded, and his conscience disturbed,—and he hastened to drink and forget it. He came home late at night, and often found a tender mother, sister or wife, with face bedewed with tears, countenance pale, and form exhausted with watching. They said nothing, or spoke kindly and imploringly—and he hastened to get rid of the reproaches of his heart in a stupefied slumber. He came down from his chamber in the morning with cloudy brow and haggard looks, and met the sorrow-choked family around the lately joyous breakfast, unable now to eat it, for sorrow and shame at the declining footsteps of their loved one. Every tear in their eyes was as a powerful lens to concentrate the sorrow of their looks into a fire of agony on his heart—and he hastened from home and its inmates, to quench the inward flame with an intoxicating draught! Nor prayers—nor entreaties—nor kindness, nor reproaches;—not the accusings of his own conscience, nor the desires of his soul, were now a match for his appetite. Father, mother, brothers, sisters, wife, children, friends—hope, peace, joy—ALL—EVEN HEAVEN ITSELF, could he barter it, would he give for the deadly poison that now scorches his brain, and makes him that loathsome, beastly thing he once so much despised—a drunkard! And in his sober moments, when he realizes the horrid present—when he looks forward to the equally dreadful future, almost at hand, a drunkard's death—and then despairingly turns his eye on the past—oh, what seems to him the voice of wisdom.

Look at his beginning—mark the increasing shades that gathered on his pathway, still growing darker and darker—down—down to the present rayless midnight. What is its language to him? And see, afar off, in the visible light of its commencement, to which he can never more return—see, there, wisdom pointing steadily to the path of sobriety, moderation and virtue, assuring all who follow it, that it is one of peace and safety, ending in honor and bliss—oh, what seems to be her language to this hapless, foolish man? "Because I have called, and ye refused; I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded; but ye have set at naught all my counsel, and would none of my reproof: I also will laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh; when your fear cometh as desolation, and your destruction cometh as a whirlwind; when distress and anguish cometh upon you. Then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer; they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me: for that they hated knowledge, and did not choose the fear of the Lord: they would none of my counsel, they despised all my reproof. Therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their own way, and be filled with their own devices. For the turning away of the simple shall slay them, and the prosperity of fools shall destroy them. But whoso hearkeneth unto me shall dwell safely, and shall be quiet from fear of evil."

And what is her language to us—to us, who think we stand, and should therefore take heed that we do not fall? "My son, if thou wilt receive my words, and hide my commandments with thee; so that thou incline thy ear unto wisdom, and apply thy heart to understanding; yea, if thou criest after knowledge, and liftest up thy voice for understanding; if thou seekest her as silver, and searchest for her as for hid treasures; then shalt thou understand the fear of the Lord, and find the knowledge of God. For the Lord giveth wisdom: out of his mouth cometh knowledge and understanding. He layeth up sound wisdom for the righteous; he is a buckler to them that walk uprightly. He keepeth the paths of judgment, and preserveth the way of his saints. Then shalt thou understand righteousness, and judgment, and equity; yea, every good path. When wisdom entereth in thy heart, and knowledge is pleasant unto thy soul."

And to those, if any are here present, who have commenced practices, whatever they are, that wisdom approves not—oh, how earnest—how almost severe but affectionate are her entreaties! "How long, ye simples, will ye love simplicity? and the scorners delight in their scorning, and fools hate knowledge? Turn you at my reproof: behold, I will pour out my spirit unto you, I will make known my words unto you." Oh, may they hear and obey this voice—may they consider the end of the way they are travelling, and turn again to wisdom before it is too late—before they have whelmed in shame and sorrow their families and friends, and buried themselves in irretrievable ruin and degradation.

Are there any here, who mourn the folly of their beloved ones, and are hopeless of their reformation? Let them not mourn as the hopeless, nor grieve as the despairing. Wisdom, though stern, is not cruel—though rigid in inflicting rebukes and chastisements, she is not merciless. The wisdom of this world may be cruel and unforgiving; "but the wisdom that is from above, is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy." Having designed all, impartially, for final holiness and happiness, she will accomplish her design, however mysterious or severe may be the means;—she will perfect her work to the rejoicing of all hearts in the universe of God. So mote it be. Amen.

CONVINCING ARGUMENT FOR IMMORTALITY.

BY REV. W. M. FERNALD.

I mean the argument founded on feeling. Start not! reader, for we mean to present the old matter in a new light. The argument from desire, as commonly given, is not what we here indulge in. There is but little satisfaction in that, as commonly put. We would lay down the proposition, that because certain natural feelings exist, the objects must exist which call those feelings into action. What are those feelings which go out towards God, to immortality, but the excitement of certain faculties or natural powers of the mind, when directed to their proper objects? For instance, excite the intellect of man. But you can not excite it without directing it to its proper objects. For illustration—here is a faculty for mathematics. How would you go to work to excite it? How only can you excite it? By presenting to it a problem—a question in numbers—a sum. And now the very fact that that faculty is excited, is proof that that problem is present. For you can not excite it in any other way. Again—here is a faculty for poetry. How will you excite that faculty? By presenting to it a problem in mathematics? Nay, verily. It has no sympathy for it. But you place before it ideal-scenes of beauty—poetry itself, in the creations of fancy, in picturesque, in romance, in the gorgeous sunset, in the flower. You can not excite this faculty in any other way. You must feed it with its own natural food. Again; here also are faculties for argument—for reasoning from facts and principles. How will you excite them? By holding out bread to eat? or by weak, washy, empty poetry? No; but by sturdy, iron-handed, reasonable truth. How would you attempt to excite and gratify the propensity by which you love your children—by fondling a rattle-snake? nor that by which you feel the sensations of hunger, by presenting a stone, or a scorpion. In short, each faculty and propensity of our nature is only excited by presenting to it its proper objects. When they are not present, in reality or in the thoughts, or if they did not exist, then the faculty would be dead, the propensity all dormant and inactive. And—mark, very particularly—when they are excited, that very excitement is proof positive that the appropriate objects of those faculties and propensities are present; or rather, that they do exist, and are in the thoughts.

Now, is not all this true of our moral and spiritual nature? Can those faculties or sentiments be excited without the presence or existence of their proper objects? Impossible. It is undoubtedly true that the faculties were made for the objects; not the objects for the faculties. And how is it, then, with regard to those high—those heavenward aspirations—those immortal gushings out of the soul in desires after God, after heaven itself, after immortal life? Is it possible that these high emotions of the soul are excited without the presence, or even the existence of their suitable objects?—And is not the very existence of the faculties—especially, their state of excitement, sometimes so great—proof enough that the objects exist?

The point is—we admit this with regard to the intellect; we are obliged now, to be consistent, to admit it of the spiritual nature. The argument of compulsion is upon us. We admit it in a thing like the faculty of mathematics, of poetry, of argument; and in the propensity of the love of children, and that which gives the sensation of hunger. And shall we now deny it in those mightier things of God, of immortality? Oh, how the truth bears upon us! How it bursts upon us! The solid fact is, these faculties can not be—much more, they can not be excited—WITHOUT the existence and presence of these their appropriate objects, They absolutely can not!

You may say that we may feel that a devil and a hell exists—we may have an excitement that may, and therefore, by this reasoning, those objects do exist. But, no. I would have it understood that we have no natural faculties which run out after the devil or hell—that appear to be made for these particular objects, and no others. And it is natural feeling—natural powers that I talk of. Now be it known, these spiritual faculties of which I am speaking, are a part of our common humanity. They are excited by no other objects. Nothing in the world will excite them—nothing in the world will gratify them. We must, then, go out of the world to give these faculties their proper objects. And they are—God and immortality, any bugger would excite the powers that dwell on the devil and hell. They address the natural fears of man. But fear does not seek one only definite object. The faculties of which I speak invariably do. They answer to nothing else. They are chords in this harp of a thousand strings, which are still and motionless, except when vibrating at the touch of their proper objects. Those objects, then, exist, or those chords would not be there. And their excitement proves that a divine hand has touched them. Or, to drop the figure, the faculties of our spiritual nature do prove, as much as the faculties of our intellectual nature, that the objects exist for which the faculties were made. And their excitement proves that those objects are present to the mind.

Truth to say—we know not how to get away from this argument. Suppose, for instance, there were no children in this world, and yet that we had the strong natural propensity that prompted us to the love of them. Now this very fact of the existence and occasional excitement of the propensity would be proof absolute, in such a state, that we should one day—in a future world if not in this—have children; the objects which would alone answer to the propensity. Well now—if you have pardoned the comparison—this is an exact illustration of our present situation with reference to God and to immortality. We have the natural faculties or powers which are fitted to nothing else—which are gratified by nothing else—which are excited by nothing else. And yet there is no God visibly manifested, and no immortality here. The conclusion is—and it comes with all the force of moral mathematics—there is a God, and there will be immortality in the next or some other stage of existence.

Think this all over, and see if it is not right.

THE CONSUMMATION.

BY REV. U. CLARK.

Sustained by the Author and Finisher of our faith, we are led on triumphantly through present storms of temptation and trial, and pointed to the observing star of hope that once arose over Bethlehem's plain, and which rises higher and higher as our course is onward, until faith and hope are lost in the dimness of the past, overpowered by the heavenly splendency of immortality. Transcendent theme! absorbing contemplation! when we gaze around upon the darkness and death that now hover over our world, and remember that these shall one day be swallowed up in the light and life of heaven, the aching bosom ceases its sorrow, and the mantle of Jesus wipes away the last falling tear. "Glory to God in the highest!"

DEATHS.

In Madrid, November 1st, ROBERT MCEWEN, aged 78 years. Father McEwen was long known as a firm believer in the doctrine of God's universal and efficient grace. Long and successfully did he battle with the enemies of his Saviour and King. Long was he a powerful instrument in the hand of God, for the pulling down of the strong holds of error and spiritual wickedness high in authority and influence: and when the time of his departure drew near, he could exclaim with the apostle, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith." His funeral was attended on the 2d, in the Methodist church—sermon by the writer, assisted in the services by Rev. Mr. King, Methodist.

In Madrid, November 6, BETSEY, wife of Chester Goss, aged 37 years. Sister Goss was a person who was loved and respected by all who knew her. She has left a companion and two small children to mourn their loss. May her children be trained up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; and may her companion partake freely of the water of life. Her funeral was attended in the Universalist church on the 7th, and a large congregation were present, who gave evidence of the moral worth of the deceased.

D. MOTT.

In Dexter, December 9th, Mrs. BETSEY, wife of Samuel, and mother of John T. Wood, in the 75th year of her age. This aged sister was in the strict sense of that word, a Universalist. She ever adorned her profession by a well ordered life and godly conversation. A short time before her death, she told some one that stood by, of a different faith, not to tell after she was gone, that she renounced her doctrine; for it was her only hope. God bless the mourners. Funeral on the 11th—sermon by Br. Persons, assisted in the services by the writer.

G. S. A.

In Brownville, December 13th, after a lingering illness, Mrs. SALLY, wife of James Allen, 2d, in the 32d year of her age. In the death of this amiable sister, a husband has lost a tender companion, two children, a kind and affectionate mother, and community a valuable member. Funeral on the 15th—sermon by the writer.

G. S. A.

In Columbus, November 21st, TIMOTHY ROBBINS, aged 76 years. Br. Robbins died a firm believer in the restitution, and well prepared to meet death. Just before he expired, he called his son-in-law (with whom he lived) to the bed, and asked him if he would call on a Universalist preacher to attend his funeral. Being answered in the affirmative, he said, "I shall die happy"—and passed away composed and cheerful. Funeral services by Br. J. S. Sherburne, on the 22d.

In Cohocton, on the 5th of November, JOHN T. SHATTUCK, aged 19 years, 7 months and 12 days. His funeral was attended on the 6th, by Br. R. W. Cheney. May the blessings of the Gospel be showered down upon the mourning friends, and may they be consoled by its life-giving influence here in time, and at last may they with the ransomed universe become holy and happy.

On Howlet Hill, Onondaga county, November 24th, of a painful, lingering, and complicated sickness, Miss MELISCENT CASE, aged 26 years. She bore her affliction with patience and resignation. Her mind was sustained by her faith; which embraced the fullness of the Restitution—here, she had no doubts; for her view was glorious. Having lived virtuously, she was prepared to die calmly, having the respect and affection of all who knew her. May consolation be given to the afflicted mourners, through Jesus the Saviour.

G. W. M.

In Senpott, December 26th, of consumption, Miss ESTHER BARNES, aged 24 years. This young lady was strong and immovable in the faith of the Restitution. And it sustained and cheered her in her last hours; so much so, that she had not the least fear of death. A large number of relatives, and friends, who loved and respected her, mourn her departure. May truth console them.

JERUSALEM.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

Oh death! thy dreary palaces are here,
Thy ravages have marked this hallowed ground;
And many hearts were chilled with nameless fear,
When far and near thy voice was echoed round.
Jerusalem, once mighty, at thy outer gate
Sits wrapped in gloom, bowed down and desolate—
A queen once fair—now ruined and disrowned,
With ashes rudely scattered on her head—
A childless mother weeping for her dead!
Oh once it was not thus!—In ages past
That now lie slumbering in eternity,
Then thou wast great and glorious—thou wast
Thy banners wide, and to them rushed the free.
We were proud to grace thy princely halls,
And prophets oft appeared within thy walls,
And God in holy spirit dwelt with thee.
While thus remained, though nations rose and died,
Yet still thy triple walls the world defied.
But now how changed!—thou art all desolate,
And trampled down—the very mock of fame
Is thine, with nothing save thy fallen state—
Thy buried glory and a deathless name.
All silent are thy woes—all hushed thy mirth;
Thy very form is wedded to the earth,
And lies engulfed in everlasting shame.
How passed away! I would it were not so!
Oh may true greatness never fall so low!
Where stood thy palaces and temple gates,
The tall, coarse reed and long grass rankly grow;
Lamenting deeply o'er thy fate of fates,
Doth seem the music of thy waters' flow;
Where prayers were said and holy feet have trod,
And songs were breathed whose music woke for God,
Now sports the scoffing Turk—the Christian's foe.
How long, Jerusalem, above thy grave,
Shall jeer Mahomet's creed-believing slave?
Yet listen! She must moulder where she fell.
From this though stern decree no arm can save;
And her destiny was earned full well,
For first she turned a traitor, then a slave;
Betraying all her faith and then the Word,
Then was she by the Roman's sword,
She sank beneath oblivion's wave;
But why should Christian's life a wail for her,
Whose life was pure religion's sepulchre?

BRIEF THOUGHTS.....NO. VIII.

BY REV. S. GOFF.

"Come ye to the waters." Ps. lv. 1.

How necessary to man's existence, here on earth, is water. Constituted as he now is, he could not survive without it. He would droop, and fade away, and die. Yea, the very means of his existence would all be cut off. The earth would appear a barren waste; vegetation would no longer adorn the face of nature; and all the beauty and abundance which now surrounds us and blesses us, would never more be known. Now, as natural water is to the natural thirst, and to the natural world, so is spiritual water—the "water of life"—the water of God's love—to the thirsty spirit, to the moral world. Without this, the soul can not retain its health and vigor—can not survive. The moral world would be barren and unfruitful.—"The plants of grace" would not thrive. And all the beauty and loveliness of piety, devotion, and love would be banished from the world.

Come, then, ye fainting, weary, thirsty souls, "come ye to the waters." Come and drink of the "water of life." Come and "draw water from the wells of salvation." Come and put your confidence in God. Rely on his promises: drink in of his love; and trust him for his grace; and "he shall make thee to lie down in green pastures, and lead thee beside the still waters." "There is a river, the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God." It is the "river of life," which flows from the throne of the Father's unchanging and limitless love.

There is also a river, whose streams roll darkness, despair, and death. It is the river of partialism—the river of endless woe—and flows "from beneath." Many have set themselves down upon its banks, like the pensive, sorrowing Jews, "by the rivers of Babylon;" but the music of the waters is unharmonious to their ears. If they drink thereof, it does not satisfy the soul, but produces parching, burning thirst. To all such we extend the invitation of the prophet: "Come ye to the waters"—to the waters of life, and drink your fill from the "wells of salvation." "And the spirit and the bride say, come. And let him that heareth say, come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." Why, then, do ye linger by the torrent of death? Why do ye labor to hew out cisterns, broken cisterns that can hold no water? Listen to what the Saviour saith: "whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again. But the water that I will give him, shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life."

"Ho ye that pant for living streams,
And pine away and die,
Here you may quench your raging thirst
With springs that never dry.

Dear Lord, the treasures of thy love
Are everlasting mines,
Deeper than all our miseries are,
More boundless than our sins.

The happy gates of Gospel grace
Stand open night and day;
Lord, we are come to seek supplies,
And drive our wants away."

THE DELUGE.*

BY MISS C. M. TIBBITS.

Day and its attendant glories arose in unclouded splendor. The sun came proudly forth from the chambers of the east, tinging his sapphire throne with rich painted blushes of golden effulgence, and reflecting with dazzling splendor upon the fair clouds of summer, scattered here and there over the azure vault of heaven, like the bright islands inhabited by the pure spirits that circle around the eternal throne. Earth lay out spread in all its native loveliness, dressed up with wood and lawn, with forests vast, and festive bowers; while over the whole enchanting scene brooded that holy unearthly calm, that seems to draw the imagination from nature and the fair scenes of earth, up to the eternal Being who spake worlds into existence, and guides the rolling planets through the immensity of space. Creation seemed offering its warning anthem of praise before the shrine of the Almighty; and the tall oak that decked the forest united its voice with the tiny bird that sung among its branches, and eloquently proclaimed the wisdom and goodness of that hand which was the Author of all created things. The soft morning breezes came bearing upon their wings, the sweet odor of the spring gardens of the east, or scattered the pearly dew from rich purple clusters of the vine, that kissed with its drooping boughs the silvery waters of the Assyrian springs. Earth seemed fair as when from the plastic hand of her Creator, she first took her station in the bright expanse of etherial blue, and none would have thought as they gazed upon the bright scene, which seemed to smile at description, that the poisonous breath of vice had ever infected the air, or the fair soil been pressed by the footsteps of villainy.

In a wide spread valley rested the ark. The day of the Lord's wrath had arrived: and now, led by the impulse of their Creator, came the chosen ones, of the innumerable multitudes that roamed over the earth, or winged their way through the vast realms of ether, to the appointed refuge. "The animals, as once in Eden, met in peace." Bounding from the dark recesses of the forest came the roaring lion, and fearlessly about his pathway gambolled the innocent lamb; the enormous elephant lifted on his friendly trunk the moping sloth to a place of security; and by the side of the docile ox walked in stately grandeur, the thick robed bear that gains his sustenance amid the eternal snows that encircle the pole; from gazing upon the sun came the bright eyed eagle, and perched by the side of the harmless dove. All came—the terrible anaconda and huge boa; the speckled rattlesnake and creeping reptile. Onward they move in long procession. Noah and his family at length bring up the rear, and amid the execrations and insults of gazing multitudes, enter their future home. The last one passes the threshold, and the strong arm of the Almighty closes for many a day, the massive doors, upon that vast assemblage of living beings.

And now, peering above the northern forests, comes the angry cloud that portends the approaching storm. Soon it is followed by another, and another; and now low muttering peals of thunder may be heard, proclaiming in suppressed tones the power of an Almighty God. Darker and darker grows the angry scowl of heaven; louder, and still louder, the rolling of the thunders, while amid the dark mountains of clouds, which are borne onward with the rapidity of thought, flash the vivid lightnings; or, descending, prostrate with pitiless fury the proud forest trees amid whose dark green foliage the summer zephyrs have sighed for many a succeeding year. The fairy scene of the morning is vanishing—a few short hours, and the glory of earth will have perished, and the fair form of beauty sunk to rise no more. The storm now peals in wild fury—the rolling thunders crash through the earth, from pole to pole, and fiery lightning of God's wrath are streaming down, upon the guilty, terror-stricken inhabitants of earth. Mourn for thy crimes, O guilty earth!—though now too late, let tears of repentance bedew your cheeks, ye that have mocked the mercies of your Creator, and slogged with impunity his frequent warnings. The dark waves of death are rising higher, and still higher, till earth is enveloped in a shroud of deep waters, and all is engulfed in one tremendous ruin.

THE DEPARTED.

Ever the earth enwraps the kindly cherished,
Kindred that by the hand of death have perished;
Friendships too potent to express by word,
And love, the power of pen fails to record.

But when the blessed dawn
Of the immortal morn
Dispels earth's sable veil,
Then, then again we hail,
In bliss the lost of earth,
Where spirits know no death,
Where fruits ambrosial bloom,
Springs that all thirst consume.

Forever sweetly flowing, and forever clear,
And mortal anguish can not interfere;
There tears are not, there parting hands not given,
But one eternal welcome swells in heaven!

THE MISSION OF TRUTH.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

Truth is mighty and will prevail, is an old saying, but nevertheless true. When I have thought of this old maxim, I could not despair of the ultimate success of the cause of God's impartial grace. All things in the moral and religious world seem lending their influence for the furtherance of this grand scheme. Yet this can not be accomplished without the co-operation of its friends. Their vigilance and activity are demanded of them. In proportion as they are interested, will they be laboring for the upbuilding of the Zion of our God. They can not forget that the harvest will be in proportion to the cultivation of the soil. There are no fears that the fields of truth will curse the toil of the husbandman. Then let the friends of the great cause of a world's salvation awake and be active. The hope of success of the principles you have embraced, and the joy that shall attend that success, encourage you, and urge you forward in your glorious work. 'Tis not a set of narrow principles that minister to self alone, that you are contending for, but principles which minister to all mankind and should deeply interest all. In consideration of the final result of your cause, the whole human race feel a deep solicitude. The religious world are watching with intense anxiety, your course, and the success of your principles; some, it is true, with fear and dread, but many with hope and earnestness in the exact ratio as they have sympathy for the progress of your cause. Arouse, then, your slumbering energies, for the sunlight of truth is beaming on your pathway. Let your cause enlist your noblest feelings and engage your deepest thoughts. Its mission is the conquest of the world, the subjection of the human family to the reign of peace, and the presentation of them all in the bonds of unity with God and each other. A glorious result to be accomplished for the whole race of mankind. The work is already advancing with wondrous rapidity, and casting its light far before it, as a harbinger of the coming of a happier state of things. The voice of Truth is indeed in the land. It is as a prophet's in the wilderness, lifting up testimony against the reign of error and ignorance, telling of the wonders of existence, the grandeur of the spirit's home, the sublimation of the world in the love of God, the undying affection of our heavenly Father, and the care with which we should tend the fountain of purity in our hearts.

A WORD TO THE ABSURD.

Br. GROSH—I attended a protracted meeting a short time since, where very many curious things were said and done. I listened sometime to the convulsions, threats and shouts, sneers and scoffs of its various actors, till at length, a Rev. gentleman observed some young men laughing in one dimly lighted corner of the room, when he immediately bowed before the eternal God his Maker, and prayed in the following language—"O God, bind the old devil in this room—pull out his great iron teeth." The name of this gentleman I have since forgotten. I was a stranger to him, and am quite unable to inform you whether he wished the great iron teeth of the old devil for some particular private use; or whether he desired the old devil's teeth tortured out of the poor fellow's head, because he thought they would be beneficial to the community; or whether he thought those boys would be scared to profess religion, if he could but procure the teeth of the old gentleman and go about biting the lads with the extracted stubs. The real truth respecting his desires I admit to be of much importance; but, inasmuch as I had never witnessed many such scenes, I could not possibly summons courage enough to ask the gentleman what his real intention was as to the disposal of the old devil's teeth. I hope the community and posterity will accept my embarrassment as an apology, while they have my promise to be more faithful to my duty in future.

CONTRASTS.

Messrs. EDITORS—I have but little time or room to write for publication on the present occasion, but if you think proper I will drop a few words on the subject of the contrast presented in the religious world, and if you consider it profitable, I will continue as circumstances may require. [We shall always be glad to hear from you.—A. B. G.]

Contrast 1st.—Infidelity says, There is no Being of infinite wisdom in the universe; and the various phenomena of nature can be accounted for upon the principles of philosophy.

But the principles of philosophy tell us, that it required the aid of a Being of infinite wisdom to create them, and the laws of attraction and gravitation required the wisdom of a Lawgiver to frame them and give them force and immutability.

2d. Infidelity says, the solar system was formed and arranged by the power of the laws of attraction and gravitation.

But the laws of attraction and gravitation tell us, that if there had been no other power and wisdom, to give the lesser bodies a projectile force across the line of the sun's attraction, and thereby cause them to take curvilinear motion, and by centrifugal and centripetal motions keep them in their orbit, they would have been consolidated in one mass.

3d. Deism says, if there is a Being of infinite wisdom, it is unreasonable to suppose that he should meddle or intermeddle with human affairs.

But reason says it would have been unwise for a God to create such a grand machine as the universe, and people it with myriads of sentient creatures, dependent upon him and his laws, and have no care for them or their well being.

"LEAVEN OF THE PHARISEES."

Christ's caution to his followers to "beware the doctrine of the Pharisees" has long been justly deemed an argument against endless misery, and so asserted by Universalists—excepting the respected Editor of the Magazine and one of his correspondents, "S." I speak only as far as present knowledge is concerned. The remarks of "S." call out this article, which is intended merely as a defence, irrespective of controversy. I have often questioned the propriety of using the above caution as militating against endless punishment, and till lately have supposed the reasoning fallacious. Reflection has satisfied to the contrary.

Here is the point for consideration. If the Pharisees held the doctrine of endless misery, was not that one of the most prominent in their belief, and did it not breathe its malignity through the whole system? "Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees." "A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump."

To be sure, the Pharisees held to the existence of God, and it is asked whether Christ intended to caution his followers against believing in such an existence. Not against the existence of the true God, but against the God of the Pharisees—partial, cruel and vindictive. We may with propriety say, "Beware of the doctrine of the Partialists," without any qualifications whatever. But is it understood that we thus deny the existence of God, the doctrine of rewards and punishments, the mission of Christ, the doctrine of forgiveness, the resurrection and immortality? By no means; though these doctrines are held by Partialists, as well as Universalists. It is understood that, though we believe them in what we consider the truth, yet, we deny them as entertained by Partialists, and hence beware of them.

It was in wisdom, then, that the disciples were warned of the doctrine of the Pharisees—the whole system, excepting no part as entertained by them. One fundamental error strikes at the root of the whole system. If it can be shown that any one point in the Pharisees' faith agreed in every particular with the teachings of Christ, then may Christ be charged with folly in giving the caution, and the argument, drawn from this caution, against the doctrine of endless misery, may be proved fallacious.

Canadaigua, January, 1843.

REPLY.

I thank Br. Clark for the candid manner in which he has presented the argument on his side of the question; and shall endeavor to reply as briefly and as fraternally. I know not how many Universalists agree with him on the subject, but I know that Br. "S." and myself are not the only exceptions, if indeed we are exceptions, which I much doubt.

If the Pharisees had been the only people who, in the days of Jesus, held the doctrine of endless woe—or if that term had included all who held that doctrine—Br. Clark would have the argument; for the tenet of ceaseless suffering would then have been emphatically the doctrine of the Pharisees—that is, their prominent and distinguishing doctrine. This is true now of the Partialists; for by this term we designate, and include in it, all believers in endless misery. But this was not the case with the Pharisees. Indeed it is doubted by some whether the Pharisees did hold to the doctrine of absolute endless misery! And certain it is, that they held it no more exclusively and distinctively, than do the Protestants, the Catholics, and the Mahomedans of our day. And surely a caution against the leaven of either of these three classes, would not be a caution of course against the doctrine of ceaseless suffering! The truth is that the most important, because most prominent and distinctive tenet of any sect and class, is that on which it differs particularly from all the sects and classes around it. Calvinists and Arminians both hold the doctrine of endless misery. Yet the leaven of the Calvinists would be understood to mean something different from that of the Arminians. So with the Baptists, Presbyterians, Methodists, Congregationalists, Unitarians, etc. The doctrine (or leaven) of each of these, is something wherein it differs from the others. And so the doctrine of endless misery was not, in my opinion, the doctrine, the most prominent and distinctive doctrine, of the Pharisees at that age; nor the doctrine against which Jesus most emphatically and directly aimed his reproofs and rebukes, when he plainly opposed them.

The distinctions which Br. Clark makes between the God of the Pharisees and the God of Jesus, are proper enough in some respects; but in this case, are out of place,—for the plain reason, that neither Jesus nor his apostles ever made such distinctions. On the contrary, they were ever speaking and writing on the presumption that the God of the Jews is the only true God. In my opinion we are not authorized, therefore, to make a distinction for the Saviour, which he never made himself.

The concluding remarks of Br. C. were, I hope, a mere slip of the pen. We, all, are rather apt to assume that if our view of a passage is not correct, then it has no meaning at all. But we all must admit that the Saviour may not have meant what we suppose he did, and yet not be guilty of "folly." Our meaning may not be the only wise one in the world! Should Br. C. reply that his language only accuses Br. "S." and myself with charging the Saviour with "folly"—I answer that, the sentiment is not quite so bad in taste and as false in logic; but still it is not the very best thing he could have said on the subject. We have made no such charge against Jesus. Our arguments involve no such consequences. We believe the argument against endless misery, drawn from the text in question, to be fallacious, only because Jesus did not refer to that doctrine when he uttered the caution. And we believe he did not refer to that doctrine, because it was not the doctrine—the most prominent, and distinctive doctrine of the Pharisees. If we are correct in this view, Jesus must have referred to something else than the doctrine of unending agony, and did not, therefore, utter a foolish saying. If we are wrong, it is because our latter stated position is incorrect, in which case the first stated one based upon the latter, falls to the ground, and the saying of Jesus still remains a wise one. But, as I said before, I believe Br. Clark did not mean what his language may be construed into meaning, and therefore close as I began, by thanking Br. Clark for the mildness and candor of his strictures on our views, and of his defence of the other side. A. B. G.

P. S.—The syllogisms of Br. S., which might seem to justify Br. Clark's remarks about charging the Saviour with folly, I understand to refer only to the course of argumentation used by our worthy Br. G.W. M.—to show that his arguments, or rather mode of reasoning, was incorrect; inasmuch as, if it proved any thing, it proved too much. I hope brethren (myself included) will be careful in discussing opinions, to avoid imputations on motives, and charges which would be honestly disavowed by either party. But should such errors be even intentionally committed in the heat or hurry of composition, let us endeavor to be cool and patient, and rather remonstrate and entreat, than rebuke or retaliate. The law of kindness is becoming the order of these Washingtonian days—"overcome evil with good." G.

IMPORTANCE OF CORRECT BELIEF.

Indifferentists and Nothingarians in religion may say what they list about the non-importance of what a man believes or disbelieves; but every day facts are found in abundance, where a man's faith or unbelief is the cause of a happy or a miserable existence. That man can not have a very pleasant journey through life, who begins it in total depravity, with a world-load of sins accumulated on his soul from the days of Adam down to his own birth—who goes on the journey feeling totally unable to comply with God's law, and infinitely guilty for non-obedience—and who expects his journey to end in the company of fiends and damned spirits in an endless hell of sin and woe. This, with varying shades and modifications, is the faith professed by the Christian church generally—and by many is most heartily believed, as well as professed. And whatever may be the views of those who deviate from this statement, all termed orthodox, have the final prospect of endless sin and woe as one termination of life's journey.

Will it be said that few believe it for themselves, and are therefore not rendered miserable by their faith? I answer that the despairing features of hundreds and thousands of our fellow Christians, show that they believe too much of this gloomy picture for their own happiness—and the records of our insane asylums, show a long and melancholy list of others who distrusted God so deeply that reason was dethroned in consequence.

But even if no one ever feared God's endless wrath for himself, still, if they fear it for others whom they love—and are there any whom we should not love?—that is enough to destroy their peace and joy in believing. In vain does God deal graciously with them—in vain does he pour out gifts to overflowing on them and theirs—in vain does he in the Gospel assure them of the immutability and boundless infinity of his love for them and for all mankind—the word preached does not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them—they can not enter into rest. Like the fearful and the unbelieving spoken of in the Book of Revelations, they have a part—and a fearful part of dread doubts, and fears, and anticipations, it is—in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone—they have no rest, day nor night, and the smoke of the imaginary torment which harasses their souls at every thought of eternity, ascends up for ever and ever. Is it any wonder that such persons look with distrust and want of hope on their fellow beings—that nature seems covered with a universal gloom—that the smell of the pit mingles with the aroma of flowers, and the shrieks of the damned with the songs of birds and the chirp of insects? And when they look around them, and realize their views of eternity in reference to those they love best—oh, then, how does a want of confidence in God, and of faith in his promises, sink the barbed agony deep—deep into the soul! "No importance what a man believes," say you! then is it of no importance whether a man is saved or damned in this world—whether he is greatly happy or deeply miserable—and whether he has correct principles of action, or false ones! A. B. G.

The following from Br. Montgomery came to hand, after the other articles on the subject were in type. We therefore insert it without further remark, than to say, that there was no intention on our part of charging Br. M. with arguing for the denial of God, etc., but merely to say that if the argument were followed out, it might involve that as a consequence. The distinctive doctrine of the Pharisees was probably their separativeness, their exclusiveness. The doctrine of endless woe might, or might not, follow from that. Nevertheless, Br. M. may be right, and we wrong. A. B. G.

TO BR. A. B. GROSH.

In the Advocate of December 16th, is an article signed "S.," in which my views of the warning which our Saviour gave his disciples, that they might beware of the doctrine of the Pharisees, as well as that of the Sadducees, are called in question. Those views, are, by your correspondent, made to involve the non-existence of God, the falsehood of the resurrection and of the Old Testament Scriptures. In replying to this representation, I shall not address myself to "S."—for I have made up my mind to let anonymous correspondents alone.—But as you have added your remarks to his, and endorsed his conclusions, thereby virtually adopting the article as your own, I shall present my strictures directly to your consideration.

I am not convinced that the conclusions of your correspondent are correct, nor am I convinced that his reasoning is "fallacious." Still, I am desirous that the precise meaning to be attached to our Saviour's warning, should be ascertained. If I have mistaken that meaning, and am wasting my time and talents on "fallacious reasoning," let me be corrected.

Before offering my views on this subject, let an error which your correspondent has ascribed to me, be removed. He makes me say, that "the Pharisees and Sadducees believed the doctrine of endless misery." I have nowhere stated that the Sadducees so believed. They had no faith in a resurrection, and certainly they could have none in endless misery. This point, however, is referred to, only to correct the mistake.

It will be admitted, that our Saviour did warn his disciples to beware of the Pharisaic doctrine. Of this there can be no doubt. And that the warning was given in earnest, is also beyond doubt. What, then, did our Saviour mean by it? By the reasoning of your correspondent, if I understand him, the warning amounts to nothing. He says:—"I confess myself unable to see any thing in it militating against the doctrine of endless misery." Well, if it does not militate against that dogma, then we may, with the same propriety, affirm that it does not militate against any point in their doctrine. If any one important point is excepted, another important point also may be excepted—until all of them are excluded from the warning. In this manner, it may be made to appear that the Pharisees believed the truth, and that our Saviour's warning was a senseless and useless cry.

I have carefully examined the chapter in which our Lord's warning is contained, and I can not discover that he made reservation of any points embraced in the distinctive doctrine of the Pharisees. I may be mistaken—but your correspondent has failed to convince me that such is the fact. But if Christ made no reservation of special parts of that doctrine, your correspondent concludes, that as the Pharisees believed in the existence of God and the spirit, and in the truth of the Old Testament Scriptures, therefore my argument, if it disproves endless misery, also "disproves all religion, dethrones God, and blots out creation." But such a sweeping conclusion has no terrors for me. I must be excused from believing that it flows from my argument, even if my friend A. B. G. has endorsed it. It is true the Pharisees did not deny the existence of God. This, isolated from the rest of their principles, is unquestionably right. But combine it with those principles, and does it therefore follow, that the existence of such a God as they described, is set forth either in the Old or New Testament? The heathen believed that there is a power who is superior to man—and so all believe. Is it hence true, that the gods which they worship, really do exist? The Pharisees represented God as a partial, and cruel, and unjust being. They believed that he "was under obligation, and bound in justice, to bestow favors on the Jews, to render them partakers of the kingdom of the Messiah, to justify and render them eternally happy; and that he could not condemn any of them." Jahn's Archaeology, § 419. But of the wicked, by whom they must have principally meant the Gentiles, they believed, "that their souls, as soon as separated from their bodies, were transmitted into a state of everlasting woe, there to suffer the punishment of their sins to all eternity." Prideaux's Connexions, Vol. 3, p. 46. Now, in these positions, they set forth a God of infinite partiality, of monstrous cruelty, and of the broadest injustice. Is the existence of such a God, proclaimed by the sacred writers? If this is the God of the Scriptures, where is Universalism? My Bible speaks of no such Being. Yet the Pharisees held to such a God.—Did our Saviour reserve this point in their faith for the belief of his disciples? And because there is no infinitely cruel, partial, and unjust God in the universe, does it follow that the all-gracious, benevolent and just Father, who is said in the Bible, to be the God of love, has no existence? It must be a mighty syllogism which convinces me of the truth of such "fallacious reasoning."

Your correspondent refers to the Pharisaic belief in the "existence of the spirit." He refers to Acts xxiii: 8, where it is stated that they believed both in angel and spirit. By using the word "spirit" alone, and coupling it with another portion of his article, I suppose that your correspondent alludes to their faith in a resurrection. If he meant to embrace their faith in the existence of angels, I remark, that they believed, according to Jahn, that there are a multitude of evil angels in the other world. The Scriptures say nothing of such beings.—They stated that one angel is uncreated. The Scriptures do not speak of two uncreated Beings. If there is an uncreated angel, he must be co-equal and co-eternal with God. Their views of the resurrection were equally fabulous. Their resurrection was connected with endless misery; and those who were the subjects of it, they believed, "at times made their re-appearance upon the earth to vex men with epilepsy, mental derangement, madness, and melancholy." They believed that the good, in that resurrection, "received rewards, and at length passed into other human bodies." Jahn, Sec. 388. Is this the resurrection which Christ and his apostles taught? If so, what becomes of the fact, that all the subjects of the Bible resurrection, were to be as the angels of God? I know that their faith in a resurrection, is alluded to in the New Testament—but I have yet to learn, that the sacred writers have sanctioned that resurrection as true and divine. Did our Saviour, then, except their faith in a resurrection connected with the transmigration of souls, as a point, which the disciples might believe, instead of rejecting? And if their fable on the subject, is not true, does it follow, that there is no resurrection whatever, and that the faith which the Scriptures inspire on this point, so reasonable in itself, and so strongly proved, is also untrue. So "S." seems to reason, and so my friend A. B. G. seems to endorse. But I must be excused from following that "fallacious reasoning," which, because a fable is untrue, deprives truth of existence. We might as well affirm that because endless misery is false, therefore Universalism is equally false.

Your correspondent also involves the truth of the Old Testament Scriptures, in the argument which he opposes. In my humble judgment, those Scriptures do not properly belong this subject. We frequently speak of a distinctive doctrine being erroneous, without intimating that the Bible is false, from which it professes to derive its proof. When we question the doctrine which constitutes a mass of people a separate sect, it is not understood that the Bible has anything to do with that questioning, so far as its divine origin is concerned. The Pharisees, though they professed to adhere to the Old Testament, yet virtually denied it by their fables and traditions. Hence when our Saviour warned his disciples against their doctrine, he warned the disciples against the doctrine which constituted the Pharisees a distinctive sect. If I am correct in these views, then the syllogisms of your correspondent are founded on false premises, and have no real bearing on the question.—And I must say, that if our faith in God, in the resurrection, in the destiny of man, in religion, and in the existence of "creation," depends on the truth or falsity of the Pharisaic doctrine, it rests on a slender foundation.

But all this may be "fallacious." If so, I shall be glad to be corrected. If it is "fallacious," allow me to propose a few questions. If our Saviour did not warn his disciples against the Pharisaic views of God, of the resurrection, and of endless misery, as well as against their false moral principles, what did he warn them against? Did he except endless misery?—and if so, where is such reservation to be found? Where, in the New Testament, is a distinction made, as to the true or false in their doctrine? And if such a distinction is made, does the warning have no bearing against endless misery?

Yours, in fraternal love,

Auburn, Dec. 23, 1842. G. W. MONTGOMERY.

MORAL SUBJECTS.

Our brethren "down East" are troubled and divided about the subjects proper for discussion and resolution in our Associations and Conventions. For years past, resolutions have been passed on temperance, mourning apparel, capital punishment, etc. Of late our Anti-slavery brethren have insisted on introducing the subject of American Slavery, in some shape or form, for condemnation. The result is, no little excitement, some discussion, and great diversity of opinion. One is for allowing the discussion of any subject—another for discussing those subjects, only, on which the whole denomination are agreed. One is for discussing all moral questions, and all subjects that have moral bearings and relations; and another, seeing that this would introduce every question and subject under heaven, proposes to introduce those questions only that involve measures for the better organization of our ecclesiastical bodies, and the spread of our sentiments. One appeals for precedent to our past action on temperance, capital punishment, etc.; and another condemns that past course as having been entirely wrong, out of our proper line of business, etc.

Now, in this subject itself, there is much of interest and importance to every Universalist. For the first time, I believe, the question has arisen, What is the proper sphere of action—the proper subject of legislation—for our Associations and Conventions? Where shall we stop? What are our limits? To what point shall contraction extend, if we must draw back? These are weighty and important questions, and must soon agitate our public bodies all over these United States. For with the increasing dislike to Slavery, at the North generally, and the injudicious course of our Southern brethren in resolving and printing on the subject as they have done, the question is fairly before us, and we must decide, sooner or later, whether our ecclesiastical bodies have any thing to do with such questions. This will start the ball, (indeed, in some sections our Associations have taken up the matter already,) and resolutions may be introduced on forms and ceremonies, declaring one party right, and the other wrong; and from thence it may be extended to doctrines, until a very pretty "system of divinity" is framed, to be taught by our Professors of didactic, dogmatic and polemic theology, in our future Walnut cracker theological seminary! I do not say this will be done—though a part of it has already been done, and the rest must follow if the course begun is consistently pursued to a conclusion—for it will conclude Universalism with a vengeance!

But what rule or limitation would you propose? I have none in particular to offer. If there is a real, hearty love for Universalism, and a proper respect to the feelings of the brethren, and common sense among the members of our councils, we will need no arbitrary rules and regulations; but if each one is determined to get his peculiar notions, likings, or hobbies endorsed by some Convention or Association, without regard (or only a secondary regard) for the cause, or caring for the rights and feelings of his brethren, then rules and regulations will be of but little use. The life will be extinct, and it matters little how the dead body is governed!

But some may talk of the moral relations and bearing of subjects. It is said that when the "cute Bostonians" wanted to enlist community in some rail-road they had in prospect, they addressed circular letters to all the clergy along the route, accompanied with gratis tickets, (powerful arguments!) persuading them that the rail-road plan had moral aspects and bearings, and would be productive of moral results; and requested them to preach on the subject. The clergy were convinced en masse, (who could resist the gratis tickets?) and preached lustily on the moral influences of rail-roads—stock went off rapidly—the road was made—and the Boston speculators are probably reaping a very fair per centage of profit on their gratis passengers. So true is it, that lending to the Lord (his clergy) does not impoverish!!! But in "wicked York State," where they exclude clergymen, negroes and idiots from holding office, the rail-road corporations are cursed with the spirit of blindness to their real interests. They have property, and so give free tickets to the lawyers. But as corporations have no souls, they do not see the necessity of bestowing gratis tickets on the clergy, and consequently the laity have not yet been enlightened in regard to the moral bearings and relations of rail-roads, and our ecclesiastical councils have never been asked to pass resolutions requiring people to travel in cars and packet boats for the improvement of their morals!

In short, there is no help for our cause but in a greater exercise of its spirit, and an increased regard for its prosperity among our brethren. Universalists are not apt to be won over to any measures by force-work, or resolutions passed against their wills and opinions by public bodies.

CHRISTMAS EVE

Was celebrated by most of our societies in this section, and indeed in almost every section from which we have received information. In some places the day was also celebrated with particular ceremonies. Where there were Sunday schools, they were made to take a prominent station in the affair.

In this city, the Fair got up by our Sunday-school went off very well. The audience was much pleased with the show of trinkets and refreshments, and satisfied themselves in their purchases. The children were also delighted, particularly with the profits of the experiment, which amounted to about forty dollars—sufficient to re-furnish their library with an excellent assortment of new books, after repairing the old ones.

In Ford's Bush Br. Anderson officiated happily for his audience. The house was never before crowded so full of hearers. St. Nicholas could not have squeezed the stem of his pipe between any two of the audience, they were so completely jammed together!

In Clinton they decorated and illuminated their house, and Br. Soule gave them an excellent discourse. Br. Skinner officiated in Canaseraga, (Sullivan,) and we hear they had a good time.

REMOVAL.—Br. J. H. Sanford, of Deerfield, Livingston county, Mich., has removed to Kensington, Oakland county, Mich., where he wishes to be addressed hereafter. He is constantly and acceptably preaching the Gospel of the great salvation in the counties of Oakland and Livingston, and the good cause is now again prospering in his hand.

NEW AGENTS.—Eri Denning, Esq., of Edmeston, N. Y.; A. Hunt, at Denmark, N. Y.; and Seth W. Fenton, at Waddington, N. Y., in place of E. Meigs, Esq., resigned.

SOUND DOCTRINE.—We will feel very grateful to correspondents who will furnish us with a number of brief, pithy articles of a doctrinal character. We do not care about their being controversial, though error must frequently be removed before truth can advance. But we most need plain, strong exhibitions and proofs of prominent doctrinal points—especially of those that are the foundations of human duty and hopes. We have not had many such articles for a few years past; and as now seems to be a time of pretty general inquiry, we think they will do good to many of our readers, and enable them to do good to others. Come, brethren and sisters who are well qualified for this work, let your light shine in our Magazine! Others will pursue their labors, and thus we shall have a good variety in our pages.

A. B. G.

The Partialist clergy appear to be getting "the old fits" on them again—seduction, fraud, inhumanity, etc. The Methodists in Cincinnati, Ohio, appear to have their hands full, with the inhuman and licentious conduct of some of their pious preachers. And in Lowell, Mass., the Free will Baptist Corporation, after persuading poor girls and widows to vest their money in their hands, have burst, and will not pay 50 cents in the dollar. Some heart-rending cases of suffering by this religious swindling, are narrated in the papers; and public indignation may yet find a way to bring the revered and other pious "evangelists" to an account here for "deeds done in the body." What says Luther Lee's "Sword of Truth" (Dirk of Defamation) at this new proof of the awful licentiousness of Universalism?—for surely this misfortune would not have happened to the Baptists, had there not been two Universalist churches, (and the beginning for a third,) in that city.

THE NAUTILUS, or, Tales of the Sea, Including a full and circumstantial account of the Mutiny of the U. S. Brig Somers, and the execution of three ringleaders, written expressly for the New World. This work will be very interesting—full of thrilling Adventures and Incidents in a sea-faring life—accounts of Shipwrecks, Mutinies, Tales of Piracy, &c.

It will be issued in a Double Extra New World, on Wednesday, Jan. 11, at twelve and a half cents single copies—ten copies for $1.00. Address J. Winchester, 30 Ann-street, N. Y.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

Dedication.—The Union meeting house erected in Newport, Herkimer county, by the Unitarians and Universalists, will be dedicated to the worship of God on Wednesday the 25th inst. It is expected that the dedication sermon will be preached by Br. M. B. Smith, of that place; that ministers of each denomination will be present and aid in the services, and that the meeting will continue two days. The public is invited to attend.

Dedication and Conference.—A Conference of the Chenango Association will be held at Smithville Plats, Chenango county, on Wednesday and Thursday, the 25th and 26th inst.; at which time the Universalist church recently erected in that place, will be dedicated to the worship of God. Dedication sermon by Br. Skinner or Br. Grosh. Ministering and other brethren are requested to attend.

Conference, Installation, &c.—The second Conference of the Otsego Association will be held in Ford's Bush, (Minden,) on the third Wednesday and Thursday in January (18th and 19th)—when Br. G. W. Anderson will be installed as pastor of the society in said place. Installation sermon by Br. A. C. Barry. Ministering brethren, friends and the public are invited to attend.

N. B.—A report of the Committee recently appointed on the subject of an "Itinerating Association" will be brought before the Conference. O. WHISTON, Standing Clerk.

A Conference of the Black river Association will be held in Dexter on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday in January. A general attendance, particularly of ministering brethren, is confidently expected. P. MORSE, Henderson, December 19th, 1842. Standing Clerk.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.
LINES

Suggested by the strange appearance of the sky, Nov. 14, 1837.

BY MRS. M. B. BIRDSALL.

Twilight was deepening fast o'er lovely earth,
The golden hues of sunset's glorious hour
Were fading from the sky, and in the west
The star of evening shone with brilliancy,
Scarce ever equalled.
At our cottage door, I stood in silence
Gazing on the scene; first to the lovely west
I turned my eye, then to the horizon,
To mark the glittering stars that to the sight
Emerg'd in quick succession.

Suddenly I saw,
In the far north, a streak like livid fire;
It swift extended through the blue expanse,
Till the whole vault of heaven seemed in a blaze.
The stars glowed with a light unnatural,
The face of nature wore an aspect strange,
All things seemed altered, as we wond'ring gazed.

But the phenomenon now changed its form;
From the far north and west, the east and south
Came forth those streams of brilliancy so fair,
And slowly rising from the opposing points,
They in the zenith met; pure, dazzling white
Mingled at intervals with the bright rays
Of deep'ning crimson, till the spectacle
Was grand, beyond description.
Swiftly it faded, and the sky now wore
Its wonted hue of blue, fair to behold,
And the stars twinkled gaily, as before
The strange appearance came; for a short space
The prospect wore its own bright natural face,
But soon it reappeared, and doubly bright,
It seemed as if its transient absence had been spent,
In gathering brighter hues, to dazzle more
The wond'ring eyes of those, who, silent gazed Upon the beauteous sight.
At length it vanished, and was seen no more.
Those brilliant colors faded from the sight
And left us filled with awe, and wonder deep;
And as my mind was occupied with thoughts,
Of what the cause could be of the strange sight;
'Twas led to turn unto the Great First Cause
Of all things, and I thought that He who form'd
Such glorious, lovely scenes, as that, which yet
Had scarcely faded from the midnight sky,
Must be beyond, ay! far beyond the ken,
Of us, his worshippers; and that He must Be worthy of the purest homage, which Frail man can render to the God of heaven,
Who placed him on this beauteous, fertile earth,
And showered his blessings forth on all mankind,
Till all are filled with plenitude; and yet
There's blessings still in store, and man should give
The pure incense of praise and gratitude,
To Him, whose hand sustains our feeble frames,
And guides us safe through all the various ills
That checker human life, to realms of peace.

THE SAILOR'S HOME.

BY MISS CELIA M. TIBBITS.

It comes to me in dreams,
With the glad music of its woodland shade—
With the low gushing of its rainbow streams
Far in the forest laid.

It comes with sunlit bowers,
With dark leaves glancing 'neath the deep blue sky—
With the rich fragrance of its countless flowers,
And its low south wind's sigh.

It comes across the waves,
The mystic beauty of my own bright land;
Where the cool streamlets, as with sunlight, lave
Banks by the zephyr fanned.

It comes, my own sweet home,
Lying embosomed 'mid the vine-clad hills,
'Neath rich concave of the heaven's blue dome,
With its unnumbered rills.

It comes, the brave old oak—
Bathing the greensward in its wavy shade,
What bell-like music from its leaflets broke,
When 'neath its boughs I strayed!
And they, the household band,
They that looked on me with their love-lit eyes,
Now call me homeward to my native land,
Where our loved cottage lies.
I go—the ocean's foam
Shall bear me back to the deep forest shade,
To the bright waters of my early home,
And to the flowery glade.

HOME, AND ITS CHANGES.

The following beautiful and touching description of Home, and its changes, as they appear to one who had been absent for some time, we take from a late number of the Balm of Gilead. They are from the pen of Br. G. W. Gage, of Manchester, N. H., formerly of Canandaigua, in this State. He visited his home last Fall, to witness the last illness, death and burial of a young sister, (whose death we noticed a few weeks ago,) and the following is a part of his Editorial Letters in the Balm, while he was thus journeying. The description will be peculiarly interesting to those of our readers who know Br. Gage, or his Home and its inmates.

A. B. G.

Canandaigua, N. Y., October 6th, 1842.

HOME.—The worn mariner turns from the solitudes of the ocean and hails with joy the first visions of his destined haven,—the wasted wanderer of the desert, views afar the long-loved Oasis of the wilderness,—and he hastes with glad shoutings, to taste again its pure waters, to bathe in its living fountains, and to repose himself under its deep shades.

And such to us, is the home of our childhood years. The fields are clothed in lovelier verdure—the trees wear more gorgeous hues—the streams sing a sweeter song in their rocky beds—the birds warble more welcome notes—the landscape slopes and bends with more grace and beauty than elsewhere,—and all things seem to smile at our coming: How thick and thronging are the thoughts of the past,—every tree has its tale,—every nook and dell its story or song,—and even the "Old oaken bucket that hangs in the well," has its legends of yore.

Sickness at home. But time has changed us. The young and the youthful, have gone up to manhood—the middle-aged have trod on still further in paths of toil and trial—the locks of the aged have put on a purer whiteness—and what is sadder still, sickness has smitten a sweet and sunny heart. One it is, that loved the beautiful, the bright, and the fair of earth,—one that lingered long with the flowers—that won and wore their beautiful blossoms—one that oft poured forth the richest melody of music in the soul of song. Now, how changed, and yet how outward—how earthly is the change. The same happy heart is beating there—the same gushing goodness is flowing up from its deep fountains and resting richly on all around. The calm spirit hath clothed itself with strength for this hour of trial,—and no murmurs fall from the lips—no repinings struggle up from the faint hope that still holds on to the earth. All is peaceful and pure—the light of love burns brightly on the altar of the heart,—it is freeing itself from the fickle follies of the world,—it is taking up a robe of beauty and brightness that will never fade away. The harp is still strung—it asks for the voice of song,—and the soothing strains of—'All's well'—fall joyfully from its fainting and faltering strains, and the strife and struggle of life glide gently away from the sight.

Death at home. The Angel-messenger of the Highest, has folded his flashing wings, and stood in the midst of a happy home. But he comes not with bended bow or thirsting spear to do the deeds of the destroyer.—First there is a half-hushed whisper, then a calm, kind voice speaks out and sweetly says—come. There is nothing stern and fearful in this summoning call. It is but the bidding of a higher, better wisdom, to leave this crumbling and falling frame of flesh—to soar with bright wings to the spirit's starry home on high. Hushed be the repinings of those hearts that linger so lonely for a season here. Let us tread now with gentler steps, for mortal dust is slumbering there, and its peaceful presence must hallow all our thoughts. True, it is cold, for it is but clay; but that silent smile is so like life that we must long linger to look upon it. They have told us that death is full of terror, yet this is lovely—this is bright and beautiful as the May-morn of spring-time and flowers.

Funeral at home. The rites of religion are full of the oil and the wine that the heart most needs. The voice of its minister is lifted up—from the word of life he bids us remember our Creator in the days of our youth—to place the heart's affections on Him, when our Sun is rising in its brightness—when the sky is without a cloud. Then he rolls back the tide of years—he leads us to the gates of ancient Nain, and we hear those glad words—'weep not'—that filled and flooded the widow's heart with joy. And these are the welcome words that are now binding up and blessing the sorrowing soul of the world. Fair forms are falling—tears are streaming throughout the wide earth,—but there is a voice that is heard, loud and clear, above this wail of anguish. It speaks of hope to the fearful—of joyful promises to the comfortless,—and of an ever-living life to dying hearts,—and the tears of time are lost in the triumphs of eternity.

The grave at home. This is a fair and sunny hillside—this is a beautiful home for the dust of the departed. And there is an opened grave,—but it is not dark and cheerless as we once thought it was. It has now taken to its bosom the treasure of its trust,—four strong and noble forms have consigned again—"earth to earth—dust to dust"—and the green turf is now resting on it. What so lovely as this little mound of earth? It is a holy resting-place for one who had seen so little of the sin and sorrow of this world. And see! this one near to it, is the grave of THE MOTHER,—for years have perished since she was called. Let them thus softly sleep, and we will bring hither the favorite rose-bush, and pink, and lilacs, and we will teach them to bring forth their beauties to garnish with garlands the silent halls of the dead. We will turn hither with frequent steps, for this is a place we have learned to love. Here we can meet—can shut out the strifes of the heart, and feel that we are children of one Father—God.

Consolation at home. Our little band is gathered again,—but one is gone—'Gone? but not lost!' What rushing thoughts press on the mind, as this truth comes in its soothing sweetness to our wearied spirits. We are led back through the far mists of buried ages, and we hear the words of the BELOVED—'because I live'—ringing out from the silence of the grave,—and that home of darkness has been robbed forever of its gathered gloom. Since then man can not die—he can only lay down this body of death and mount to a world of life. We can give no tears for the gone!

'Mourn we for the dead—for the dearly loved dead—
Who've left us, (how early!) to linger behind?'

No, never—we will mourn but for ourselves,—that no more sunny smiles can fall on our hearts,—that no more warm welcoming can greet us to our earthly home.—But above these things we rise to a more glorious view than eye hath seen or ear heard. A wandering star hath returned to its native sky,—and the constellations of the heavens are sweeping on to the same everlasting abodes. Then you whose burdened hearts have bled,

'Weep not the dear, the blessed dead!

But rather sigh,

That partings, griefs, and cares and strife

Have not been swallowed up of life

And joy on high.'

EXTRACT FROM A FUNERAL SERMON.

BY REV. S. GOFF.

"For which cause we faint not; but though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day."

2 Cor. iv. 16.

Affliction is the common lot of all. This world is one of imperfection, sin and sorrow. Nothing of an earthly nature is stable or enduring. "Passing away" is inscribed upon every thing that pertains to time. We often experience trials which bring sorrow to our hearts; which cause the eye to fill with tears, and the bosom to heave with anguish. Suffering, deep, protracted suffering, is many times the portion of human life. Sickness preys upon our mortal frames, and we linger upon the couch of languishing and disease. The despoiler marks us for his own; we must bid farewell to every thing of earth; lie down in the silent tomb, and sleep the sleep of death. Or, if sickness, suffering, and death are not our own immediate lot, they are the portion of those who are as near and dear to us as our own lives.

Yes, when death is in our midst, there is sorrow, there is anguish, there is mourning. For death severs the holiest ties of our nature. He lays his cold and icy hand upon the loved, the cherished, and the honored—they yield up their breath, and "go the way of all the living." And surviving friends put on the sad habiliments of wo, and weep and mourn for the departed. "Man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets."

Behold the ravages of Death! See there before us, his victim! He has cut down the virtuous, the noble, the generous, and the beloved youth. In the prime of life he has gone—gone to be here no more. And how deep is the wound which death has made, and how sincerely he is mourned and lamented, are but too manifest from the flowing tears of an aged, and widowed mother; an affectionate and beloved brother; kind and tender-hearted sisters; respected and cherished companions; and sympathising friends and neighbors. Surely with the eloquent witnesses now before us, we must be blinded and stoical, indeed, if our hearts do not acknowledge that afflictions do sometimes fall heavily upon the children of men, and they are truly called to weep and to mourn.

That affliction is the lot of humanity, is a truth recognized by the apostle in the context, and even in the text itself. And what afflictions were, the primitive disciple of Jesus knew full well, for of them he had experienced a full share. And how to triumph over them he knew equally as well. And that we too may triumph, when, to us, the hour of trial comes, they have not only left us the precept, but the example also. The early followers of our Saviour were the subjects of the most bitter and relentless persecution. They were opposed in every step of their progress. And much, much were they doomed to suffer from the malice and envy of their enemies. They were persecuted from city to city. They were brought before kings and rulers, and delivered up to councils. They were beaten, scourged and imprisoned. Their lives were continually in jeopardy. Hence the apostle says, "We which live are always delivered unto death." Yea, and many of them did yield up their lives in the cause of God, and for "the testimony of Jesus." And yet they could endure and suffer all in holy triumph, without one murmuring word of complaint. Their faith in the glory and blessedness which immortality would reveal, was so strong that it robbed death of its sting, and the grave of its victory, and enabled them, even in view of the martyr's stake, or the yet more terrible agonies of crucifixion, to exclaim, "We know if the earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." "For which cause we faint not; but though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day." Though trials and afflictions may come; though sorrow may invade our hearts; though our bodies may waste away with racking pains and burning heat; and though the grim monster, Death, may stare us full in the face; yet "we faint not"—our faith is not weakened, or our hope dimmed. But our prospect grows brighter as earth disappears from our view. The darkness of the grave is lit up by the brightness of the resurrection morn; and by the eye of faith we look far across the Jordan of death to the land of eternal sunshine and joy, where all is love, and peace, and heavenly rest, and life eternal.

"Then, while ye hear my heart-strings break,
How sweet the minutes roll!
A mortal paleness on my cheek,
But glory in my soul!"

Oh the blessedness of a faith, and the triumph of a hope like this! Who would not "rejoice in tribulation," if he could thus triumph over it? Who would not "fight the good fight of faith," if he could thus come off "conqueror, yea, and more than conqueror, through him that loved us, and gave himself for us?" feeling that his "light afflictions which are but for a moment, will work for him a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

"Such is the hope which cheers the heart;
This hope the Lord hath given;
His spirit is the earnest now,
And seals our souls for heaven."

If, then, such is the power of Gospel faith, and such the triumph of the Gospel hope, we would earnestly and affectionately entreat the hearer to exercise the one, and cherish the other. Life is uncertain. Death will sooner or later come. And we know not how near may be his approach. His dart may even now be fixed in the heart of one or more of this assembly; and before another year, or month, or even week is past, some one of our number may be borne to the silent mansions of the dead. We know not to whom the summons may first come. It may be to ourselves; or, perchance, to some of our near and dear friends. One thing, however, is certain, sooner or later it will come to us all. It therefore becomes us to "watch and be sober," that our departure may be peaceful and triumphant. Oh, then, dying fellow-mortals, seek, and seek earnestly, for the faith and the hope of the Gospel. Be this the burden of your prayer,

"Oh for a strong and lasting faith,
To credit what Jehovah saith;
To hear the message of his Son,
And call the joys of heaven my own."

And give not over till you find answers of peace to your waiting, anxious souls. Then, when the hour of trial shall come, you too may say, in view of the blissful prospect which immortality presents to your spiritual vision,—"For which cause we faint not; but though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day."

We are not thus earnest in urging upon you the necessity of faith in God, and hope in heaven, because we suppose you can purchase immortal bliss by so doing, or because we believe this to be the reward of faith and obedience. No. Faith can not purchase heaven; nor is immortality the reward of good works. Our future blessedness depends alone upon the rich mercy and free grace of God. It is the free, unmerited, and unpurchased gift of infinite and eternal Love. For thus saith the testimony:—"This is the record, that God hath given unto us eternal life, and this life is in his Son."

Why, then, it may be asked, do you urge the necessity of repentance, faith and hope? Because, dear hearer, we wish you to live in peace, and die in triumph. We do not wish you to go down to your graves; "all your life-time subject to bondage through fear of death." We wish you to know—to realize, that mortality may not only be submitted to, but triumphed over; that Jesus has conquered death; and that through him you may come off conqueror, shouting, "O death where is thy sting? O grave where is thy victory?" And we have no warrant to assure you that this blessedness will be yours, unless you live the Christian life, possess and exercise the Christian faith and hope. Nay, we know that without these, such can not be your happy privilege. And hence our earnestness in calling your attention to this important subject.—And God grant that our call may not be in vain.

In the sickness and death of him whose mortal remains are now before us, we have an instance of the power of Christian faith, and of the "strong consolation" afforded by the Gospel hope. These two inestimable Christian characteristics were the possession of our departed brother. His faith in God was strong, and his hope bright. And although in the full bloom of youth, with the brightest prospects before him, and respected and beloved by all who knew him, he was unmoved at the approach of death. His mind was calm and serene,

"And not a wave of trouble rolled Across his peaceful breast."

He was perfectly resigned; and ready to depart whenever the Master should call. Yea, at times he was anxious to go—to leave the earth and go home to heaven. Of him it might be truly said; "though the outward man perished, yet the inward man was renewed day by day." Oh that the same confidence and holy trust may be ours.

In this instance, too, is afforded a triumphant refutation of that oft-repeated saying, that the doctrine of God's illimitable grace and universal salvation "will do to live by, but not to die by."—This faith was our brother's in life. It was his consolation in sickness. Nor did it forsake him in the hour of dissolution. But it sustained him to the last. We saw, and conversed with him but a few days before his death. We asked him if he had any hopes of recovery. He said, none at all. We then inquired if he felt at ease in his mind. "Oh, perfectly, perfectly," was the unhesitating response. We reminded him of the saying which we have repeated, and remarked that if it were the will of God, we hoped it would be triumphantly refuted in his death. "Oh," said he, "if I have my reason that question is already decided." So strong was his confidence in the unfailing goodness and mercy of God, that he was fully persuaded that the faith that had sustained him thus far, would sustain him to the end. Such being the solemn truth, if there is a person within the sound of our voice who has ever made use of this objection to our most holy faith, we pray you to remember the life, the sickness, and the death of him we now mourn, and never, never again repeat that inconsistent and contradictory declaration, "Universalism will do to live by, but not to die by."

A few words more, and we close. We feel that we should be recreant to duty, did we not improve this opportunity to impress upon the youth the importance of an early acquaintance with the religion of Jesus Christ. Your prospects may now be bright, and the pathway appear all fair and sunny before you. So it was with your fellow youth, your departed associate, but a few months ago. But to him the hour of trial came. All his fair prospects were blasted; he was prostrated upon the couch of sickness; he has "paid the debt of nature," and gone down to the tomb. To you, the hour of trial will also come—not so soon, perhaps, as it did to him—but come it will, sooner or later. Oh, then, heed the admonition, "Be ye also ready." Death did not take your friend by surprise. He was prepared to meet the victor, and through faith in the Redeemer, to triumph over him. And while he lay upon the bed of sickness and death, the reflection, that in health he had investigated the subject of religion, and became satisfied that he was perfectly safe in the hands of his heavenly Father, was a source of unspeakable satisfaction to him. Oh, then, my young friends, imitate his example, and "remember your Creator in the days of your youth." Then you will be prepared for life, or for death, and whenever the summons comes, it will find you ready and willing to depart.

"In the soft season of thy youth,
In nature's early, smiling bloom,
Remember thy Creator, God;
For him thy nobler powers employ;
Make him thy Fear, thy Love, thy Hope,
Thy Confidence, and highest Joy.
He shall defend and guide thy course
Through life's uncertain, stormy sea,
Till thou art landed on the shore
Of glorious immortality."

ORTHODOX HEAVEN.

BY REV. U. CLARK.

We have often thought it would be a singular place, and one not much to be preferred above earth. "No change after death," say they, and at the same time declare that God will change so as to cease all regard for a portion of his children—Christ will change, and the saints will change, from pity and compassion, to coldness and even hatred towards the lost. And yet we are told there is "no change after death"! If we take the whole system we shall find no inconsistencies or contradictions here; for we are told that reason must not be exercised. Hence there is only an apparent contradiction or two, which looks perfectly consistent when we look aside from reason and common sense, through the mysterious telescope of Orthodoxy!

The following extract from the Oberlin Evangelist shows, however, that some folks are beginning to doubt the comfortableness of an Orthodox heaven, under the supposition of no after death change. We are glad that the Evangelist sees the propriety of making these remarks previous to the suppositions of a Mohegan Indian:

"If the conduct of sectarians here, is an earnest of what their enjoyment will be hereafter, they will indeed have a scanty place—if God should treat them in heaven, as they treat their brethren on earth, heaven would afford them very little liberty or enjoyment."

"Supposing you get to heaven, the Lord Jesus ask you who you be: you say you are a Presbyterian. Then he say, you set there on that little seat: and there you stay; don't you go any where else; keep your place. Another come to heaven: he ask, who are you? He say I am a Baptist. Then you set there on that little narrow seat, let no one sit nor eat with you, nor come near you: keep all your singing and rejoicing to yourself. [The Indian here alludes to the close communion Baptists.] Another come. He say, who are you? He say, I am a Methodist. Then he say, you sit in that corner, and let one stand and keep all away who do not make as much noise as you do in your worship. Another come. He say, who are you? He answer, I am a Quaker. Then Christ say, you sit away out yonder alone, that the noisy one may not disturb you."

Had the Indian added to the scene a specimen of Oberlin Institute lynch discipline, a few Elder Knapps, with the long tables for feasting on roast beef, &c., a few of the scenes exhibited in Presbyterian Assemblies, Methodist Conferences, church trials and controversies, protracted and camp meetings, &c., an orthodox heaven would have been complete, all except the joyful shouts and hallelujahs of the saints over the victims of hell!

We are almost compelled to disbelieve that any man of sensible mind can entertain opinions leading to such monstrous absurdities. And yet such are the opinions expressed in the no-after-death-change assertion. No other than the Indian's conclusion can be drawn from the premise. Reasonable men will reflect upon these things, and learn, hence, that "we shall all be changed—that this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal shall put on immortality."

SIR HENRY VANE.

A better service could scarcely have been rendered to the youth of our country, than the publication of the "Lives of eminent Men"—a work in three volumes, published under the auspices of the "Board of Education" in Massachusetts. Circumstances of time and place, combine to make some of these biographies much more interesting than others; but all of them are highly valuable, as the individuals are identified with the history of the United States. The reader sees more of the characters of these extraordinary men, through this medium, than he could ever learn from general history; and he will learn some particulars of great importance in relation to them, as surprising and gratifying, as they are worthy of attentive consideration. This is especially the case in the biography of Sir Henry Vane, by C. W. Upham. Of this great man, much less is generally known, than of most other American worthies—and some of the most remarkable features of his character and life, appear to have almost escaped observation.

Sir Henry Vane was one of the devoted religionists who sought an asylum in the wilds of America, from the proscription, and perfidy, and cruelty, of their countrymen in Europe. He was alike eminent for station and patriotism, and for his zeal, piety and liberality. Descended from one of the most distinguished families in England, surrounded by all the elegancies and allurements of wealth, associated with the great and powerful, and having a right to expect any distinction that court-favor could confer—we still find him at a very early age, openly espousing the cause of the Puritans, and with them seeking a home and a country in Massachusetts. This might be supposed a precipitate and unadvised measure, were it not abundantly evident, that it was the result of mature and deliberate reflection. The spirit of the times drew the devoted attention of even the young to the subject of religion; and had induced him as well as others, to employ the ample means and opportunities at his disposal to the choice of a creed and the adoption of a religious profession.

Until this period, the reformation in England, had been conducted, rather as a matter of state, than of individual concern. The king, the nobles and dignitaries of the church, had managed the spiritual, as they did the temporal affairs of the people—without consulting them. But now after the several revolutions and counter revolutions, in which the Protestants and Catholics have successively ruled and been ruled, alternately persecuting and persecuted, the whole English mind turned to the consideration of religion. Tired of the emptiness of popery, and utterly disgusted with the less imposing ritual of the establishment, the people firmly repudiated both; and sought a religion of spiritual power rather than of ostentation. The long recognized symbols of religion were ridiculed into contempt, and its ferocious spirit and its unprincipled champions held up to abhorrence. The Puritans arose, and multiplied, and sent their influences abroad over the whole land. They were in the court, the camp, the city, the country, and at the fire-side of every family. Their indomitable spirit, their ardent zeal, their ghostly phraseology, and their moral sentiments, were almost universally diffused over the nation. Debates in parliament were conducted in the godly cant terms of the conventicle—pious exhortations mingled in the transaction of ordinary business, and nothing was undertaken without fasting and prayer, or accomplished, without special thanksgiving.

This was the age that produced Sir Henry Vane. And it is matter of no surprise, that like others, he was a devotee to religion, as well as a politician: or that seeing, as he must have done, the hollow heartedness of the minions of the court, the sincerity of his own young heart, should have placed him in the ranks of the Puritans. But it is most surprising, that in an age when both Papists and Protestants limited the grace of God to the members of their own party, he should have maintained the salvation of both; and that when every sect in power deemed it right to persecute all others, he should advocate universal toleration.

His tolerant principles were not alone displayed in quiet speculations of the closet, but in the most substantial form. And when he might have looked on in safety and without reproach, he periled his popularity and his character, not to say, his personal safety, for the rights of conscience. He sacrificed much reputation with the colonists, while Governor of Massachusetts, for the countenance and protection which he gave to the famous Mrs. Hutchinson, whose opinions rendered her obnoxious to the government as well as the clergy. True, he evidently favored her views; but the noble and manly stand which he took in respect to a law subsequently passed regulating the establishment of strangers in the province, leaves no room to doubt the genuineness of his principles. This law, the object of which was to prevent the future introduction of heresy—to make the magistrates of every parish responsible for the religious opinions of its whole population—he denounced as an unwarrantable violation of human rights, and as more exclusive and oppressive than the Mosaic dispensation.

But his views respecting the liberty of conscience, are not alone derived from his conduct, or his writings while in America. After his return to England, he vindicated the same principles in the same open and fearless manner under circumstances of peril and obloquy, from which his silence would have effectually screened him. Why then was he not silent? Why did he not suffer public opinion and the laws to perform their work without opposition or remonstrance? Plainly, because in his view, it was wrong to do either. No other reason can be assigned. And it is surely enough to prove the catholicism of any reputed Calvinist, when he takes it upon him to defend the rights of conscience of a Unitarian. This was done by Sir Henry Vane!

There is another feature in the religious character of this extraordinary man, deserving of particular consideration. It is highly probable, that he was a believer in universal salvation. The reference to that fact by his biographer, may not have attracted the attention of Universalists; nor is it known, that they have ever claimed him as a fellow believer. But that he was more than suspected of believing in the Restitution, is very distinctly asserted: and it is rendered morally certain, by other circumstances not easily explained on any other supposition. His connexion with the Calvinists of that period, is by no means sufficient to neutralize the evidence of his Universalism. For it is well known that others held that view of salvation under similar circumstances; and that too, while filling places of great responsibility. This was especially the case with Jeremy White, chaplain to Cromwell, whose sound orthodoxy does not appear to have been impeached on that account. So that Universalism was plainly not incompatible with the most rigid and determined Puritanism.

His views of toleration were every way in accordance with the spirit of Universalism. They are characteristic of that doctrine, and inseparable from it; and therefore, indispensable to the consistency of its profession. It is not to be denied, that other sects have learned to practice upon tolerant principles: but this is by no means a necessary consequence of their religious views. Humanity pleads with what of Christian charity they possess; and softens the rigors, and stays the hand of persecution. And it is well, that with opinions which disclaim all sympathy or charity for heretics, there are yet influences at work which effectually exclude the fierceness of sectarian zeal, and the horrors of the dungeon and the stake.

The more direct evidence of the Universalism of Sir Henry Vane, is contained in the following extract, which is all that our limits will permit. His biographer says—"He regarded Christianity as a spiritual religion, the vital essence of which resides in the hearts of its followers; and he indulged the benevolent and liberal belief, that the moral and spiritual excellence, which is the substance of true religion, might be found in the minds and characters of Gentiles and Jews; and that wherever it existed, it marked its professor as a Christian, although living in an age and country where the name of Christ had never been heard. He therefore did not dare to exclude even the heathen from his charity, for fear that he might, in so doing, shut out those whom Christ, the great Head of the church, would at the final day, acknowledge and welcome as his own."

The above remarks merely introduced a quotation from a work of Sir Henry's, entitled "Retired Man's Meditations," part of which follows. "And although they may in that respect, (want of exercise of their spiritual senses,) seem to be men in the flesh, yet they may live according to God in the spirit, and find acceptance in the beloved One; whilst they themselves may either be without law, exercising a chaste natural conscience, or may be under the law, believers so zealous of the law, as to fly in the face of Paul himself, for witnessing a higher light than they have yet experience of, or can bear."

The following observation of Dr. Burnet, is nearly decisive on this subject. He says—"His (Vane's) friends told me, he leaned to Origin's notions of a universal salvation of all, both of devils and the damned, and to the doctrine of pre-existence. The friends of any man, may be supposed to know his opinions, nor can they have any motive for misrepresenting them. And when an enemy states them on such authority, at a time and under circumstances which admit of correction, he is entitled to credit. We therefore believe that Sir Henry Vane was a Universalist.

OUR SCHOOL MISTRESS.

To the sensitive, there are many bright spots to which fond memory loves to turn, and recall scenes long since past, but which will ever retain a place in our affections for the pleasing and happy emotions which they did, and still do excite, and for which we have reason to be ever grateful. There are individuals too, whom we can never recollect but as choice spirits sent to an unfeeling world, to remind us of heaven, its purities and high intellectual enjoyments, and whose genial influence has twined around our hearts, until we feel that we are happier and better for having been with them.

One of these was our School Mistress, Miss L. Mistress I choose to call her, let the appellation sound old fashioned as it may; it is a true one, for she was mistress of our affections and our wills, and drew us by an indefinable charm, to yield implicit obedience to her wishes and requirements. We felt ourselves grieved when she was troubled; for troubled she was as are all others, who labor for the benefit of their kind, who feel the responsibility which devolves upon them as moral and intellectual beings, and who act from principle, and endeavor to induce others to do the same.

Some called her an old maid, and said she would be one; but we could not believe this a reality, as she had none of those whimsical fancies and odd conceits, which so generally characterize that class. She fulfilled alike faithfully the situation of teacher, mother, guardian and playmate; and never were we more gratified than when we could induce her to spend a few moments in our rooms, and relate some anecdote, tell some interesting story or exchange thoughts and feelings with us. The rich and accomplished were no more her favorites than the poor and humble, but worth, true worth and a willingness to improve, alone received her approbation and meed of praise.

Would you inquire if she was handsome? Then we answer, yes; though she had neither fluttering ringlets, rosy cheeks, brilliant eyes nor a snow white neck; neither sylph like form moving as some airy being, nor a small white hand too delicate for use; yet she was "the beauty," for

"'Twas goodness that gilded her brow,

Like the sun on the fruit of an autumn bough;"

and truly and easily

'Could we read her heart, like an opening book, Through each change serene of her innocent look."

I am not alone in my praise of her. Many, very many are the minds which have been instructed, and hearts warmed and cheered by her love and friendship, and though she has "cast her bread upon the waters," yet her influence is still with us, and our ardent prayers shall ascend to Heaven, that its choicest gifts be hers while on earth, and at last may angelic beings guide her to the Paradise of God; there may she see those whom she has instructed, enter its shining portals with purer hearts, and receiving brighter crowns for having been with her.

BEAUTIES OF MODERN THEOLOGY.

It is very noticeable, that, while on the whole, the science of theology has made very marked and rapid advances toward the region of common sense, within a few years past, we yet meet, occasionally, with specimens of a way of writing and speaking, which Calvin himself would have denounced as barbarous, and from which Edwards would have shrunk with disgust. Is it, that, determined to be very orthodox in spite of the tendencies around them, men rush into such extravagances as the following from a late New York Observer, where it is presented to the religious public as a select morsel, specially suited for the nourishment of the soul?

The subject is the crucifixion, and the writer, (Krummacher,) quotes the text, Romans iii: 25—"Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God,"—of which he gives the following remarkable exposition. "Do you hear? Calvary is a scene of vengeance, the cross a gibbet, and the bleeding form upon it a living proof of the retributive justice of God. My God! how well art thou able to demonstrate thy honor." So "set forth a propitiation," then, is considered by this interpreter, equivalent to a display of vengeance," to "declare God's righteousness for the remission of sins," means to inflict punishment for sin; and the "forbearance of God signifies the retributive justice of God." The force of exegesis can go no farther in interpreting an idea into a passage, instead of a meaning out of it.

And what an idea! Many persons will remember the burst of pious horror sent up in all quarters, when Dr. Channing, in his famous New York sermon, represented the orthodox view of Christ's death as a punishment inflicted on him by God, as setting up "a central gallows" in the midst of the universe. It was declared to be a misrepresentation and caricature of orthodoxy. But here we perceive in a leading orthodox print, published in the very same city, the very same representation of their own doctrine, in nearly identical language! According to the gospels, the death of Christ, was a display of God's love. Every where the apostles in contemplating the scene, cry out, "Herein is love!" Not so the New York Observer—not such the visions which meet the eye of orthodoxy in gazing upon Calvary. They see not there the tender mercies of God. "Herein," they cry, "is vengeance!" They do not say "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son;" but "God so hated sin, that he punished his only begotten Son to vindicate his honor!!!"

SECULAR NEWS.

Another good round sum has been added to the list of defalcations in New York. The defaulter is Mr. Nicholl, and the sufferer is the New York Life Insurance and Trust Company. The exact amount missing is not stated, but upon that subject the directors have adopted the following queer resolve:—"that any loss which the company may sustain, will not impair its capital, nor exceed the sum of Two Hundred and Forty Thousand Dollars."

The Northampton Courier says, that Capt. William Smith, who for the last ten years has been an inmate of the Northampton Alms-house, has just claims against the Government for French spoils, prior to 1800, to the amount of $10,000. In 1798 and '99, he commanded at different times, three vessels, in the cargoes of which he was interested to the amount of $10,000, prime cost—all of which vessels were captured by French privateers, and, with their cargoes, confiscated. The French Government made compensation for these damages more than forty years ago, and the money was used in the purchase of Louisiana. Capt. Smith has sent a petition to Washington, for relief, which is dated at Northampton poor house.

The recent earthquake was experienced at Madison, Indiana, on the 4th inst., about 9 P. M., with such violence that the windows of the houses shook as though struck by a heavy gale of wind. At Louisville, Ky., the shock was also felt about 9 o'clock in the evening. It continued about 30 seconds.

The ladies of Nantucket have paid eight hundred dollars during the last year, for the promotion of the cause of temperance in that town.

At the Cape of Good Hope, the ladies and the sheep are esteemed highly for the same reason. A lean young lady has as little chance of being toasted, as a lean sheep has of being roasted.

Messrs. Conrad and Clanding, Clerks of the High st. Market, Philadelphia, seized during the year, 1398 lumps of butter, 275 lumps of lard, 34 parcels of sausages, 2 quarters and 4 pieces fresh pork; 22 pieces of beef, 8 quarters of mutton, 1 of veal, and 50 tin measures.—The scales and weights seized, sold for $9.16. Two-thirds of the meat, butter, etc., were handed over to the Guardians of the Poor. A fatlaw for the poor of Philadelphia, is that confiscation law.

Several converts of the "battle-axe" doctrine, a most licentious creed, have been lodged in the prison of Chester county, Pa., within a week.

Another effort is in progress in Massachusetts, to obtain an indemnity for the burning of the Ursuline convent.

A very important and difficult surgical operation has just been performed in Boston, by Dr. J. Mason Warren, upon a man from Nantucket. The patient was afflicted with a malignant tumor, in size somewhat larger than a hen's egg, located on the under jaw. In order to reach it, it was necessary to lay open the jaw, by removing the skin, and dissecting from the point of the chin nearly to the ear. After this was accomplished and the arteries carefully secured, the operator applied the saw, and that portion of the jaw-bone to which the tumor was attached was successfully removed.

Dr. Smith of the New England Medical and Surgical Journal, says, "these tight straps under the feet, when the leg is flexed, press the knee-pan, so forcibly into the cavity of the joint, that it is by no means strange there are numerous complaints of weak knees, rheumatic pains, and soreness of the muscles."

President Houston, of Texas, is accused of corresponding clandestinely with Mexico, of misappropriating the public funds, of purloining sundry acts of legislature, and appropriating 100,000 acres of land for the use of the Santa Fe prisoners, besides other equally improper acts.

THE BLIND BOY.

BY MISS HANNAH F. GOULD.

Oh! tell me the form of the soft summer air;
That tosses so gently the curls of my hair!
It breathes on my lip, and fans my warm cheek,
Yet gives me no answer, though often I speak;
I feel it play o'er me, refreshing and kind,
Yet I can not touch it—I'm blind, Oh! I'm blind.

And music, sweet music, oh! where does it dwell?
I sink, and I mount, with its cadence and swell;
While touched in my heart, with its deep thrilling strain,
Till pleasure, till pleasure is turning to pain:
What brightness of hues are in music combined?
Will any one tell me? I'm blind, Oh! I'm blind.

The perfume of flowers that are hovering nigh—
What are they?—On what kind of wings do they fly?
Are not they sweet angels that come to delight
A poor little boy that knows nothing of light?
The sun, moon, and stars never enter my mind,
Oh! tell me what light is—I'm blind, Oh! I'm blind.

THE OBJECT OF LIFE.

BY MRS. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

Have we then no object for which we live? Are we, creatures formed after the image of the great Creator of all things, endowed with minds capable of thinking and reasoning, imbued with feelings susceptible of enjoyment—are we then ushered into this world merely to be blown about like some gossamer thing, by the uncertain winds of chance or of fortune, without an object or an aim in life? Or what is worse, did the great Author of benevolence, form us with feelings thus sensitive, and sensibilities thus acute, merely that those feelings might be easily wounded, and those sensibilities stung with anguish? Were hopes made to animate our bosoms, only that we might keenly feel the bitterness of disappointments; and anticipation after anticipation, of good, made to live in our hearts only that we might know of the sorrow occasioned by their being blighted? In short were we made to taste of life, merely that we might taste of its toils and its sorrows, its privations and sufferings?

Ah no! Let not a thought so degrading to the character of the Disposer of all events, be harbored for a moment within our minds; for without an object for pursuit, we were not made dwellers in this lower world, and for purposes so destitute of enjoyment we were not formed! What then is the object for which we live? The poet has told us in one short line, yet how expressive!

"O Happiness! our being's end and aim."

The Pharisaical religionist will stand back in pretended horror, when you tell him that happiness—that one word which embraces all of peace and joy, all of pleasure and fulness of enjoyment, is the object and end of life; and he will close his ears as at blasphemous sounds, when you tell him that in this world we were placed to be partakers of it. Not so, he will say—this world is but a darkened prison house, where pleasures are placed but as poisonous inducements to lead us to eternal death! Even the pious Christian, who should have "joy and peace in believing," (he will tell you,) has a heavy burden to press him down and a hard cross to bear.

But our faith is not as his faith, neither is our God as his God; for we believe not that the rational gratification of our faculties are but enticements to lure us on to the "infernal pit," neither is obedience to our God a heavy burden or a galling yoke! No, not thus "reads our creed!" On the contrary we believe, that all the faculties which our Almighty Parent has bestowed upon us, were bestowed as the fruitful sources of pleasure and enjoyment in this world. Else why was implanted within our minds so strong a love for the beautiful, if not that this world, so broad and yet so replete with beauty, might yield us gratification; why were sounds so soft and musical wafted to our ears, if not that they might yield us happiness; why were odors fragrant and perfumed, made, if not to add to our enjoyment; and farther, why were desires for friends and friendship ever implanted within our minds, if not that these desires aided by other sentiments, might enable us to "love our neighbors as ourselves," and thereby receive the pleasurable reward; and more than all, why were sentiments which lead us to obey and adore some wise and pure Being, given us, if not that we might love with that "perfect love which casteth out fear," and in so doing, receive that greater recompense than all?

For naught, naught else were these faculties and sentiments bestowed, than that Happiness might be our portion, and though far wiser heads and abler pens than mine have been engaged on this subject, yet so long as I hear proclaimed from the desks, and repeated in the family circles of certain religious sects, the idea that we must combat all our natural inclinations, because of their utter depravity, (though I will not do them injustice, by saying that their practice corresponds with such teachings,) and that to obey God is contrary to our natures, and therefore a great cross—even making the Christian's task greater than that of the sinner's—so long as I hear such ideas as these advanced, I can not refrain from repeating in my own way, arguments which go so far to show the truth of a contrary position. Let us then, instead of being ungrateful, by making those gifts which a benevolent Creator has bestowed upon us, appear of a low and degrading order—show our thankfulness by improving them in the manner which He designed, and which will invariably secure to us a commensurate reward.

EVIL NECESSARY.

BY E. L. DAVIS.

"All nature is but art, unknown to thee;
All chance, direction, which thou canst not see;
All discord, harmony, not understood;
All partial evil, universal good."

The question is often inconsiderately asked, "Why did not God, whose power is equal to his will, when he created the world, so arrange it, that evil could not exist?" With the same parity of reason, might the same person inquire, why did the eternal mind create such inferior animals, as the infusora, the mollusca, and the like?—why did He not create them all men, since man is more dignified in nature?—or, why did He create the material universe at all?—why did He not cause, in its stead, a world of mind, a purely spiritual whole; forasmuch as the latter approximates nearer to his infinite perfections?

The most satisfactory answer that we can give to questions of this character, is, that the Moral Governor of the universe, when he put forth the creative energies of his mind, had an ultimatum in view, which ultimatum is found in Himself, and is the manifestation of his own glory; and most effectually to attain this end, he has commanded into existence, universal nature—essentially the same as we now find it—composed of numerous substances—comprising mind, matter, and the affections of matter—with matter under various combinations and arrangements—existing in an unorganized state, as well as joined vitally in the vegetable and animal kingdoms—and all governed by certain immutably established laws, and constituted in such a manner, that evil is the necessary result of that constitution, being an incidental dependant of matter, necessarily and unavoidably connected with the means employed to attain the infinitely grand ultimatum proposed.

Since evil exists, and could not exist without a cause, let us not foolishly arraign the wisdom of the Deity, for permitting its existence; but rather let us content ourselves with the honest avowal that it exists not in vain, and let us humbly acknowledge our incapacity to conceive the designs of Omnipotence, the mode of whose being we can not even comprehend.

"Weigh well your part, and do your best, Leave to Omnipotence the rest."

For it can not be shown that God, consistently with his infinite perfections, is obliged to prevent the existence of moral evil, originating necessarily in the nature of things; nor the natural evil as its proper punishment; neither can it be proved, nor rendered probable, much less evident, that the greatest possible good will not be found in a world, into which moral evil has admission.

Without evil, there could have been no secular enjoyment; for pleasure without interruption, is no enjoyment at all—without moral evil, man could not have enjoyed even his corporeal existence; for want is the first evil that man experiences, and is indispensably requisite to ensure his being. His first movements are instigated by his wants, and the first impulse he receives, is to preserve his existence. Were it not for this uneasiness, arising necessarily from man's constitution, and instinctively urging him to provide the proper remedies, he would not be apprised of the means of conserving his existence, and would die as the insensible vegetable, unconscious of his being. He would be a mere automaton, without passions, because their gratification implies an evil—without desires, because having no wants, he would have nothing to desire—without will, because that presupposes the existence of desire; and, finally, both his bodily and mental energies would be annihilated, because of the absence of wants to stimulate their activity. He would neither think, will, nor act; but exist in a perfect state of apathy, insensible to all the numerous and manifold pleasures that he now enjoys. The existence of society and sociability would be inconceivable, and that sterling activity, and manly enterprise, that now so strikingly characterize the drama of human action, could exist only as a dream of the imagination. In conclusion, the hypothesis, that solid can exist without extension, would be less repugnant to reason, than the supposition that pleasure can exist in the material world, without evil.

But let it not be supposed, as it too often is by enthusiasts and fanatics, that we live in a barren and miserable world; a world of uninterrupted suffering and sorrow; writhing under the burden of sin, and wretchedness—that we live here, merely in a state of probation preparatory to another state of existence, without a reference to present happiness—that we have no joys to expect, no pleasures to realize, on this side the grave—that Providence can, consistently with his infinite benevolence, confer life upon his creatures, with the unworthy object of making them miserable, or of satiating a malignant revenge—that He can, consonantly with his inconceivable goodness, usher into existence, an endless circle of animated beings, which are unworthy of his notice and kind, parental care. No; let not such disrespectful and foolish views be entertained of an unerring God, who, as a necessary consequence of his infinite attributes, has commanded into being, innumerable living creatures, to participate in the munificent bounties, issuing gratuitously from his ubiquitous throne.

"Heaven may not grant thee all thy mind, Yet say not thou that Heaven's unkind."

Look around and observe the happiness and scenes of pleasure that every where meet the eye;—every earthly being, provided with the means of enjoyment to the full extent of his capacity—all apparently happy and contented with their condition—all beautifully adapted to their respective spheres, with their mental and corporeal energies bent towards the worthy object of conserving their existence, and each individual clinging to life with the utmost tenacity, and rejoicing in his own entity.

The European and American blessed with all the conveniences of life, and surrounded with the din of busy bustle and manly enterprise, are happy, and turn their thoughts, with reverential awe to the Author of their existence—the roving inhabitant of Africa, or the Bedouin of the barren and arid deserts of Arabia, are equally content with their condition, and take pleasure in leading an erratic life, accompanied with camel or courser—the Iclander is also satisfied with his frugal repast, and takes exquisite delight to live with his dog and reindeer, in cold boreal climes, and no motive, however enticing, could induce him to leave his icy mansions. And finally, wherever we notice life, there we see something calculated to excite pleasing emotions, and to inform us that its Author is infinitely good. Whether it be in the possession of the brute of the forest, the insect of the air, the inhabitant of the deep, or even the inconceivably small animalcule of the drops of water, all equally give indications of contentment, and the enjoyment of their existence.

"The learned is happy nature to explore,
The fool is happy that he knows no more;
The rich is happy in the plenty given,
The poor contents himself in the care of Heaven.
See the beggar dance, the cripple sing,
The sot a hero, the lunatic a king,
The starving chemist in his golden views
Supremely blest, the poet in his muse.

Behold the child by nature's kindly law,
Pleased with a rattle, tickled with a straw."

Clinton Liberal Institute.

How touchingly tender and beautiful are the following lines, from the pen of Barry Cornwall:—

Send down thy winged Angel, God!
Amidst this night so wild,
And bid him come, where now we watch,
And breathe upon our child.

She lies upon her pillow, pale,
And moans within her sleep,
Or waketh, with a patient smile,
And striveth not to weep.

How gentle, and how good a child
She is, we know too well,
And dearer to her parent's hearts,
Than our weak words can tell.

We love,—we watch throughout the night,
To aid, when need may be;
We hope—and have despaired, at times,
But now, we turn to Thee!

Send down thy sweet-soul'd Angel, God!
Amidst the darkness wild,
And bid him soothe our souls to-night,
And heal our gentle child!

DREAMS OF THE FUTURE.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

Dreams of heaven, the world of bright and happy spirits, where all is love, joy and peace—with what consolation do they come to the weary of earth! What new impulses have they not infused into the heart of the despairing—what noble purposes of soul have they not awakened in the bosom of many as they journeyed through the world—and what bright hopes and anticipations have they not caused to bud and blossom in the heart of the pilgrim, harbingers of the spirit's rest, telling of the joy that is in reserve for it in the everlasting sabbath of the soul, and cheering it amid the toils and cares of life with the golden promise of the future. Unbidden they rise up before us, greeting the mind's vision, and we call them lovely, we beguile ourselves with them, we wish—yea, we more than wish—we involuntarily say to our souls, this future joy is thine, it shall be realized, all that these enchanting dreams speak of God in his unchangeable loveliness and glory, and man in his future and eternal beauty, shall be brought to pass. We will not believe that we are cheating ourselves with hopes and prospects that will mock us with their emptiness in the end. How guarded we are that nothing shall mar its loveliness and beauty of the scenes before us. We make every thing pleasing to our sight and gladdening to our hearts. There is no well remembered face, loved but lost on earth, that does not rise up before us there in the abode of blessed spirits to greet us with an eternal smile. Upon the fair banks of the river of Peace, the living and departed are gathered together to spend an eternity of bliss. The kind voices which have long been hushed in the silence of death then break forth in melody upon our ears again. The warm pressure of the hand we have so often felt on earth, but now mouldering away, is realized once more. Do we think, as we contemplate these things, dreams though we may esteem them, that they will mock us? No, we will not think so! As we look upon the smiling face—listen to the kind voice and press the warm hand, we do not think how they have been scattered on earth—how they faded away. We behold them all in our bright dreams of the future, gathered in one blessed assembly, as we shall meet them in some happy circle in heaven, where the ties which death has sundered shall again be united, and where those long separated shall meet never to be parted again.

BRISBANE ON ASSOCIATION.

This is a volume of four hundred and eighty pages, devoted to the explanation, illustration and defence of Fourier's system of association: called the social destiny of man.

The reading of this work has been to me a feast of intellectual and moral enjoyment. It is partly a translation from the writings of Joseph Fourier, a Frenchman, and partly original, from the pen of Albert Brisbane, of New York. The social system here presented, is manifestly the production of a powerful intellect, devoted to the service of the most expansive benevolence.

I do not suppose that every reader of this work will rise from its perusal as well satisfied of the soundness, and consequent practicability of the system as I have done: but I think no man who has a taste for scientific investigation, or who feels an interest in the general welfare of mankind, can fail to feel himself richly repaid for all the time and expense that it will cost to give this book a careful reading. I can discover no fallacy in its fundamental principles. Now if the theory of Fourier is not defective, it should be remembered that what is really sound in theory, will prove so in practice. Should this system, when thoroughly tested by practical application, prove to be sound, should it prove to be based on the divinely implanted principles of human nature, it will be found to be more important to mankind—to contain richer blessings for the human race, than any thing else which has been disclosed since the apostolic age. This system is neither Owenism, Brownsonism nor Shakerism. It seeks not to pull down the rich, but to elevate the poor, by introducing a system of attractive, economical and well directed industry; associated with every advantage for intellectual and moral elevation. It seeks no political or other compulsory power to enforce compliance with its rules. It only asks for investigation and a practical adoption, by those who are satisfied of its soundness.

But to conclude, the work under consideration, has no sectarian ends to subserve, either religious or political. The subject of which it treats, is one of vast importance to the whole community. It, of course, belongs to the class of books recommended by the Superintendent, for the School Library. Trustees of school districts would do well, at their earliest convenience, to procure it. Let it be read, for a reading it surely merits. J. FRENCH.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JANUARY 20, 1842.

REVIVAL OF RELIGION....NO. II.

"O Lord, revive thy work in the midst of the years.

HAB. iii: 2.

The impression that we do not believe in revivals of religion, is probably gathered from the fact, that we have ever been opposed to all the popular human schemes and inventions for bringing men and women into the church. Our reliance is upon the Omnipotence of Truth—upon the power and influence with which God has clothed it. Without the aid of any extraneous power, or any machinery whatever, the Gospel at its first introduction prevailed against the sin and wickedness of ages, and renovated thousands of hearts. In the might of its own unassisted energies, it wrought its conquests over the powers of darkness, and bowed the knee of the proudest philosopher. It made those free who were in bondage; it humbled the haughty Pharisee; it lifted up the despised publican; it imparted life to those who were dead in sin; it clothed the naked soul with righteousness; it gave hope to the despairing, and crowned the trembling heart with rejoicing. And has it lost any of its power during the lapse of eighteen hundred years? Rather, is it not increasing in strength, and are not its energies more resistless? It can not be denied. Then why not rely upon the Gospel—which is the power of God unto salvation—in converting sinners? Why not let that do the work? Why not rely upon its influences for bringing men to God?

No one would rejoice more than myself to witness a genuine revival of pure and undefiled religion; for such a one, the condition of society imperiously demands.—I say a genuine revival; because there are those that are spurious, and I will give you some marks by which you may know them.

1. They are characterized by extreme and unnatural excitement. That men should become excited upon subjects of interest and importance, is no ways strange.—There is an excitement attendant upon most pursuits, but it is natural, and perfectly innocent. Not so with that of which we speak. It is produced by frightful and overdrawn pictures of the imagination—by startling appeals to the fears, and by tragic action. And the effect of the excitement thus produced upon those who are the subjects of it is, to unfit them, for the time being, for the discharge of the commonest duties of life. Day after day, and week after week, nothing is thought of, save that which has created this fear of the soul. But were this all, it might possibly be overlooked. It often prostrates the entire nervous system and produces insensibility. I understand, that but a few evenings since, at a meeting in this place, (Fort Plain,) a lady swooned through excitement, and was carried home in that state. Now, I would like to ask, if under the preaching of Christ and his apostles, any such effect was ever produced? Did they ever make such frightful appeals to the passions, as to destroy the balance of the vital energies, and to freeze up the blood in its passage to the heart? Where is the instance recorded? It can not be found. The truth is, the religion of Christ was never designed to produce such effects. In its calm appeals to the human heart, it convinces and persuades, but it never destroys sense and animation.

2. False revivals are marked by extravagance. The very means employed in producing them, are such as never would be used where the dependance was in the righteousness of a cause. Does the pastor of any church consider it necessary or proper, after he has delivered his message on the Sabbath, to promenade the aisles of the house, thrusting his face under ladies' bonnets, and exhorting and threatening by turns, in order to get certain seats occupied? Not at all. And were he to do so, he would be given to understand that such a farce was out of character in the temple of God, and would not be tolerated. But if necessary at one time, why not at all times? If the salvation of souls is dependant in any way upon these means, why not employ them Sabbath after Sabbath? Why abandon them after a few days, when thousands are perishing for want of them? The very fact, that they form no part or portion of the regular weekly service, shows that they are too extravagant and absurd to be used, save on special occasions.

3. Spurious revivals often produce insanity. The poor victims of religious madness, may be found in almost every village in the land. Hundreds—and I might add, thousands, who have gone to the house of God to hear his Word preached, have returned with their intellects blasted, and with the consuming fires of despair burning fiercely at the heart. Instead of hearing the Gospel declared—which it good news to all—they are told that Jehovah is standing with the sword of divine justice uplifted, ready to cut them down and consign them to everlasting perdition. The bottomless pit is uncaped, the flame and smoke ascend, the groans and shrieks of the damned are heard, and their very contortions and convulsions beheld! All the dark and frightful imagery that a gloomy and fanatical mind can grasp, is thrown around this subject; and the hollow, sepulchral voice, and the tragic gesture, are well calculated to add horror to the scene. And no wonder the mind sinks under it. The only marvel is, that ten are not made insane where there is now one. But God knows there are enough as it is. Go, look into our asylums and mad-houses, and they will tell you a tale such as no language can tell. And who or what is responsible for this?—Not the religion of Christ, which breathes peace on earth and good will to man. Not the Gospel, whose "grand moving principle is love to the guilty." Who, then, is responsible? My readers know as well as I do. And they know, too, how very guilty they are, who thus sport and trifle with a human soul!

"—wo for those who trample o'er a mind!

—they know not what they do,

Or what they deal with! Man perchance may bind

The flower his step hath bruised; or light anew

The torch he quenches; or to music wind

Again the lyre-string, from his touch that flew—

But for the soul!—oh! tremble and beware

To lay rude hands upon God's mysteries there!"

THE LAW OF KINDNESS.

In the course of my reading, I occasionally meet with instances which illustrate the Christian Law of Love.—I now present the readers of this paper with a few, which are additional to those given in a book on this subject.

In reference to the cruelties which have grown out of the laws of imprisonment for debt, I was much interested with the following letter taken from Stone's Life of Brant, the famous Mohawk warrior.

Letter from Joseph Brant To ****.

"MY DEAR SIR,

"Your letter came safe to hand. To give you entire satisfaction, I must, I perceive, enter into the discussion of a subject on which I have often thought. My thoughts were my own, and being so different from the ideas entertained among your people, I should certainly have carried them with me to the grave, had I not received your obliging favor. You ask me then, whether in my opinion civilization is favorable to human happiness? In answer to the question, it may be answered, that there are degrees of civilization, from cannibals to the most polite of European nations. The question is not, then, whether a degree of refinement is not conducive to happiness; but whether you or the natives of this land, have obtained this happy medium. On this subject we are at present, I presume, of very different opinions. You will, however, allow me in some respects to have had the advantage of you in forming my sentiments. I was, Sir, born of Indian parents, and lived while young among those whom you are pleased to call savages; I was afterward sent to live among the white people, and educated at one of your schools; since which period I have been honored much beyond my deserts, by an acquaintance with a number of principal characters both in Europe and America. After all this experience, and after every exertion to divest myself of prejudice, I am obliged to give my opinion in favor of my own people. I will now, as much as I am able, collect together, and set before you some of the reasons that have influenced my judgment on the subject now before us. In the government you call civilized, the happiness of the people is constantly sacrificed to the splendor of empire. Hence your codes of criminal and civil laws have had their origin; hence your dungeons and prisons. I will not enlarge on an idea so singular in civilized life, and perhaps disagreeable to you, and will only observe that among us we have no prisons; we have no pompous parade of courts; we have no written laws; and yet judges are as highly revered amongst us as they are among you, and their decisions are as much regarded. Property, to say the least, is as well guarded, and crimes are as impartially punished. We have among us no splendid villains above the control of our laws. Daring wickedness is here never suffered to triumph over helpless innocence. The estates of widows and orphans are never devoured by enterprising sharpers. In a word, we have no robbery under the color of law. No person among us desires any other reward for performing a brave and worthy action but the consciousness of having served his nation. Our wise men are called Fathers; they truly sustain that character. They are always accessible, I will not say to the meanest of our people, for we have none mean but such as render themselves so by their vices.

"The palaces and prisons among you form a most dreadful contrast. Go to the former places, and you will see perhaps a deformed piece of earth assuming airs that become none but the Great Spirit above. Go to one of your prisons; here description utterly fails! Kill them, if you please; kill them, too, by tortures; but let the torture last no longer than a day. Those you call savages, relent; the most furious of our tormentors exhausts his rage in a few hours, and despatches his unhappy victim with sudden stroke. Perhaps it is eligible that incorrigible offenders should sometimes be cut off. Let it be done in a way that is not degrading to human nature. Let such unhappy men have an opportunity, by their fortitude, of making an atonement in some measure for the crimes they have committed during their lives.

"But for what are many of your prisoners confined?—for debt!—astonishing!—and will you ever again call the Indian nations cruel? Liberty, to a rational creature, as much exceeds property as the light of the sun does that of the most twinkling star. But you put them on a level, to the everlasting disgrace of civilization. I knew, while I lived among the white people, many of the most amiable contract debts, and I dare say with the best intentions. Both parties at the time of the contract expect to find their advantage. The debtor, we will suppose, by a train of unavoidable misfortunes, fails; here is no crime, nor even a fault; yet your laws put it in the power of the creditor to throw the debtor into prison, and confine him there for life! A punishment infinitely worse than death to a brave man! And I seriously declare, I had rather die by the most severe tortures ever inflicted on this continent, than languish in one of your prisons for a single year. Great Spirit of the universe!—and do you call yourselves Christians? Does then the religion of Him whom you call your Saviour, inspire this spirit, and lead to these practices?—Surely not. It is recorded of Him that a bruised reed he never broke. Cease, then, to call yourselves Christians lest you publish to the world your hypocrisy, Cease, too, to call other nations savage, when you are tenfold more the children of cruelty than they." Life of Brant, Vol. 2, p. 481.

This letter speaks for itself, and needs no comment. The next instance which I have to present, is a perfect exhibition of the power of love in subduing enmity. It is taken from an article in the Democratic Review, concerning Mr. W. Ladd, the ardent advocate for peace.

"It was not mere good nature, but the adoption of the Peace principles, which made him thus gentle-hearted. A story which he often told with peculiar relish, will illustrate this moulding of his character—the gradual progress of his mind in adopting the Peace principles. 'I had,' said he, 'a fine field of grain, growing upon an out-farm some distance from the homestead. Whenever I rode by I saw my neighbor Pulsifer's sheep in the lot, destroying my hopes of a harvest. These sheep were of the gaunt, long-legged kind, active as spaniels; they could spring over the highest fence, and no partition-wall could keep them out. I complained to neighbor Pulsifer about them, sent him frequent messages, but all without avail. Perhaps they would be kept out for a day or two, but the legs of his sheep were long, and my grain rather more tempting than the adjoining pasture. I rode by again: the sheep were still there; I became angry, and told my men to set the dogs on them, and if that would not do, I would pay them if they would shoot the sheep.

"I rode away much agitated, for I was not so much of a Peace man then as I am now, and I felt, literally, full of fight. All at once a light flashed in upon me. I asked myself, Would it not be well for you to try in your own conduct the Peace principles you are preaching to others? I thought it all over, and settled down my mind as to the best course to be pursued.

"The next day I rode over to see neighbor Pulsifer. I found him chopping wood at his door.—'Good morning, neighbor.' No answer. 'Good morning,' I repeated. He gave a kind of grunt, like a hog, without looking up. 'I came,' continued I, 'to see you about the sheep.' At this he threw down his axe, and exclaimed, in a most angry manner, 'Now aren't you a pretty neighbor, to tell your men to kill my sheep? I heard of it—a rich man like you to shoot a poor man's sheep!'

"'I was wrong, neighbor,' said I; 'but it won't do to let your sheep eat up all that grain; so I come over to say that I would take your sheep to my homestead pasture, and put them in with mine, and in the fall you may take them back, and if any one is missing, you may take your pick out of my whole flock.'

"Pulsifer, looked confounded—he did not know how to take me. At last he stammered out, 'Now, Squire, are you in earnest?' 'Certainly I am,' I answered; 'It is better for me to feed your sheep in my pasture on grass, than feed them here on grain; and I see the fence can't keep them out.'

"After a moments silence—the sheep shan't trouble you any more,' exclaimed Pulsifer. 'I will fetter them all. But I'll let you know that when any man talks of shooting, I can shoot too; and when they are kind and neighborly, I can be kind too.' The sheep never again trespassed on my lot. And my friends,' he would continue, addressing the audience, 'remember that when you talk of injuring your neighbors, they talk of injuring you. When nations threaten to fight, other nations will be ready too. Love will beget love; a wish to be in peace will keep you in peace. You can only overcome evil with good. There is no other way.'

This fact also speaks for itself in the vivid tones of love. Nor is the one which follows, less influential in proving, that the law of overcoming evil with good, is more potent than violence or strife. It is entitled "A Kiss for a Blow."

"A visitor once went into a school at Boston, where he saw a boy and a girl in one seat, who were brother and sister. In a moment of thoughtless passion, the little boy struck his sister. The little girl was provoked, and raised her hand to return the blow. Her face showed that rage was working within, and her little clenched fist was aimed at her brother, when her teacher caught her eye. 'Stop, my dear,' said she, 'you had better kiss your brother than strike him.'

"The look and the word reached her heart. Her hand dropped. She threw her arms around his neck and kissed him. The boy was moved. He could have stood against the blow, but he could not withstand his sister's kiss. He compared the provocation he had given her, with the return she had made, and the tears rolled down his cheeks. This affected his sister, and with her little handkerchief she wiped away his tears. But the sight of her kindness only made him cry the faster; he was completely subdued.

"Her teacher then told the children always to return a kiss for a blow, and they would never get any more. If men and women, families and communities and nations, would act on this principle, the world would almost cease to be a vale of tears. 'Nation would not lift up sword against nation, neither would they learn war any more.'

I can not close this desultory article better, than to present the following beautiful piece of poetry. Like the incidents already given, it needs no comment.

"A little word in kindness spoken,
A motion or a tear,
Has often healed the heart that's broken,
And made a friend sincere.

A word—a look—has crushed to earth
Full many a budding flower,

Which had a smile but owned its birth,
Would bless life's darkest hour.
Then deem it not an idle thing,
A pleasant word to speak;
The face you wear, the thoughts you bring,
A heart may heal or break."

REV. LUTHER LEE

Has discontinued the Sword of Truth, (alias Dirk of Defamation,) and has seceded from the Methodist Episcopal church, and joined O. Scott, La Roy Sunderland and others in their warfare against its intolerant and despotic power. We bear Luther no little ill will that we rejoice at his deliverance; and the despotism of the Episcopal Methodists so little good will, that we hope he may be more successful in his present warfare, (and use more fair and decent weapons,) than in his late fruitless attempts to put down Universalists and Universalism. But it is not likely that his late friends will now be willing to allow him much reputation for honesty or talents.

It is no evidence of a correct moral feeling among the Partialists of New England, that these Anti-Universalist papers can not find purchasers for their filth and garbage for more than about one year. For even a turkey buzzard would sicken on such food in that time!

TO BR. H. BOUGHTON.

DEAR BR.—The story is in circulation here, (by whom first started, I know not,) that you have renounced the doctrine of God's impartial grace, and have become a follower of that form of tradition held by the Baptists. I have no faith in the story—but yet, to stop the idle tale, we should be happy to hear from you, through the Advocate.

Truly Yours,

GEO. W. MONTGOMERY.

TO BR. CLOWES.

DEAR BR.—I have long desired to examine your views of Matt. x: 28—for I believe, from conversations which I have had with you, that they will give light on that subject. If consistent with your engagements and labors, I should be happy to see an exposition of this text, from your pen.

Yours truly,

G. W. MONTGOMERY.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

REMOVALS.—Br. B. F. Hitchcock has removed from Erie, to Conneautville, Crawford county, Pa. Br. E. H. Lake to Middleton, Mass. Br. H. P. Sage from Winsor, to Centre Belpre, Washington county, Ohio. Br. L. P. Rand from Durham to Orono, Me. Br. J. A. Coledge from Royalston to Orange, Mass. Br. M. W. Sargeant to Dunham, L. C. Br. B. F. Foster to Terre Haute, Ind.

NEW PREACHERS.—Br. Edwin Davis, a young man of good promise, has commenced his labors in the ministry of Reconciliation, in Westmoreland, N. H. Br. Wm. Livingston, of Hartland, Vt., and a graduate of Norwich University, has also commenced preaching the great salvation to good acceptance.

NEW ASSOCIATION.—The Star in the West contains a call to the brethren of the Montgomery Association, residing in the counties of Champaign, Clark, Madison, Green, and Montgomery east of Miami river, to organize a new Association to be called after Winchester. The old Association is too large, and its societies too numerous. This is the third new Association lately organized in that state, and the fourth or fifth organized quite lately in the West.

NEW CHURCHES have been organized lately in Highland, Vermillion county, Ind., by Br. B. F. Foster—in Williamsport, Warren county, and in Jefferson, Clinton county, Ind., by Br. E. Manford.

ORDINATIONS.—Br. B. F. Foster, of Terre Haute, Ind., was ordained at the last session of the Indiana State Convention. Br. F. Foster, late of W. Haverhill, Mass., was ordained in Winthrop, Me., on December 29th.

Br. James Whittier, late of Amesbury, Mass., was ordained in Union, Me., December 21st. Br. G. F. Flanders, Editor of the Genius of Truth, in Zanesville, Ohio, was ordained December 2d.

VARIOUS ITEMS.—Since Elder Knapp's visit to Salem, Mass., our cause there has prospered greatly—55 persons were added to the church on one Sunday. The same happy result has followed the Elder's abuse of us in Concord, N. H. Rev. E. Dow also denies that he renounced because of the Elder's preaching, thus denying him the last leaf of his boasted chaplet!

The Baptists in Lowell have had two extensive explosions. A corporation of the Free will Baptists, getting all the money it could from factory girls, widows and orphans, and spending it most lavishly, has failed, and it is presumed will not pay 25 cents on the dollar. Elder Thurston, a very zealous opposer of Universalism, was the head man in the concern, and has been suspended, not for his iniquity, but for carelessness in keeping the accounts. The other concern is the Second Baptist church of Lowell. Its Treasurer was made a kind of banker for the factory girls, and others; and he too has bursted, and ruined the confiding depositors. It is hinted that the church has secured itself at the expense of the others. So much for Baptist honesty and humanity, when congregated in a corporation or saving bank. They had better get Elder Knapp and M. H. Smith there again, and have another glorious revival of religion!

Millerism is doing its work in every quarter. Mr. Miller himself has been in this city for several days past, lecturing to crowded houses of every kind of materials. I believe none have yet been taken to the Asylum. But we notice by the papers that one man in Philadelphia, another in Effingham, N. H., another in Tufonborough, N. H., and another in W. Randolph, Vt., have all been driven to insanity by such preaching. The first patient admitted into the New Hampshire Lunatic Asylum was a poor Millerite. Besides these, a lady in Great Barrington, Mass., cut her throat under the influence of such preaching. In what passage of the Bible is it recorded that any one was driven to insanity by the preaching of the prophets, the Saviour, or the apostles?

Several of our papers have published a list of Partialist preachers who have embraced Universalism within five years and are now preaching it. We notice the name of "Rev. L. C. Todd, Presbyterian, N. Y." This is an error. Br. Todd was not a Presbyterian preacher. After his renunciation, he became a Methodist. But he does not now preach, at least not stately and lives in Ohio.

Messrs. Tappan and Dennet, the Publishers of M. H. Smith's book against Universalism, were sued for a libel contained in said book, by Br. J. B. Dods, and have lately allowed judgment to be entered against them. Thus another Rev. slanderer has had his falsehood nailed to the counter.

The request to copy a notice of the Conference of the Steuben Association from the Luminary was not complied with, because, owing to the perversity of the printer of the Luminary, Br. Cook could not get out his paper until about two weeks after date. The next volume of the Luminary will be printed in an office of its own, when its appearance will be more regular than heretofore.

Will our friends and agents send us all the money they have collected or can collect, before the first of next month (February), as we have a large amount to pay at that time, and are depending upon our patrons for the means to meet that payment. Do what you can for us.

"S." is informed that there is some anxiety to hear his arguments in full on the subject between him and Br. Montgomery—and, also, that he should, if he pleases, give them over his proper name. If he will oblige those having this desire, I will drop my pen, and trust Br. Clark will ask no special attention until the whole affair is completed, nor then, unless new arguments can be adduced on either side. Will "S." let us hear from him?

A. B. G.

Br. Tompkins—Send current volume Repository to Asaph Pratt, Whitewater, Wisconsin; credit him and charge us $2.00. D. Brayton, Esq., of Eatonville, N. Y., has received a dun for current volume Repository from you. He informs us that he paid O. Hutchinson at his book store, either in May or June last.

DEATHS.

In Auburn, January 3d, of disease in the stomach, Mrs. JANE CASEY, aged 73 years. Though a legal member of a Presbyterian church, yet she was for several years a believer of the Restitution, and attended its Sabbath ministrations. Her death was triumphant, and unattended by fear. Her last words were, "I am going home." And so she has. May consolation be given to her afflicted family.

G. W. M.

In Truxton, Dec. 2d, Mr. ISAAC COWLES, of natural infirmities, aged 75 years. Mr. Cowles lived a practical Christian, and died in the triumphs of a Christian's hope. His death is much lamented by the community in which he resided. But may they realize that their limited loss, is his infinite gain. The funeral was attended by the writer.

A WISH.

BY MISS CELIA M. TIBBITS.

I would I were a genii,
With power to roam at will Through all earth's wide dominions,
O'er mountain, vale and hill;
Yet not 'mid blushing roses
My wing should e'er be staid,
Or over pearly fountains
That with the zephyrs played.

I'd talk with rolling thunders—
I'd wear the lightning's wreath—
And from the brow of Etna
I'd view the world beneath;—
My car should be the whirlwind,
That rushes through the sky;
I'd wrap me in the storm-cloud
While tempests hasten by.

And when the vivid lightnings
Were flashing o'er the deep,
I'd wake the moaning spirits
That in its bosom sleep;
I'd dance upon the billow
That sweeps the angry sky,
My voice should be the echo
Of the wild sea-bird's cry.

Where rose the din of battle
And shrieks of wild despair—
Where clashed the sound of armor—
Oh, I would fain be there!
Then in the angry maelstrom,
My spirit fain would look,
And read the briny pages
Of its mysterious book;
And when its fearful records
Of anguish I had read,
O then I'd find a sepulchre
Among its silent dead.

RESIGNATION.

O, resignation! best benison of heaven,
And to how few thy balmy rest is given;
Thy calm repose, the heart with sorrow riven,
Alone can heal.

How eagerly we grasp the things of earth!
Though often pierced, the asking hand hold forth,
The hand that hitherto reached nought of worth,
Save fruitless zeal.

But when affliction's hand hath wrung the heart,
In what we cherished most have found a dart,
'Tis then, we learn resigned from earth to part,
And raise the mind
From fragile things that only bloom to die,
To smiling joys beyond the blessed sky,
Where deathless love absorbs the tear, the sigh,
And solace find.

THE WIDOW'S LAST TRIAL.

A TRUE STORY.

BY MRS. N. SARGENT.

"He was the only son of his mother, and she was a widow."

"And to-morrow you are to be taken into the firm as a partner." This was uttered by an aged female, who was sitting with one of her withered hands clasped in that of her son, a young man of two-and-twenty, who sat looking her in the face, with eyes beaming with affectionate interest. "This fully repays me, my beloved son, for all I have suffered."

For a moment the son's features appeared clouded with sorrow; he thought what that suffering had been; of the years long past, when the mother now sitting beside him, so beloved, had submitted to toil and privation, enduring all this for his sake; his eyes glistened with tears, till brushing them away hastily, a smile broke over his countenance.

"True mother," he said; "but let these recollections be forgotten now. The memory of the past we will bury in oblivion, and think only of the days that are to come."

"But you will not allow present prosperity to harden your heart, William; you will not let your good fortune make you high-minded, and forget Him, who has been a friend in the hour of trouble?"

"No, mother, I will not forget that I am the child of God—yet should temptation assail me, I have only to think of your precepts and example, and they would always deter me from doing wrong. But think, mother," he continued, a bright gleam lighting up every feature, "how happy I shall be, in being enabled to place you in the sphere of life to which your virtues entitle you. If you knew how often busy fancy has pictured this hour; how often I have dwelt upon the idea of one day being able to place you in a home equal to your merit, you would not wonder, that now, when I see my wishes on the eve of accomplishment, it should thus snub me."

"Nor do I, nor do I, my son," the mother said with tearful eyes; "but you think more favorably, my boy, of your aged mother than she deserves. I doubt not many will think and say the old woman has now more than she merits; and really, though I am proud of your advancement, I should not murmur, at never having a more comfortable home than the present one you have provided me."

The night was pitchy dark, not a star being visible, while the wind blowing in fitful gusts, portended a storm of unusual violence.

"'Twill be a stormy night, I fear," said the young man, rising and going towards the door to look out.—"The river is already swollen, and if the rain falls as it did the other evening, I fear much damage will ensue. You heard of the poor fellow drowned in the canal last evening?"

"Yes," the mother replied. "I hope he had friends to care for him. 'Tis a dreadful death to die," she added musingly.

"They say not," said William; "many who have encountered it, assert the being brought to, is the most painful part to endure."

"It may be so," the mother answered; "but I fervently trust no one dear to me, may ever be submitted to the experiment."

A vivid flash of lightning, followed by the low rumbling thunder, caused William now to retire; and observing again that the river would be very high, he closed the door.

It was now the usual hour for family worship. The mother had seated herself in a corner of the fire place, with her features settled into a look of devotion, while the son, with a corresponding gravity, walked toward the stand on which the family Bible was placed, and opening the sacred volume, began reading a chapter. Religion with them, was not the cold expression of the lip alone. It was the incense of the heart. It was a beautiful sight; that aged mother, and her only son, bending their knees, and lifting up their voices to the Most High. Perhaps the events of the day had given a deeper tone of tenderness to William's voice and feelings; certain it was, he had never prayed more fervently than on that evening; and when they separated for the night, the poor old woman looked forward to the bright vista of the future, with full confidence of its meeting her most sanguine anticipations.

The mother of William had been left a widow, while he was in his second year. By dint of hard labor, she had managed to keep her boy at school, until he arrived at his fifteenth year, when she obtained a situation for him with a merchant, residing at the flourishing town of Rochester, in the State of New York. William's good conduct and steady application to business, won the favorable opinion of his employer. The merchant was a man of great benevolence; he could appreciate merit in whatever station it was to be met; and when he saw the lad supporting an aged mother out of his earnings—never mingling with the low and vicious, and and practising a fidelity to business unusual in one so young, it was impossible to avoid feeling an involuntary respect for his character. William was aware of the merchant's kindness; he knew that his salary exceeded that given to other boys; still he never presumed on the merchant's disinterestedness, but was alike respectful to his employer, and their customers. On the day in which he was introduced to the reader's notice, he had been offered a share in the merchant's lucrative business. Never had his brightest vision pictured such a result; but even then, when it would have been natural to suppose him greatly elated by his good fortune, he thought only of his mother; and while his expressions of gratitude were poured in eloquent language into the ear of his benefactor, there was a mingling of thanks that she would be the reaper of his unexampled kindness.

To-morrow! who may boast of to-morrow!

The widow and her son parted from each other with happiness bright in the perspective. The storm of the preceding evening had been succeeded by a morning of unusual mildness for the season; for it was the middle of January; and telling his mother he would not return to dinner, but that she should see him early in the evening, William bade her farewell.

It was at the close of the day, that a traveller went forth to view the picturesque and beautiful falls of the Genesee. He proceeded slowly, gazing upon the surrounding country, with the eye of a connoisseur; and had gained the point at which the fall could be seen to the greatest advantage, when his attention became engrossed by an object of exceeding interest. Near to the aqueduct was a young man employed in endeavoring to collect some drift wood. He had stretched forth his arm to seize a floating log, when, the place being slippery, he lost his balance, and fell into the water. At first, the stranger thought him justly punished for his temerity, and felt inclined to smile at what he deemed his foolhardiness; but soon other feelings predominated. The river was very high, and the current, running strong, soon brought the rash youth towards the rapids.

Who, oh! who may paint the anguished feelings of that hapless being, knowing himself to be doomed to inevitable destruction! On, on the rapids drove him.—There was not a ray of hope to cheer his drooping heart; but as the moment of impending fate drew near, desperation gave him strength to grapple with a death grasp; on the very top of the falls he stood bolt upright upon his feet, and giving one wild dreadful shriek, went over. Faint and dizzy, the traveller had closed his eyes to shut out the dreadful sight. He knew that the hapless being had seen him, that the last agonizing appeal the unfortunate youth had made for aid, was to him, and sick at heart he returned to the hotel.

When the melancholy fact became spread through the town, it was said to be a poor youth who had been in the habit of nightly carrying home a supply of drift-wood to his mother. All spoke highly of him, of his devotion to her, and of his subsequent good conduct. It was mentioned that his prospects had improved, and many conjectured that the force of habit, more than actual necessity, had occasioned the fatal catastrophe.—Reader, the poor drowned youth was the widow's only son!

Not many days after, a coffin was seen slowly emerging from the widow's now desolate mansion. The body of the young man had been found many miles below the spot at which he perished. Not a trace of his once pleasant countenance was perceptible; but his clothes were identified by many. There was one who would have recognized him under any circumstances—the heart-broken mother. When all shrunk and turned away with horror, from viewing the sight of his mutilated limbs, she clung to them, and wept over the body in the most bitter agony. The earth closed over his loved remains. It was the widow's last trial.

Soon she was sleeping beside them!

A FUNERAL SERMON,

Delivered at Stamford, N. Y., by REV. DAVID PICKERING, Pastor of the First Universalist church and society, in Butternuts, Otsego county, N. Y., January 5th, 1843—and published by request of the mourning friends—on the death of LOUISA STEVENSON, who died December 21st, 1842, aged 29 years—of ELMIRA STEVENSON, aged 31 years, who died the same day, and but ten minutes after the death of her sister—of EDWARD E. STEVENSON, who died December 24th, the same month, and but three days after his two sisters, aged nearly 15 years. Peace be to their sleeping dust, and joy to their immortal spirits.

"I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep; that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope." 1 Thess. iv: 13.

The church addressed by the apostle in the language of our text, was located in a country which had long been enveloped by the mists of heathenish darkness and erroneous superstition. It was situated in that part of Europe which has long been in possession of the Turks, and consequently far from the place where the Christian religion first opened to the hopes of man its ample stores of intellectual wealth and spiritual enjoyment. Previous to the time of its visitation by the author of this Epistle, its inhabitants had paid their devotions to changeful and capricious gods, which were only the creations of a disordered and misguided imagination, and consequently subjected to all the uncertainty and doubt respecting a future existence, which the vague conjectures of an incompetent philosophy was calculated to inspire. From the text and context, it is readily inferred, that much doubt and uncertainty existed, and excited the painful fears of the Thessalonians, respecting the state of those who had departed this life; and perhaps even a portion of the Christians, who had been but imperfectly instructed in the great destinies which the Gospel unfolds, might, at times, fall under the influence of those fears which continually preyed upon the hearts of the multitude: hence it became necessary for the apostle to write and impart some particular instruction to them upon a subject which so tenderly and deeply interested their feelings and their hopes.

The familiar manner in which the author of this Epistle addresses his brethren upon the subject before us, leaves no room to doubt that the multitude of the heathen in his day were not only a prey to continual fear and anxiety concerning the dead, but it apprizes us that their condition was one of hopeless sorrow, on account of those dear friends who had been removed from them by the hand of death. They possessed no means by which they could draw aside the veil of futurity; nor did they enjoy, from the boasted refinements of all their philosophical speculations, a single ray of light to illuminate the passage of the tomb. No kind angel of comfort whispered to them the joys of future life and glory, nor had they aught to break the cheerless, sullen gloom which pervaded the house of death. Their hopes were all bounded by the narrow span of life, and death, to them, was viewed as an eternal sleep! The tear of affection and regret which fell from the eye of sorrow to moisten the face of the dead, was the token of a final and last adieu to the captive of the unrelenting king of terrors. When they beheld the vegetable kingdom stripped of all its leafy honors, and shorn of its blooming beauties by the chilling blasts of Autumn, they knew that the vivifying power of Spring would restore them to their former freshness, and clothe them anew in all their verdant sweetness. But no such hopes cheered their hearts for the silent captive of the tomb: A dreamless, unbroken and eternal sleep, to them was the hopeless portion of the dead! That such was the gloomy prospect of the heathen, may be seen by the following elegant quotation from one of their most renowned poets—

"A flowing river, or a standing lake,
May their dry banks or naked shores forsake;
Their waters may exhale and upward move,
Their channels leave to roll in clouds above;—
But the returning Winter will restore
What in the Summer they had lost before:—
But if, O man, thy vital streams desert
Their purple channels, and defraud the heart,
With fresh recruits they ne'er will be supplied,
Nor feel their leaping life's returning tide."

We are all, in some degree, acquainted with the influence which early opinions and habits are capable of exerting over the mind and feelings, notwithstanding those early thoughts may have been overpowered by the sober convictions of the understanding in riper years. Yet even then, there are periods in which the mind reverts back to the days of childhood and youth, and will, notwithstanding all our convictions, associate the innocence and pleasure of that vivid period of life with the opinions which then swayed the sceptre of the heart.

Such, the apostle was aware, might be the condition of his brethren at Thessalonica. He knew that public opinion was opposed to the hopes which Christianity unfolded, and that the disciples had less cause of sorrow for the dead than their heathen neighbors, whose anticipations were bounded by the grave. This hope would naturally cause a degree of cheerful and pious resignation to mingle with the mournful solemnities which were observed among Christians, as the last tribute, dictated by social and religious affection. The heathen, too, who were accustomed to paroxysms of excessive grief for the dead, would be likely to upbraid them with the charge of indifference and want of affection for their departed friends, when they witnessed the composure of Christians in the house of mourning. As this might also exert some influence, unfavorable to the prosperity of their religious character and hopes, he penned the appropriate exhortation, of which our text is a part, to strengthen and encourage their hearts in the constancy and love of the Gospel—"I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope."

In the improvement of this subject, I shall

I. Treat of the causes which are productive of sorrow, when called to part with our friends.

II. Consider a few of the consolations which the Gospel affords, by those divine declarations and promises which mark their final destiny.

I. The causes which give birth to the feelings of regret, when we are called to take the last parting adieu of those who have been connected to us by the ties of consanguinity, or even of those with whom we have contracted the habits of intimacy and friendship, are too numerous to demand or admit of a minute detail in the limits of a single discourse. We can only glance at those which are the most general and prominent in their character, and which seldom fail to awake the sympathies with which we are furnished in the constitution of our common nature.

The unerring Author of our existence has been pleased to implant in our hearts a principle of affection and sympathy which is the fountain that continually supplies the streams of social love, and strongly unites us by the tenderest ties to the interesting circle of kindred here below. The longer we are permitted to enjoy their society, and the more numerous the scenes through which we accompany them, the stronger our attachment becomes, till our very existence, or at least much of the value which we attach to existence, seems to hang upon the destiny which awaits them.

This is peculiarly the case in the most intimate and endearing relations of life. The social tie of affection which unites the husband and the wife, the parent and the child, the brother and the sister, is so strong, so tender and delicate, that the happiness of one seems to depend essentially upon the existence and prosperity of the other. When they are in affliction, we sympathize with them;—when sorrow forbids the smile of joy, we labor to administer the needed comfort;—when they sink under the pale hand of sickness, we watch over them with solicitude and care, and mark with feelings of deep concern whatever changes may appear ominous of a speedy dissolution.

Does returning health restore them again to the active scenes of social life and social enjoyment? The heart of affection leaps for joy, and forgets the burden of its woes. But does the cold hand of death sunder the brittle thread by which their earthly existence was sustained? how deep and poignant is the pain of grief, which the heart of affection is doomed to bear! Nature then, though dressed in her gayest attire, seems to lose the sweetness of her charms, and all the smiling landscape assumes the livery of mourning, in unison with the sad realities of heartfelt grief. We are reminded by a thousand circumstances in the daily occurrences of life, of the loss we have sustained, and the wounds of affliction are opened afresh by the remembrance of scenes that are past. Their memory is interwoven with so much of the history of our own lives, that we can scarcely recur to any of the pages of past experience, without bringing them within the compass of vivid recollection. The visit of some familiar friend, reminds us of the departed. They, perhaps, have mingled with them in the circles of social life,—or have joined them in scenes of gay and innocent amusement,—or have been associated with them in the active and hazardous duties of business, or the intricate and arduous transactions of commercial enterprise. They too may have accompanied them through scenes of peril and danger,—they might have been companions in childhood, and commenced the journey of life together.—nay, they might have been bound together by a still purer tie, the tie of religious confidence and joy. They, perhaps, had visited the house of God in company, and mingled with devotional gratitude in the assembly of the saints,—had listened with emotions of joy and thankfulness to the tidings of mercy and grace, while their humble prayers and the loftiest affections of their souls mingled with acceptance, like holy incense before the throne of the Eternal.

Not only by the visits of a friend, are we reminded of our departed kindred; but even the apartments of domestic retirement, awake in the remembrance, scenes which seem to open afresh the sources of our grief. Their very image seems enstamped upon the objects by which we are constantly surrounded. Their places at table and by the cheerful fire-side, call up anew their memory, and print more deeply their image in our thoughts. All the dear memorials of the departed inspire us with sorrow, excite the tear of affliction, call forth the sigh of lamentation, and spread a settled gloom over the countenance where cheerfulness dwelt before.

All the sad memorials may excite our tears, and deepen the conviction of our loss in the privation of their society, without implying any serious concern for their future and final welfare. Indeed, as Christians, we ought to possess, and if we are sincere in our professions, we must enjoy a settled conviction of the rectitude and benevolence of the divine government, which will ever shield our hearts against the arrows of despair; and effectually check the tears of hopeless lamentation and unavailing regret. This happy reflection should silence every murmuring thought, and impress our hearts with a deep and penetrating sense of the kindness and love of God, through an all-sufficient and all-conquering Redeemer, whose beams of mercy have penetrated the darkest clouds of sorrow, and ushered in the prospect of fadeless glory beyond the grave.

How happy, compared with the painful realities which history and observation afford, would be the condition of the human race, if no other sorrows existed in the heart, on account of departed friends, save those which result from the temporary loss of their society: but unfortunately, this is not their enviable condition. Other and deeper sorrows prey upon their hearts. Aside from the holy light of revelation, (and which many unwisely and madly reject,) man is destitute of any solid foundation for the hope of future existence, however ardently he may desire to live beyond the grave: and if he enjoys no well-grounded hope of existence for himself beyond the narrow confines of this mortal and changeable abode, it can not be supposed that he cherishes such a hope for any of his fellow beings. The fact, therefore, is not to be concealed, that many, very many, and even in Christian lands, too, are called to part with their dearest earthly friends, who are destitute of any comfortable and well-grounded assurance that they will ever awake from the slumbers of the grave. The melancholy and corroding thought, that those who were bound to them by the tenderest ties of kindred and affection, are blotted from the page of existence forever, can not fail to infuse the deepest gloom, and fill their hearts with anguish that naught but eternal oblivion will creep over the mouldering ashes of the dead. To such, the parting adieu of an expiring companion, of a beloved child, or of an affectionate brother, father, sister and friend, is an eternal farewell, an endless separation! No friendly light of hope cheers the sullen gloom, or points to a bright reversion beyond the silent mansions of the grave! Such, indeed, is the sorrow of those "who have no hope;" and from the painful visitations of which, the apostle was laboring to guard the minds of his Christian friends and brethren. And such is the inevitable portion of those who heedlessly or madly spurn the friendly light of inspiration, which alone can aid the mental vision in the welcome discovery of an immortal inheritance beyond the tomb. Oh, how unwise and unfortunate are those who reject the wholesome instructions of the Gospel of peace and eternal life, and throw themselves upon the tempestuous ocean of human calamities, without a friendly port in view, and without the compass of faith to direct them to the desired haven of contentment and immortal rest! The fault, however, is their own, the Sun of righteousness shines in all its pristine splendor, but they willingly close their eyes—the portals of endless glory are open, but they behold them not. They reject the counsel of God against themselves, and become, emphatically, the destroyers of their own mercies! But thanks be to God, such is not the unhappy lot of the Christian. His sorrow for the dead, arises, not from the painful fear, that like the trees of the forest, they have fallen unconscious of future being; for he expects to meet them again in the day of eternity.

Before we take our leave of the causes which are productive of sorrow, when called to part with our friends, we should not omit to mention those distressing fears, which haunt and corrode the minds of those who are so unfortunate as to be under the dominion of moral darkness, or are at best but very imperfectly instructed in the will and word of God, and the destinies of infinite and unerring wisdom. With such, it is no uncommon event that they are harassed with direful apprehensions of wretchedness and woe—that they are tortured with the most distressing fears, lest the condition of their friends should be infinitely more deplorable beyond this vale of tears, than the most wretched condition of mortal existence here below.

The idea of parting with our friends, and that we can no more enjoy their society in all the journey of life, is indeed, a sorrowful reflection to the heart of sensibility;—but let the awful and painful foreboding of unending wretchedness be added, and what possible hope remains for the consolation of the living! Human language is too weak to set forth the sufferings of that mind, which is so unfortunate as to be borne down under the oppressive burden of such hopeless sorrow. A sorrow which poisons all the enjoyments of life, renders every pleasure insipid, and diffuses unspeakable bitterness of soul through every season of reflection. It was against the invasion of such despairing thoughts, such unwelcome forebodings, that the apostle was striving with a noble and praise-worthy zeal to guard the minds of his Christian brethren, when he penned the affectionate salutation of our text,—"I would not have you to be ignorant brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope." We may now pass—

II. To consider a few of the consolations which the Gospel affords, by those divine declarations and promises which mark the final destination of man.

The expressions employed in our text, as well as the current language of the New Testament, go very far to establish the fact, that something is revealed, and may be known, concerning the state of our departed friends.

That all men are perfectly happy at death, is a conclusion at which we are unable to arrive, either by the light of reason or revelation. But that they will be happy in proportion as they are virtuous and pure, is a conclusion perfectly in accordance with the dictates of reason, and the voice of unerring inspiration. The infinite perfections of the great Divinity whom we adore, forbid the ungrateful suspicion, that he ever administers suffering for the sake of inflicting pain; and reason, therefore, cordially approves the strong assurance of revelation, that "He doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men."

It would be absurd to suppose that death has any power to qualify a vicious man for the pure enjoyments of God, or the society of the holy angels,—for then would the mission of Christ, as well as the holy requirements of repentance, faith and reformation, be unavailing and vain, and the icy king of terrors would be defied with the praise of salvation.

The luminous and all-important truths which are laid down in the New Testament to sustain our hopes and gladden the prospects of eternity, are plain and easy of comprehension. They assure us that "the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world"—that he clothed the great Redeemer with his own divine perfections, and invested him with "all power in heaven and in earth"—that he is appointed "to be the Judge of quick and dead," and that he "will render to every man according to his works"—nay more,—that "he must reign till he hath subdued all things to himself"—till "every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall confess, that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God, the Father." An eminent apostle of our Lord has directed our faith to "the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began;" while his fellow laborer in the Gospel, announces with unfaltering assurance, that "as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." Thus does the light of revelation cheer the Christian's hope, and illuminate his soul with the vision of endless peace. He sees through the promises of God, the arm of omnipotence extended to bow and subdue the rebel heart, and end the terrific reign of sin and death. To his enraptured view, is opened the cleansing fountain of a Saviour's grace, to purify the soul, and prepare it for a blissful association with "the spirits of the just made perfect."

Are his virtuous friends suddenly called away, and the tenderest ties that bind kindred hearts, sundered by the unsparing hand of death?—he is not left a prey to the bitter pangs of hopeless despair, but beholds by the light of heavenly wisdom and truth, their celestial flight to the radiant throne of the Eternal. The sorrows which the privation of their society has occasioned, are mitigated by the reflection, that they have ended the rugged path of their pilgrimage, and have already entered into the Paradise of more than mortal joy; and with countless myriads, released from the prison of mortality, are waiting the final consummation of their beatitude, in the transcendent glories of that immortal day, when with the innumerable multitude of angels they shall touch a higher note upon the timbrels of eternity, and in strains of sweet seraphic wonder, "with every creature in heaven, on earth and in the sea," restored to divine favor by the power of redeeming love, unite in deathless ascriptions of "blessing, and honor, and glory, and power unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, forever and ever."

Such are a few of the prominent consolations and hopes which the Gospel of Christ holds out, to cheer our hearts and lighten the burden of our griefs and woes, as we journey through the plains of time.—And oh, how invaluable are the comforts which they bring to the aching, anxious mind! How pure and exalting to the soul! How refining to the moral sensibilities of beings created for eternal duration! Say, my kind friends and brethren, are they not worthy the devotion of all our powers? Are they not infinitely worthy of our highest gratitude and love? Let us then evince our joy, and the grateful emotions of our souls, by the virtues of ardent faith and constant love!

What now remains is a few addresses to the mourning friends, with which we shall close the labors of the passing hour.

To the deeply afflicted Parents I would say—The present is truly a period when we stand in need of all the power of faith and hope, and of all the constancy and firmness which the Christian religion is able to impart. The angel of death has been commissioned to visit the abode of domestic retirement and peace, and to snatch from its sacred circle THREE of its choice and valued companions.—Thrice has the Lord spoken by the voice of a most solemn, trying and affecting visitation of his providence, to remind us of the shortness and vanity of human life, and of all we hold most dear beneath the sun.

The anxiety and tenderness of parental love could not stay the approach of death, nor hold the dear objects of your fond regards from the silent mansion of the tomb. No pains was spared to administer relief and comfort to the departed: but in vain! They have burst the fetters that bound them to earth, and gone to that unseen world to which we are all hastening as fast as the wheels of time can move.

Your hearts are now pained with grief at the thought that you can enjoy their society no more on earth—but my dear friends, bless the name and goodness of your God, that he has not left you "to mourn as those who have no hope." You look beyond the shores of time, and anticipate the welcome period when you shall hail them in all the bliss of immortality and eternal life. Bow, then, to the unerring decision of infinite wisdom with that resignation which becomes the devout and humble Christian; resting in the cheerful assurance that this, and all your afflictions, will work for you "a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

Those who sustain the fraternal relation to those dear and affectionate friends, who have so recently bid adieu to all the scenes of mortality and time, are affectionately commended to God and the word of his grace, and are invited to remember, for their consolation and support, the pure and elevating hope which sustained the heart of an affectionate sister for months and years before she was called to lie down in the silence of the grave, and to follow her in all the examples of virtue in which she has walked before them. And may her pure and elevated faith dwell richly in your hearts, and prepare your minds and moral feelings for all the vicissitudes and duties of life. Ah, and may the clear and invigorating assurance of that dear brother for whom you mourn, be transferred to your hearts, and lift you far above the vanities and trifles of this vain world, and prepare you to join him in more than mortal raptures beyond the changing scenes of earth and time, where all is joy and peace and love forever; and where no cloud of parting grief shall ever arise to obscure the brightness of your joys, or check the fervor of immortal love and peace.

You are only left to mourn the loss of their society for a few fleeting days, before they will welcome you to join their happy throng, where joys and pleasures are all full of the glories of immortality, and all the sorrows of earth are forgotten in transports of unending joy and praise! And where "every creature in heaven, on earth, and under the earth," shall unite to ascribe "blessing and honor, and glory and power, to him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, forever and ever."

And now, my respected hearers, may we all be comforted by the joyful hopes which the Gospel of a risen and exalted Saviour has left us for our encouragement and joy, as we pass along this vale of tears. And while we deeply and feelingly sympathize with this disconsolate family, let us point them to the great Head of the church, who shall wipe away tears from off all faces, and crown a ransomed creation with the endless joys of the immortal Paradise, when time shall be no more.

And to close—may these rich and immortal consolations of the Gospel of a risen Saviour become the peaceful and invaluable legacy of every mourning heart; that reconciliation to all the allotments of a righteous Providence may sanctify us for every changeable scene, and that at last we may be fully prepared, with a ransomed universe, for that endless inheritance of the saints in light, "which is incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away." Amen.

DONATION.

Brother Grosh—I think it is justly due to my numerous friends in this part of the heritage of our common Master, to notice in a public and respectful manner, their ambition, kindness and generosity to myself and family. And I know of no method more convenient and suitable, than to ask the friendly and useful columns of the Magazine and Advocate, for that purpose.

A brief notice was given that my house would be open to receive my friends for the purpose of a donation, on Tuesday, the 3d day of January, instant. The day arrived, but it was the most cold, blustering and unpleasant day we have experienced this winter. I regretted that circumstance very much, and thought, if five and twenty came, it would be as many as could be expected, as they lived scattered over the hills and valleys of this uneven country. But they began to assemble in the afternoon, and at seven o'clock in the evening, more than one hundred friends called on us, bringing with them the ample tokens of their friendship and good will. They mingled in social, friendly chat, and seemed as happy as heart could wish, till nearly ten o'clock in the evening, when they dispersed in all directions for their homes. We supplied them with plenty of hot tea and coffee, and provision was plentifully set before them. I think I never saw so large a company together, of all sects and ages, who appeared more civil and happy. This fact was more grateful to my feelings than the liberal donations which they brought. I have since heard of a considerable number of friends who intended to be present, but were prevented by the severity of the weather, and that still intend to come.

The whole donation amounted to about $100, and I am sure that the good feelings that appeared among our guests on that occasion, was worth much more than that sum.

The donation consisted of about one hundred pounds of fine fresh beef, turkeys, chickens, butter, cheese and honey, lard and tallow, cake, an elegant coat-pattern, loaf and brown sugar, tea and coffee in abundance, and about seventeen dollars from the young people to my daughter, in an elegant bonnet, gowns, shoes, &c.—and I must not forget to mention some cash.

God bless and reward their great kindness.

Butternuts, January 11th, 1843. D. PICKERING.

REMARKS.—We rejoice at the above, and can sympathize with Br. Pickering in the occurrence—for some of our friends here, have been serving us just so, ever since about Christmas. We protest that we are not "served just right"—that we do not deserve it—but they do as they "have a mind to," and we are so far a non-resistant, as to let them have their own way! It is not the mere comfort of the "outer man," nor of his inside lining, that makes us glad of such demonstrations; but there is a warmth created in the "inner man," of goodwill, gratitude, and joy in seeing people happy in making us so, that is worth far more than all their gifts, precious and timely as they may be. We hope these good offices will go round, until all our preachers can sympathize with us in regard to these invasions.

SECULAR NEWS.

NAVIGATION OPEN.—The steamboats Norwich and Robert L. Stevens, arrived here from New York yesterday. Both boats left New York on Saturday evening. The Norwich came through direct and suffered considerable damage by the floating ice. The Stevens lay at Hudson until day light. The Oliver Ellsworth, which left this city at 10 A. M. on Saturday, was 6 miles below Catskill at 3 o'clock on Sunday morning on her way down.

Hon. Francis S. Key, who has been for many years widely known as an able lawyer and who formerly for some years held the office of District Attorney for the District of Columbia, died at Baltimore, a short time since. The U. S. Supreme Court, as a testimony of their respect, immediately adjourned; the Bar of the District held a meeting to express their sense of his worth, and the courts of Baltimore likewise expressed their deep regret at his decease. Mr. Key in the early part of his life, was connected with the Navy, and wrote, at that time, the spirited song since so popular, "The Star-Spangled Banner."

We learn from the Cincinnati Chronicle that the number of hogs killed at that place this season up to the 1st of January was 115,000. It is supposed that the number will reach, before the season is over, 150,000. The meat is said to be very fine. Employment for the Poor.—We are gratified to learn the humane intentions of the Navy Department in regard to an interesting portion of its duties. The Naval service requires a considerable quantity of clothing for seamen. To test the economy and advantage of a change in the system of procuring these supplies, the Department contemplates the employment of persons to make up a portion of the clothing for the Government. The plan has been approved by the Navy Agent, and measures have been taken to carry it into effect.—Com. Adv.

Recall of Com. Jones.—We learn from Washington that Com. Thomas Ap Catesby Jones, commander of the U. S. The Mexican Minister at Washington, Col. Almonte, has made strong remonstrances on the subject. It is further said that Capt. Foxhall A. Parker is appointed to succeed Com. Jones. While pursuing the West India Pirates many years ago, Com. Porter chased one into Foxardo, and took the responsibility of taking the town, for which he was punished; and this is only the similar instance of usurpation in the history of our Navy.—Newark Adv.

THE POETRY OF NATURE.

BY MISS CELIA M. TIBBITS.

There's poetry in every floral bell

That sheds its fragrance on the passing breezes,
And melting words are traced in pencil veins
On blooming petals, and on grass green leaves.

In the glad music of each singing rill,
In the wild rushing of the mountain stream,
On the grey tablet of each mossy rock,
Deep words of poetry are heard and seen.

"In the deep organ of the forest shade,"
In the blue depths of heaven's eternal dome,
In the low whisper of the summer breeze,
And in the solemn night-wind's fearful moan—

In the loud crashing of the thunder bolt,
And in the moaning of the troubled sea,
Upon the briny page of every wave,
Are written gem-like words of poetry.

On flowret, hill and dale, and mountain's brow,
On the fair tablet of each distant star
Poetic words are traced; and winds, and waves,
The storms and thunders, all, its heralds are.

BRIEF THOUGHTS.....NO. IX.

BY REV. S. GOFF.

"And Jesus returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee: and there went out a fame of him through all the region round about." Luke iv: 14.

Immediately after the trial in the wilderness, the Saviour entered upon the duties of his public ministry. The period of seclusion being ended, that of active exertion commenced. The "thought" which I would here record is, that the Christian life is one of activity; and hence, that the disciple of Jesus should never be idle. His whole duty is not alone in resisting temptation, and slunning evil. But he must labor; he must work; he must advance. He must labor for his own improvement, and work for the good of others, that he and they may advance in the school of Christ, and "grow in grace." Having triumphed over the tempter, Jesus did not wait, he did not linger, but without delay he commenced laboring for the amelioration of humanity—for the salvation of the world. And he has left for us this word of instruction: "If any man will come after me—will be my disciple—let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me." Then, Christian, be not idle. Let thy motto be ONWARD. Leave "those things which are behind, and press toward the mark for the prize of thy high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

"Vain are our fancies, airy flights,
If faith be cold and dead;
None but a living power writes
To Christ the living Head."

DECREES OF OMNIPOTENCE.

BY JONATHAN DOUGLASS.

The subject of predestination seems to be held, by some of our brethren at least, as intangible matter. It has long appeared to me however, as a subject of the highest importance, inasmuch as the predeterminate decrees of Jehovah, form the very basis of the glorious doctrine in which I rejoice.—When we believe, as I am compelled to, that Pope spake volumes of meaning in the short sentences, "Whatever is, is right,"

"All are but parts of one stupendous whole, Whose body nature is, and God the soul;"

and then associate that sentiment with the popular doctrine, that by far the greater part of the human family are fore-ordained by the all-benevolent Parent of our spirits to wail the unending sounds of ceaseless wo, it seems to carry with it a sickly sentiment, better calculated to engender misanthropic feelings and irreverence to God, than any thing becoming the age in which we live. How deprecia-tingly does "infant damnation" speak of the character of a just Author of all things? That a benevolent God, whose goodness is infinite, should create a being and force upon it existence, and fore-ordain it to interminable wo, and that being a helpless, innocent infant, which never cherished an evil thought, is at once horrible and shocking to all humanity. And hence this doctrine is becoming almost universally obnoxious, and will soon pass from the creed books of men. May its death be soon witnessed!

But what better is that doctrine which decrees any being to endure the pains of endless wo; so long as that decree existed long before that being existed, or did any good or evil? I am indeed, unable to behold any difference. When, therefore, we prove all things to be "foreordained of God," we have advanced an almost irresistible argument in favor of the final holiness and happiness of all mankind. Hence it appears to me to form the very basis of Universalism. This alone drove me from the dreary and gloomy regions of Partialism. Believing that mankind generally possess, in common with myself, the principles of philanthropy, I am unwilling to believe that candid and serious minds, at least, will long cling very tenaciously to the opinion, after becoming familiar with the case, that Pharaoh, for instance, whose frail natural heart was more than once softened by witnessing the power of God exhibited in Moses, which caused him to promise the release of the Israelites, and as many times hardened again by the power of Omnipotence "that he should not let them go," should in justice endure endless misery. God raised up Pharaoh (according to Scripture) to act the very part that he did act. In short, he compelled him to do as he did do. And for what? That he might justly be sentenced to endure interminable misery? What sane person will argue thus? What then shall be Pharaoh's future fate? God is of course eternal in existence. He was anterior to all other existences—and all others necessarily proceed from Him. He is therefore literally the Creator of all things, whether we denominate them good or bad. And is the Deity infinite in wisdom, goodness and power, and is he less so in justice, mercy, and his other attributes? In short, is the Deity a PERFECT BEING, and infinite in all his attributes? Could he then produce things in direct opposition to his own nature, and in actual hostility to his own views? For perfection thus to produce imperfection (except in the sense of unfinishedness,) the correct reasoner will declare impossible. "Good and evil, each being positive and exclusive, can not stand related to each other as parent and offspring." An assertion to that effect would be self-contradictory. Was the Deity, in the morning of time as he is now, infinite in goodness and purity? From a necessity arising out of his own nature, he wished a creation free from blemish.—None other could be acceptable to him, or worthy of him. An intention to produce one marked with imperfection, would have testified to his own imperfection conclusively. I mean his imperfection in morals. Was he, as he is now, infinite in knowledge and wisdom? He comprehended of course, every requisite to accomplish his desire. Was he, as he is now, infinite in power? He was perfectly competent to the execution of his design. Creation, then, must have been originally perfect, and in complete accordance with the wishes of its Author.—This none will venture to dispute. Each part was in harmony with every other part, and adapted to the whole; and the whole was obedient to the God who made it. There was in it, no defect any more than in himself; nor could any power but his own produce one. But to allege that he of his own accord, and in opposition to his own moral nature, which consists in perfect goodness, holiness, truth and unchangeableness of purpose, would capriciously and carelessly mar his own work, would be a charge against him, marked alike with presumption and absurdity. It would be to assert the production of an effect, not only without a cause, but in opposition to every existing cause. Between every effect and its cause, there prevails, of necessity a native affinity. In other words every thing produces in its own likeness. Good directly produces good—when associated with and aided by competent power, it is impossible for it to produce evil. From what source, then, can evil proceed. From evil alone; or from some sort of imperfection, which is itself virtually an evil. In the commencement of duration, when the Deity dwelt in immensity alone, no evil existed either in act or intention. The Deity himself was all in all; and he was all perfection. How then could evil gain an existence? It could not gain it at all, except through the paradox of an effect without a cause; or what is still worse, an effect in opposition to all existing causes. Shall I be told that the Deity permitted evil, but did not produce it? I reply, that permitting the existence of evil, he, being the author of all things, created that which did produce it, and hence indirectly produced it himself, having the power to prevent it. In the strictest sense, therefore, by permitting it, he was accessory to it. By acting in such a way, man not only incurs blame, but subjects himself to punishment. One individual sees another about to commit murder, or any other act of felony, and having the power to prevent it, declines to do so. He always shares the guilt, and if strictly dealt with, the penalty also. Such, if I mistake not, is both the law and the practice. Let no mortal then, charge on the Deity that, which would stamp himself as a felon. If, then, positive evil does exist, the Creator of all things is as certainly the author of it, as he is of positive good.—The case is not in the slightest degree altered by alleging that he made men and angels free agents, and they perpetrated evil of their own accord.—When he gave them their freedom, he gave them also their propensities: for they could no more create their propensities, than they could themselves. His perfect fore-knowledge therefore, apprised him of the result. Yet he created and permitted them to proceed to the accomplishment of the deeds for which they are doomed to suffer endless misery. And this fate existed as perfectly in the divine mind in the morning of time, as at the present moment. What less can this amount to, than a desire that they should endure endless misery, and that the Author of their existence is the cause of this misery, this ultimate evil, having the power to prevent it? We are informed by an apocryphal writer, that "He never would have created any thing to have hated it." But what being could inflict an evil on another except he did hate it? All existences proceeded from the one eternal existence, and are subject to certain constitutional laws which are natural to, and co-evil with those existences in obedience to the decrees of Heaven. Those parts of man's actions which we call evil, are not absolutely so, for they are the natural and legitimate effects of certain causes which owe their existence to the great original and moving cause of all causes. The perfection of this original cause will not allow the existence of an absolute ultimate evil.

"Respecting man, whatever wrong we call,
May, must be right, as relates to all—"
And his final destiny.

But I may be asked, if "whatever is, is right," and if every thing exists in obedience to the will of Heaven, why we are held guilty and punished for certain acts? I have to regret that my limits will not allow me to do justice to this objection. But in illustration, permit me to ask the necessity of experiencing the sensation of thirst, for instance, in order that we may enjoy the pleasure of a draught of cold water? The sensation of thirst is disagreeable; call it an evil, if you please; but the pleasure of slaking that thirst far exceeds that evil; and yet without this thirst, we could not enjoy the greater pleasure of quenching it. Therefore the sensation of thirst is not an absolute evil; but, when connected with the end, a good, a blessing. And so with all just punishment, which is of course amendatory, and ever "yields the peaceable fruits of righteousness." But subject an individual to perpetual, endless thirsting, with no ability to quench it, and you at once create an absolute evil. And this evil, being absolute and exclusive, "can proceed from evil alone;" and this, as we have seen, is in opposition to all existing causes, and therefore can not be. Yet it has entered into the heads, (I hope not the hearts) of some persons, that millions on millions of our race are doomed to thirst in this world, not that they may enjoy the greater pleasure of quenching it by drinking at the life-giving stream flowing from the exhaustless fountain of the goodness and benevolence of the immaculate Parent of their existence, but that they may also be doomed to perpetual thirsting throughout the long and ceaseless ages of eternity, in obedience to the eternal decrees of an angry God, and the fiendish desires of a malignant devil. This belief charges the Deity with having created man, and bestowed on him propensities which he knew would bring him into vice. He then forbade him, under the most grievous penalty, to commit crime, which it was confidently known to him he would commit, in obedience to a principle of his nature which he had himself implanted in him, as a part of his constitution. Nor did this prohibitory command communicate to him any countervailing inclination. It was arbitrary, and in opposition to a principle of his nature. "The act of disobedience being committed, the Deity, offended at the issue of his own arrangements, inflicts" endless misery. "Such, is the representation given of the Ruler of the universe, whose nature is perfect," and whose dealing is just.

But I am already too prolix for Br. Grosh's convenience, and must therefore close this article, notwithstanding I have many more arguments in my possession to corroborate those already adduced.

DEVOTION.

How repugnant to the reason of the moralist, it is to see the immaculate character of the Creator of the universe, insulted by the profanity of a certain class of persons, properly styled anthropomorphites, who infinitely detract from the attributes of the omnipresent God, by representing him in the capacity of a local Deity, subject to human passions, and emotions, and passing rapidly from place to place; before whom they prostrate themselves, like indignant beggars by the way side, with saddened hearts and tearful eyes, and feign to move his affections and excite his pity by mournful entreaties, and to inform him at the height of their voices, of things that he was before unacquainted with. Such insufferable conduct as this, can not fail to excite the disgust and arouse the indignation of every sensible man who regards the Deity as infinite and immutable in all his attributes, and not capable of being moved by entreaty—to change the purpose in the plan of his divine government. For since immutability is an essential attribute of God, our devotions can alone work their effects upon ourselves, and not upon the Moral Governor of the universe, who has so constituted man, and adapted him to the material world, that right prayer necessarily works a moral change upon him. By honestly offering up our devotions to the Supreme Being, we are made more perfectly sensible of our dependance upon him, and by humbly acknowledging this dependance in the attitude of prayer, we satisfy the demands of a magisterial conscience, which by giving its approval, sends a flow of soothing feeling through the system, that calms the ebullitions of discordant passion, and affords much happiness to the devotees. Prayer enlightens and quickens our moral feelings, and enables us to see more distinctly the excellencies of God, and the beauty and perfections of his works in the strongest light, and turns the eye of our minds, intently upon them. By pouring out our pious sentiments and desires before him, a change of temper is effected in our minds, and a right disposition is produced in us to receive his grace, and hence, since the legitimate object of the sacred institution of prayer can not be intended to work a change upon the immutable Deity, but upon ourselves, those who profanely approach him in the attitude of devotion, and address him as a being possessed like themselves, of passions and subject to emotions, must necessarily be the most mistaken of mankind. Says Lord Kaimes, "the Being that made the world, governs it by laws that are inflexible; because they are the best—and to imagine that he can be moved by prayer, obligation or sacrifice, to vary his plan of government, is an impious thought, degrading the Deity to a level with ourselves." And again says John Heylen, D. D., Prebendary of Westminster, "the proper end of prayer is not to inform God of our wants, or to persuade him to relieve them; omniscient as he is, he can not be informed; merciful as he is, he can not be persuaded."

Hear this, ye anthropomorphites, who are daily insulting the Majesty of heaven, and disgracing the name of humanity, and hearken to the voice of kind entreaty, reform the errors of your ways, and worship the omnipotent, omniscient and omnipresent God, in a manner suitable to his celestial dignity.

LETTER FROM BR. J. GAGE.

Br. A. B. Grosh—Dear Sir, Since I last wrote you, I have commenced preaching at Paw-Paw, (the county town of Van Buren Co.) one fourth of my time, on a small salary, for the ensuing year. I have assisted in forming a society there, since I commenced preaching with them, of about twenty members, (if my recollection serves me,) with encouraging prospects of future success and usefulness. The remaining portion of my time I preach where duty or inclination leads, and have many more calls on my attention than I can supply—so that, for the present, at least, I might be in fellowship with the Genesee Association, without incurring the danger of being disciplined for non-performance of ministerial labor.

Br. Queal has lately arrived in the "Far west," as you "Way-down-easters" term it, and has commenced preaching at South Bend, Indiana, every Sunday. South Bend is about twenty six miles from my residence. I have written to Br. Queal, and have sent several verbal communications to him, but I have not yet seen him, or heard personally from him.

I hope Br. J. S. Kibbe will not forget his former instructor and friend, and fail to call on me during his western tour.

What amount of pecuniary support a ministerial laborer might find here, were one to settle among us, I can not say with any degree of certainty, I feel confident, however, that a fair compensation would be extended for talent and services rendered in the cause of divine truth. A strong desire to learn "the truth, the way, and the life," is beginning to be manifested among the people. Public attention is awake and awakening. The field is large, in this section of the state, and laborers few.

As for myself, my time is very much taken up, and my attention distracted by so great a variety of secular employments, as leaves me but few moments for ministerial preparation. What little of zeal or influence I possess, therefore, shall be exerted in behalf of any worthy, devoted ministerial brother who will settle near me.

We celebrated Christmas eve, at Paw-Paw, in a manner becoming the occasion. The court house was filled to excess with anxious and attentive hearers of all denominations, and of no denomination; and as I looked upon the crowded mass of human and intelligent beings, assembled for the purpose of doing honor and reverence to the name and birth of Christ, I felt an impulse of spirit, like that, I imagine, which pervaded the soul of the Psalmist when he said,

"I was glad when they said unto me,

Let us go into the house of the Lord,

Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem!"

I rejoiced that I was born in a Christian land, and that I had been taught to bow at the name of Christ. This impulse triumphed over a deep felt conviction of my own inability of mind, to impart suitable instruction and edification to the mass of mind assembled around me, on an occasion so interesting, and sustained me in the performance of the important duties assigned me. I am no judge of music. But the services of the choir were, to me, interesting and cheering; and the whole congregation appeared to join, in making melody in their hearts, to God, in the song of praise and thanksgiving for the gift of his Son. Such seasons are bright spots amid the pathway of human existence. May they be more generally witnessed and felt among us. As ever your friend,

"HINTS ON PROPHECY."

BY M. STUART, PROFESSOR IN ANDOVER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

The little work, whose title-page heads this article, is a valuable addition to the cause of genuine Biblical Interpretation. With one or two exceptions, its rules for explaining the prophecies, are clear and unanswerable. Its exposition of the fallacious mode of giving two senses to Bible-language; the one obvious, and the other hidden or mystical, is able and worthy of all acceptance. Its plan for defining and applying the periods of time, spoken of in the writings of the prophets, is accurate, and thoroughly destructive of that enthusiastic fanaticism, which, to answer its own ends has fancifully applied those periods of time to various years in almost every century from the days of the apostles as the season of the destruction of the earth. I have derived so much information from Professor Stuart's book, that I hope every preacher in our order will obtain a copy of it.—For most of the "Hints" therein given, if carried out to careful study, will result in a more accurate understanding of the Holy Scripture.

My principal object in noticing the work, is to call attention to a fact of a very gratifying character. In explaining the Book of Revelations, we have constantly told those who persist in applying its language to scenes in another world, that the expressions found in the first and last chapters, have a very important bearing in determining its meaning. For when it is said of things, that they "must shortly come to pass," "for the time is at hand"—when it is said, "these sayings are faithful and true; and the Lord God of the holy prophets sent his angel to shew unto his servants the things which must shortly be done"—we affirm, that these statements prove that John was speaking of events, which, instead of referring to a supposed, far-distant day of general judgment, were to be accomplished very near the time in which he wrote his book.

We are happy to perceive that Professor Stuart has admitted and manfully defended this argument, in interpreting the largest portion of the book of Revelations. He says, after quoting the passages above given:—"The coming of Christ is the main subject of the book; so that the declaration here is, that what the book contains will speedily be accomplished." p. 106. Again he says:—"The great mass of the book respects events in reality to be accomplished speedily, or speedily to commence being completed. On these the writer dwells at length, and spreads them out from chapter vi: 1, to chapter xix: 21." Again he says:—"It would seem to follow, from the positions thus laid down, that we are at liberty or rather that we are obliged, if possible, to seek for a fulfilment of the predictions in the main body of the Apocalypse, within a time which is not far distant from the period when the book was written. If such a fulfilment can be found as coincides with the periods named in the Apocalypse, then what good reason can be offered why we should reject it? Or rather: Why are we not exegetically obliged to admit it?" p. 108. This instruction is clear—and is such, we think, as the language of the Revelator fully proves.

But let us see what results from it. In those chapters, beginning with the sixth and ending with the nineteenth, we find such passages as the following:—"And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every freeman, hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains; and said to the mountains and rocks, fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb: for the great day of his wrath is come; and who shall be able to stand?" vi: 15, 16, 17. In chapter ix: 1, we find the phrase, "bottomless pit." In chapter xiv: 10, 11, we read thus:—"The same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation; and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb; and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever." In chapter xix: 20, we are informed that the beast and the false prophet were "both cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone."

These passages, we all know, have been and are now used as descriptive of scenes in the world of immortality. They are repeated again and again as proof of the dreadful torments of an endless hell, which are said to await sinners. But Professor Stuart, of high orthodox eminency, applies them, together with all the other passages in those chapters, to events which were "to be accomplished speedily" after John wrote his book. He does not offer even a hint that they are applicable to the future world. Hence he says:—"What John declared would take place shortly, happened according to his prediction; and if so, the dispute, whether it is all to happen over again, after so many centuries, can not be a dispute of much interest or importance. One fulfilment is enough." p. 136.

This is well. We are glad to see so much light on the book of Revelation, coming, as it does, from a believer in endless misery. And yet we wonder that he and his brethren do not see that these passages are as strong as any which they adduce to prove endless misery—and if they have mistaken these, why not others? But we must wait patiently. The sun does not rise at once from midnight. The dawn must first come—the morning must appear—and then the sun. The morning has already come. The sun will soon appear, and lead all men to worship God through him who is the "Saviour of the world." G. W. M.

REVIVAL OF RELIGION...NO. III.

"O Lord, revive thy work in the midst of the years."
HAB. iii: 2.

4. False revivals are often attended with suicide.—The eloquent and pious Saurin declared, that he found in the thought of endless misery, "a mortal poison, which diffused itself into every period of his life, rendering society tiresome, nourishment insipid, pleasure disgusting, and life itself a cruel bitter." If the bare thought of endless woe could produce such effects, is it any marvel that when the fear of the same has become aroused to the highest pitch, by the most terrifying and appalling descriptions, the individual should despair of mercy, and rush upon self destruction? O, how many poor victims have fallen beneath the power of false revivals! And the list of such is being increased every day. There is scarcely a wind that blows, but wafts to us the sad tale of some unfortunate being who has been driven to insanity and suicide, through the agency of religious excitements.

But did the preaching of Christ ever make men and women crazy, and cause them to commit suicide?—Were any made to despair of the mercy of God by the sermon he delivered on the mount? Did his labors in any form, for converting the sinful and restoring the lost, ever drive people over the brink of self-destruction? No, never! He came to preach good tidings to the poor, and bind up the broken-hearted. He came to open the eyes of the blind, and to make the sorrowing glad. And in all his efforts for the salvation of sinners, instead of bruising, he bound up—instead of killing, he made alive.

How was it when that great revival took place on the day of Pentecost, and five thousand were converted under the preaching of Peter? Were any made to destroy themselves in a fit of insanity? No—but there was rejoicing and praise among them all. And well there might be; for in his sermon the apostle declared to them, that God had spoken of the restitution of all things, by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began. He uttered not a word concerning the wrath of the Almighty. He never used the word hell once. He threatened no soul with unending torture. But he concluded his discourse by saying, "Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed. Unto you first, God having raised up his son Jesus, sent him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities." Acts iii: 25, 26. The reader can judge whether there is any thing in such preaching, to drive men to despair and suicide.

5. False revivals are followed by injurious consequences to society. This has already been made to appear to a certain extent, but we refer now to their general influences. Instead of adding to the sum of benevolence and human good, they actually take from the same; for it is as evident as any fact can be, that their results are an increase of intolerance and bigotry. They check the current of a broader humanity, seal up the fountains of universal sympathy, and narrow down the kindly feelings of the heart. The observation of every one will convince him of the truth of this. And how can it be otherwise, where every sentiment put forth is cramped and contracted?—where every man is condemned who does not worship by this or that creed?—where human nature is spurned as though it were of paltry consideration?—and where threatening and denunciation take the place of sober argument, calm appeal, and affectionate persuasion?

But we will not dwell longer on this part of our subject. We have given some marks by which false revivals of religion may be known. And to those which bear these marks, we have been decidedly and forever opposed; and we believe it to be our solemn duty to warn our fellow men against them. But as we have previously remarked, we are not, and never have been opposed to a genuine revival of religion. Not for the purpose of adding members to "our church,"—but to make men better in all churches, and to increase the sum of human good.

The circumstances under which community is placed owing to the prevalence of incorrect and hurtful principles and habits, demand a revival of that old fashioned religion mentioned by St. James, which consisted in visiting the widow and fatherless in their affliction, and in keeping one's self unspotted from the world. That religion which is brought to view in the language of the Saviour when he said, "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you;" and the very spirit of which burst forth from his lips on the cross—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

That we might see this religion brought out into living action, the Saviour has furnished a case aside from his own. See Luke x: 30-37. Now we want a revival of just such religion as this in our midst—a religion that consists in doing as this Samaritan did. And we need not be afraid of having too much of it; for the more we have, the more we shall be like Christ, who died for his enemies—the more we shall be like God, whose love has never been turned away from the sinner.

This religion of which we speak, is summed up in the language of the angels at the birth of Messiah, "Peace on earth, and goodwill toward men." It stands written in full, in the life and character of the Saviour. We read it in the declaration of his, that love to God and man comprises the whole sum and substance of the law and the prophets. And it is revealed in the interrogation of old, "What doth the Lord require of thee, but to deal justly, and love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?"

As we have but just remarked, we need a revival of just such religion as this in the midst of our community. Let us then, pray, "O Lord, revive thy work in the midst of the years." And while we thus pray, let us act; for prayer unaccompanied with effort, will be of no avail. Let us take hold of the work in earnest, as though we were determined to carry it through. Let us make it a matter of united exertion, and each and every one endeavor to cultivate the spirit of an enlarged faith in his heart, and to live it out in his every act, and every word. In this way we may have a revival of religion—not one that sets friends at variance—that arrays the husband against the wife, and the wife against the husband—that builds up partition walls in society, and destroys long existing attachments—we have had enough of such revivals—but one that will heal all divisions, that will do away with discord and strife, banish all unkindness, and make all things new.

With the light of a New Year dawning upon us, it were well to pause, and review, and consider. As disagreeable as the task may be, it will do us no harm; for a knowledge of wherein we have failed, will lead us to guard against that failure in after years.

There is not that individual living, who from the heart can say, "I have received, during the year that is past, more evil at the hands of God than good." I care not how much he may have been afflicted, nor how much of sorrow may have entered his heart, he can not say that he has not been surrounded by blessings, which more than counterbalance the ills of grief that have been visited upon him. The same kind Being who cared for us in our infancy, has cared for us through the year that is past, and cares for us now. If we will but look back, we shall see that this is so. We shall read enough to convince us doubting as we may have been, that in God we have a Father who regards us with an eye of more than mortal tenderness.

But with the evidences of this Father's love all around us, and meeting the eye every where as we look back over the past year of our existence, how many proofs of returning gratitude do we find?—of the thankful overflowings of hearts in love with God, and at peace with the world?—Alas, but few! Blessed in ten thousand ways by the parental hand of God—cared for in our dependence—protected in our weakness—supplied in our destitution, we have been unthankful and disobedient; forgetting the blessings we have received, and the watch-care that has overshadowed us.

Through his temporal bounties and favors, and through the grace manifested in the Gospel, God speaks to us every day, and calls upon us to be up and doing. But there is a way different from these in which he speaks solemnly to the heart—it is through his providential dispensations. And in these he has spoken to us all during the year that has passed. To the mother God spake when the child she loved was snatched from her embrace by the hand of death. To the father, when his son was cut down in the morning of his manhood and usefulness. To the sister, when a brother's remains were gathered to the silence of the grave. To us all, when a friend, or neighbor, or fellow citizen has been laid in the narrow house appointed for all living. Through these providences has God been knocking at the door of our hearts, and asking for an interview with the soul. And yet the warning voice has gone up in vain. The pleadings of God's goodness have fallen upon unlistening ears. The calls of a Father's love have been unheard and unanswered. And this is but a faint and imperfect picture of man's ingratitude. Like Isaac of old, he has forsaken the fountain of living waters, and in a spiritual idolatry has forgotten God. O, how much need we have to pray, "Lord, revive thy work in the midst of the years!" Call us back unto thy pleasant and easy service. Fill our hearts with gratitude for thy mercies. Place our feet in the way of life everlasting, and cause us to live to thy glory.

Let us all form the resolution now, that we will endeavor to profit by our past experience, to rectify whatever has been amiss in our conduct, that each succeeding year, may find us more true, more faithful, more obedient, and more blest!

COMFORTABLE BAPTISM.

In one of the principal Baptist churches in Boston, not content with having a baptistery in the broad aisle, they have also built an apparatus for warming the water. We approve of having things made as comfortable as possible for those who think the ceremony necessary, and have no doubt that a warm bath will add to the comfort, cleanliness and health of some of their subjects. It is a pity, however, that they do not administer the ceremony oftener, or put some of their converts and preachers to soak over night. But while we approve of this new improvement, there are some who demur at it, and even ridicule it. One talks of giving their converts a hard scald—another, of their converts coming out like biscuit, piping hot—and Br. Whittemore even proposes that the Baptists alter the passage which they so much delight to quote, ("And John, also, was baptizing in Enon, because there was much water there.") in their new translation of the Bible, so as to read—"And John also was baptizing in the broad aisle, because the box of heated water was there."

BR. GREGORY'S CASE.

Rev. John Gregory, formerly of this State, now of Quincy, Mass., was, some years ago, accused of bigamy, on account of some informality in his divorce from his first wife, and his marriage to a second. The case was fully examined by the discipline committee of the Massachusetts Convention of Universalists, who reported that he was free from any moral guilt or wrongdoing in the matter. Since then, he withdrew from our fellowship, but retained his connexion with the society in Quincy, as its pastor. Last fall he was elected to the legislature, after which he was arrested on the charge of bigamy. A meeting of all the denominations in Quincy was held, and much indignation manifested at the conduct of his accusers. We perceive that the case has passed to the grand Jury, which, after examining witnesses against Mr. Gregory, from Vermont, Massachusetts, and this State, says the charge is not sustained, and has dismissed the case. [F] Thus another of M. H. Smith's falsehoods is nailed to the counter, first by an indignation meeting of Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Unitarians and Universalists, and now by a Grand Jury.

DEATHS.

In Butternuts, on Monday, 26th of September, 1842, Mr. NATHAN LULL, in the 85th year of his age.

Mr. Lull came to Butternuts, five years before the revolutionary war, when the country was almost an entire wilderness, and was driven off for a few years by the Indians and British. Soon after the close of the revolution, he, with his father and four brothers, returned and reared large and respectable families in Butternuts. He was the last surviving brother of the five. He was among the first settlers of the region of Butternuts Creek, and was familiar with all those peculiar scenes which so severely tried the patriotism and firmness of our early fathers. Of the confidence of the public, and the friendship of every class of community, he shared richly, for the space of a long and useful life.

His death was sudden and unexpected. He had risen and walked out in the morning, feeling refreshed and invigorated by a good night's rest, and sat down to his breakfast, but was found a few minutes afterwards, removed a few feet from the table, sitting in his chair, but the spark of life had forever fled.

The writer of this notice saw him but a few days before his death, and conversed with him freely upon his prospects of future happiness. His mind was strong, and his hopes clear and bright for another and better life. He professed himself ready and willing to depart from this earth, whenever it should please God to call him away; and which, he said to the writer in a very serious tone of voice, would be in a very few days.

Mr. Lull had for many years been a firm believer in the final restoration of all the human race. His funeral took place at the Universalist church, on the 29th day of the month, when a crowded audience of all denominations attended, and the writer addressed them upon the following words, in Rev. xiv. 13. "And I heard a voice from heaven, saying unto me, Write, Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them."

Every thing appeared solemn and impressive, and we believe that much good was done in the name of the Lord Jesus.

D. PICKERING.

In Cazenovia, of consumption, Dec. 23d, Mr. DENNIS L. COBB, aged 23 years. May the surviving friends and mourners of the deceased, be supported by the truth of the Christian religion, and thus be reconciled to God. W. J. G.

DEATH OF REV. NEHEMIAH DODGE.—Our venerable Br. Dodge is no more! He departed this life at his residence in New London, Ct., on the morning of the 3d inst., in the 73d year of his age.

His health had been declining, and the infirmities of age multiplying upon him for the last six or seven years. For some months past he was conscious that his pilgrimage was nearly ended, and he seemed to be preparing for the hour of death.

Br. Dodge was born in Canterbury, Ct., on the 3d of July, 1770, and was therefore at the time of his death precisely 72 years and 6 months old, even to an hour. His parents were both members of the Baptist church, but his mother survived his birth but a few weeks. At the age of 15 he experienced religion, and wrote a hymn expressive of his feelings at the time, which he was kind enough to repeat during my last interview with him. Though it possesses no poetical merit, it has a value derived from far different considerations, and my readers will be gratified to see a verse or two of it here.

"When I was sinking into hell,
The Saviour caught me as I fell,
And there revealed his lovely face,
Where I beheld his pardoning grace.

Wondering with sweet surprise I stood,
And realized the love of God—
A boundless sea without a shore,
Which I had never seen before."

He entered the Gospel ministry in the Baptist connexion when at the age of 19. An elder brother was in the ministry before him, in the same denomination. After preaching in different places in the States of New York, Vermont and New Hampshire three or four years, he returned to Connecticut, and shortly after removed to the western part of the township of New London, now called East Lyme. Here he became acquainted with Mrs. Dodge, whom he married in 1794. In 1795 he was ordained an Evangelist by the Baptist Association held at Richmond, R. I., the late Rev. Mr. Grafton, of Newton, Mass., preached his ordination sermon. After his ordination he settled at Southington, Ct., where he labored for three years, and during this period baptized and received into the fellowship of the church, between sixty and seventy members. From Southington he removed to Cheshire, and finally to Lebanon, Ct., where he preached for 10 years, and built up a flourishing society there. In 1815 he removed from Lebanon to New London, and soon commenced his labors with the Baptist church and society in that place. At that time the church and congregation were in a very wretched condition, few in number and poor to a proverb. Their meeting house was unfinished—a mere shell—and barely tenable. Mr. Dodge commenced his labors here in 1815, emphatically "without money and without price." The church prospered under his ministry, and in a single season, he added more than fifty members to it. Indeed, during his six or seven years labors there, he raised the church from a state of almost nothingness to a respectable rank for numbers and influence in the place. He was emphatically the father of it.

About 1820 or '21, however, after a thirty years ministry in the Baptist connexion, as he was preparing a sermon on the subject of Christian hope, and comparing scripture with scripture, the great thought was forced upon his mind, that the hope of the Gospel could not be more limited than the promises on which that hope rests. The truth of Universalism flashed across his mind, but he could not readily receive it. Still it gave him great uneasiness, and he spent almost his whole time over his Bible. Sometimes even when ready to retire for the night, a passage of Scripture or some new train of thought, would suggest itself, and demand his attention, and so earnest was he in his inquiry for the truth, that neither cold nor fatigue could prevent him from giving it immediate consideration, and nearly the whole night was frequently employed in this way. He resolved to seek the truth, and to follow the truth, let it lead him where it would, and to profess and preach it, let its profession cost him what it might. He did so, and after a year or two of patient and faithful study of the Scriptures, he was led to receive the truth as it is in Jesus, embracing the great doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all mankind through a crucified Redeemer.

At that time Universalism was almost unknown in New London, and the region round about. There was but one person in the place who was a professor of the faith, and one other who had some books in favor of the doctrine, and was, therefore, justly suspected of being inclined to it. That avowed believer still lives and rejoices in the faith. She was one of Murray's earliest hearers in New England, and the seed sown by that man of God found good soil in her then youthful heart. Mr. Dodge was excommunicated for believing in universal salvation, and that too, by the very church which he had contributed so much to build up!

For about 20 years he had been confirmed in the faith of a world's salvation, and had preached the doctrine pretty widely during that time in the State of Connecticut and elsewhere. He was for a year or two the settled pastor of Prince st. church, in this city, and unfortunate it was for the congregation there, that he ever left. His labors, for the the most part, since he became a Universalist, have been of the itinerant character, and successful. Since his return to New London in the autumn of 1841, his labors there have been greatly blessed, and are to be regarded as one of the causes of the prosperity attending our cause in that place. Instead of one solitary person as it was in 1822, who could sympathise with him in his religious views and hopes, he lived, thank God, to see several scores of good and faithful hearts in New London, earnestly engaged in the cause that he so much loved, and for which he had so faithfully pleaded. He lived to see, thank God, a Universalist church begun in that place, and its foundation laid with every prospect of its going up and being completed, and becoming a sanctuary where God would delight to meet with his people and bless them.

It was hoped by many of our Orthodox friends in New London and its vicinity, that Br. Dodge would have renounced his faith in Universalism before he died. But the expectations of certain people seem born but to perish. He disappointed all such mistaken hopes. He knew in whom he trusted. He well knew the ground on which he stood, and a long and painful sickness, and the prospect of approaching death, had no power to shake his faith in the great doctrines of universal love, and grace, and salvation.—N. ### LIGHT.

"Bright effluence of bright essence increate!
Before the sun, before the heavens, thou wert."—Milton.

From the quickened womb of the primal gloom
The sun rolled black and bare,
Till I wove him a vest for his Ethiop breast,
Of the threads of my golden hair;
And when the broad tent of the firmament
Arose on his airy spars,
I penciled the hue of its matchless blue,
And spangled it round with stars.

I painted the flowers of the Eden bowers,
And their leaves of living green,
And mine were the dyes in the sinless eyes
Of Eden's virgin queen;
And when the Fiend's art on her trustful heart,
Had fastened its moral spell,
In the silvery sphere of the first born tear
To the trembling earth I fell.

When the waves that burst o'er a world accursed
Their work of wrath had sped,
And the Ark's lone few, the tried and true,
Came forth among the dead—
With the wondrous gleams of my braided beams,
I bade their terrors cease,
As I wrote on the roll of the storm's dark scroll
God's covenant of peace.

Like a pall at rest on a pulseless breast,
Night's funeral shadow slept,
Where shepherd swains on the Bethlehem plains
Their lonely vigils kept;
When I flashed on their sight the herald bright
Of heaven's redeeming plan
As they chanted the morn of a Saviour born—
Joy, joy to the outcast Man!

Equal favor I show to the lofty and low,
On the just and unjust I descend; E'en the blind whose vain spheres roll in darkness and tears,

Feel my smile the blest smile of a friend:
Nay, the flower of the waste by my love's embrace,
As the rose in the garden of kings;
At the chrysalis bier of the worm I appear,
And lo! the gay butterfly's wings!

The desolate Morn, like a mourner forlorn,
Conceals all the pride of her charms,
Till I bid the bright Hours chase the Night from her bowers,

And lead the young Day to her arms:
And when the gay rover seeks Eve for his lover,
And sinks to her balmy repose,
I wrap their soft rest by the zephyr-fanned west,
In curtains of amber and rose.

From my sentinel steep by the night-brooded deep,
I gaze with unslumbering eye,
When the cynosure star of the mariner
Is blotted from the sky;
And guided by me through the merciless sea,
Though sped by the hurricane's wings,
His compassless bark, lone weltering, dark,
To the haven-home safely he brings.

I waken the flowers in their dew-spangled bowers,
The birds in their chambers of green,
And mountain and plain glow with beauty again,
As they bask in my maternal sheen.
O if such the glad worth of my presence to earth,
Though fitful and fleeting the while,
What glories must rest on the home of the blest,
Ever bright with the DEITY'S smile! W. P. P.

THE MOTHER AND THE DAUGHTER.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JEST AND EARNEST."

"Small squibs and sentences, and these paper bullets of the brain, awe a man from the career of his humor!"
SHAKESPEARE.

In a pretty little cottage at Richmond, commanding a delightful view of the Thames, lived Madame La Roche and her only child Adeline.

At an early age, the parents of Madame La Roche had taken her from her native country, England, to France, in order that her education might be completed.
Here a certain Monsieur La Roche, a man much older, and also much richer than herself, had solicited her hand.

In obedience to the commands of her parents, and in spite of her strongly expressed aversion, the match was concluded, the elderly husband and the young wife took up their abode in Paris. Three years afterwards, Monsieur La Roche died, leaving one child, a daughter.
Since that event, Madame La Roche had resided in Switzerland first, and subsequently in Germany. At length, tired of the continent, she returned to England, where she had now lived two years, and where she firmly intended to spend the remainder of her days.

As woman is placed in our present social system, perhaps the most independent and life-enjoying of the sex is a young and attractive widow. Madame La Roche was both young and attractive, and sensible, too, or she would have been envious of her sweet daughter Adeline. As it was, she treated her with the warmth of a mother, and the confidence of an elder sister.

On a certain summer day, Adeline La Roche was seated in a room opening on a fine lawn, which sloped to the river. By her side, and close by her side, was a man youthful and handsome. He held one of her hands in his, and was looking with a most impassioned air into her face. Her eyes were cast down, and the slightest suspicion of a blush was upon her cheek. The blush would have been deeper—but it was a situation she was used to. They loved each other.

"And you fear, George, that mamma would never consent?" said Adeline, continuing a colloquy that had been proceeding, heaven knows how long; for in such eases, (I'm told,) hours are like minutes.

"I fear it much," said George Trevor; "what pretensions have I? A man of wealth and consideration, like Mr. Crofton, may hope—but I can hope for nothing."

"Ha! ha! you are jealous," said Adeline, looking up and smiling archly. "Do you distrust me then?"

"No, dear Adeline," replied George; "I do believe that your heart is mine, and mine only; but say if I have not cause for suspecting that Mr. Crofton is my rival, and that your mamma favors him?"

"Now you mention it," said Adeline, "I will confess to you that I am very miserable on this account.—
Ever since we first met Mr. Crofton at that horrid ball, he has been eternally at the house. He must perceive how coldly I receive him."

"And how does Madame La Roche receive him?"
said Trevor.

"Ah, too well!" replied Adeline. "I often see them sitting together in a corner talking in a low tone, and every now and then looking towards me, as if I were the subject of their conversation. He is trying to gain mamma over to his interest, I know. It will be of no use if he does. I would sooner die than marry him."

"So, having experienced the misery of a forced match herself, she would doom you to the same fate?" said George Trevors with vehemence.

"I hardly know what to think," said Adeline, gently.
"When I remember how affectionately she always treats me, it seems impossible; but when I see her encourage so evidently the visits of Mr. Crofton, I am compelled to dread everything."

"We may be mistaken, after all, Adeline," said Trevor. "These visits are probably intended for Madame La Roche. Remember, Mademoiselle, you are not the only young and pretty inhabitant of Vine Cottage."

"Oh, I am sure that is not the case," said Adeline.
"Mamma has told me, often and often, that no consideration on earth should induce her to marry again, and that all her care now was to see me happily settled.
Mr. Crofton and mamma are now viewing the conservatory together. George, I feel a strange presentiment that he will propose formally for me during that opportunity, and that I shall be called upon to give him his answer at once."

"You will reject him, then, dear Adeline?" said Trevor, anxiously.

"Can you ask me?" exclaimed Adeline. "I will never bestow my hand where I can not bestow my heart.
That, George, is yours,—past praying for!"

"Ten thousand thanks for this one more proof of constancy," said Trevor. "To doubt your truth now, would indeed be to think you unworthy of love. But I hear footsteps approaching; they are returning from the conservatory. Adieu, dear Adeline, for a time. I will not meet Mr. Crofton—but I am not jealous, mind!"

Scarcely had George Trevor left the apartment when Madame La Roche, and Mr. Crofton entered from the lawn. Mr. Crofton rather precipitately took his leave, and Madame La Roche and Adeline were alone.

"Sit down, Adeline," said her mother; "I have something very particular to say to you."

Adeline obeyed with the air of a martyr. Her pre-sentiments had evidently been but too true.

"My dear child," continued Madame La Roche, "you are now of an age when you should begin to think of being settled in life. Nature has given you beauty and talents; I have, to the utmost of my ability, given you a good education; and I may say without flattery, that you are capable of making any man happy. Why, then, remain single if you meet with one for whom you can feel an affection?"

Adeline offered an observation, and Madame La Roche continued.

"There is a gentleman, who, I am certain, loves you;
I have seen enough of him to be as certain that he deserves your love in return, and it will give me pleasure if you tell me that he possesses it."

"My dear mamma," said Adeline, with firmness, "it is better to be candid at once; I know whom you mean and all you are going to say; but it is in vain. I do not love him, I never shall love him, and I can not marry him."

"Adeline, Adeline!" cried her mother, laughing,
"you are too quick by far for me. Do you not love, will you never love, and can not you marry—George Trevor?"

"George Trevor?" exclaimed Adeline, her breath nearly taken away by astonishment.

"Ay, George Trevor," said her mother. "So you blush now, and I was not mistaken, I find, in supposing that you loved each other. I am glad of it, dear child, and give my most willing consent to your union."

"I feared you would not listen to him, or I would have confided in you," said Adeline, half laughing and half crying at this sudden and unexpected realization of hopes she had scarcely dared to entertain.

"And that merely because at present he happens to be poor?" said Madame La Roche. "Ah, my Adeline!
it is love, not wealth, that should be considered; and if George Trevor be poor, are we not rich enough?—
But," continued she, holding down her head and speaking falteringly, "now that I have wished all happiness, and consented to your marriage, will you, dear little friend, wish me the same, and consent to my marriage?"

"You! you marry again!" exclaimed Adeline.
"And have you been so blind as to suspect nothing?"
said Madame La Roche, raising her head and smiling;
"I will conceal it from you no longer. You know that I was married in France at a very early age, but you do not know that before I had given my heart in England to a youth whose only fault was poverty. My parents had forbidden him the house, and on hearing of my engagement on the Continent, he went out in despair to India.
Some two months ago, you may remember, we were at a large ball. How can I describe to you my sensations when I saw there the man whom I had loved in my early youth—whom I still loved! I recognized him even before I heard his name."

"And that name was—Crofton," said Adeline, much affected.

"It was," replied Madame La Roche; "he had remained single, though he had grown rich enough to buy, if he had willed it, some poor girl, as I myself had been bought. Adeline, he has prevailed on me to change my resolution of never marrying again. Do you wish me joy?"

The mother and the daughter fell into each other's arms, and mingled their tears; but assuredly they were not tears of sorrow.

On the same morning the two weddings were celebrated, and opinions were divided whether the matronly or the youthful bride looked more charming.

CHARITY. A SERMON.

BY REV. S. J. GIBSON; MONROETON, PA.

"Put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness."
Col. iii: 4.

Charity is the main principle of the Christian religion. With this a man's professions stand out and proclaim to the world, that he has imbibed the spirit of the great Master; but without it, those professions pass, as they should, for little worth, and he becomes as "sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal." Still, notwithstanding this obvious truth—notwithstanding it is a subject of frequent record throughout the course of revelation, yet too often is it neglected, and not a few would atone for that neglect, by being over-much zealous in "the faith;" but in doing so, they seem to have forgotten the language of the apostle—"now abideth faith, hope, charity; these three, but the greatest of these is charity." Nay; so far as the practical qualities of the Christian religion are concerned, faith and hope become but minor principles, and all depends upon charity, heaven-born and beautiful. The evidences of this truth will be beheld by consulting the history of the founder of Christianity—that bountiful benefactor of man, and guide of the humble disciple. Follow him from the moment in which Bethlehem's star beamed upon the trembling shepherds, until darkness covered the land and the veil was rent in twain—until he cried out upon the cross and gave up the ghost, and you will find that this lovely virtue was his constant attendant. And this has been left as a guide to the disciple of after years—to him who professes to be a partaker of his spirit, this is the star to guide his footsteps, and to open up his pathway in the surrounding darkness; and if he suffer it to become bedimmed or beclouded, he is sure to stray from the habitations of peace and repose! In urging you, then, to make this virtue your constant attendant—that your fight may be worthy and your course commendable through the world; I shall divide the subject into three particulars, and in each endeavor to set forth the necessity of putting on charity, which is the bond of perfectness.

I. We should condemn no man, for the honest opinions which he may have imbibed, relative to the doctrines of the Christian religion, but ever have in remembrance the words of Paul—"let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind."

True, we may have an anxiety to liberate our neighbor, from errors which throng around his understanding; and it is even commendable that we should have this desire, yet uncharitable measures are not to be adopted in order to accomplish the purpose. The human mind was constituted for liberty. It will rest not as long as beclouded with error, unless it is bound by the strong hand of superstition or bows beneath the sceptre of bigotry. It wants but little aid in addition to its own powers, in order to be freed from bondage engendered by erroneous opinions, yet that aid must bear the impress of charity, to insure its success. Yet alas! there are by far too many, who pay no attention to this self-evident truth, but condemnation and reproach are heaped upon every individual, whose faith or belief bears a complexion different from their own. And not unfrequently, the class that has been treated in this uncharitable manner, when the members of the same ascend the scale until they become in the majority; they remember, not the things of old, but in turn are zealous in heaping reproach upon those who are yet in the minority. If you would have this fully verified, go back to a period of time from whence but a little more than two hundred years have fled away; and you will discover the Puritan fathers, as they were called, pleading before the monarch, for the privilege of making the solitary wilds of America their home! And what was it for? Because they had imbibed a faith different from that of the established church of their own country, and hence could not, unmolested, worship their Creator, as dictated by their own consciences. Liberty of opinion, or liberty of conscience beckoned and urged them onward! Within their frail barque they smiled upon the dangers of the ocean and traversed its heaving tide—moored their vessel hard by the rocks of Plymouth—stepped upon the coast, and saw before them the darkness of an unbroken wilderness. There roamed the wild beast in search of his prey, and the Indian bent his death-telling bow. There the melancholy night bird uttered her hideous note, and the panther sent aloft his thrilling cry. There the brawny forest tree bowed 'neath winter's howling blast, and such, such was the dwelling place of those who had left homes of affluence upon the other side of the broad waters! And again do you ask why they left their habitations of plenty, and made their abode in such a dreary, solitary place? Again I say, it was that they might worship the Almighty in agreement with the dictates of their own minds—that they might freely express their religious opinions, and enjoy the pleasures of open and social worship; unmolested by those uncharitable hands, that long had heaped upon them the weight of oppression. Their object was soon accomplished. The wilderness gave way before them, and they could assemble in their rudely constructed tabernacles, and enjoy that unspeakable blessing—liberty of conscience, or the right to worship as they thought proper.

But men live not for themselves alone, but for others; and especially for those who are to come up after them and tread the stage of life; and in consequence those who enjoyed this pleasing and happy privilege of worshipping the Creator as dictated by their own minds, were desirous that the blessed boon should be sent down to ages unborn, and how did they labor to accomplish this purpose? If we are to judge by their deeds, we can form none other conclusion, than that they declared, the privilege to be that of every one who should seek a home in their province, to think precisely as he thought proper respecting religious faith; providing that he thought right! Yes; and how was right? Precisely as they thought. And those who did not think right, were followed up and hunted by these men, as zealously as ever Protestant was followed by Catholic, as many a poor Baptist and Quaker can testify. Those same people who had plead for charity at the hands of their persecutors upon the other side of the broad waters—who had declared it the heaven-born right of man, to worship his Creator in agreement with his own conscientiousness—who had so loudly spoken against the uncharitable treatment which had been heaped upon them by others; defined liberty of religious faith to be, that every man might think as to him should seem proper, providing he thought right, or as they thought; and those who dared to have a different faith, were subjects of the most cruel and bitter persecution! There was that heaven-born charity which came down from the regions of immortality, to weave around the children of men the bond of perfection! There was that glorious principle shedding its gracious influences around the human heart; making the Christian perfect upon earth! There were the religion and spirit of the Master pouring their life-giving waters upon the famishing soul!—There? No! They were not. The bright beauteous orb of charity had been blotted from the heavens with the blackness of bigotry—the chief principle of religion lost, as it were, in the darkness which surrounded the world. Those who had by their professions set themselves forward as specimens of godliness, spared no pains in heaping reproach and contumely upon those who differed from them in matters of belief. Under such circumstances, how flimsy indeed were their professions? How far did they fall short of that example which had been set before them for a guide? Yet alas! there are many men of the present age, who will look back to those by-gone days—strongly condemn the proceeding, and still are acting upon the same principle.

Go back but a few years, and you will discover the humble Methodist, the subject of scorn and reproach on account of the peculiarities of his faith, and these heaped upon him too, by men who declared that the privilege was the natural inheritance of mankind; to believe as they should think proper. And now even, in many places and among many men, let the name of Universalism be mentioned, and surprise, horror, and condemnation are manifested in a moment; by those, too, who are loud in that praise of the institutions of our country—that our loved land furnishes a home for every sect! And those who bestowed such uncharitable treatment upon their fellow beings, would have us believe that they are looking heaven-ward for precepts by which to be guided—they have declared themselves followers of that meek and lowly Benefactor of man, who when reviled, reviled not again—and they have separated themselves from the world as examples of righteousness and piety! But methinks they are lacking at least in one thing. Though they may be clothed in many beautiful garments, yet there is one more beautiful than all which they have neglected to put on, and that is "Charity which is the bond of perfectness."

Permit me then, to urge upon every one who hears me this day, to profit by the things which are thus set before him. Throw the mantle of charity around your fellow-Christian. Condemn him not with unsparing hand because his religious faith differs from your own, and especially if his strife be to do the will of his Saviour above. Never make the boundary of your belief the line of condemnation between yourself and your brother man. And above all things, never think of delivering him from his erroneous opinions by the use of uncharitable means; for rest assured if such is your course, instead of accomplishing your object, you will sink him still more deep in his error—render him more confirmed in the false faith which he has received. See then, we beseech of you—see that ye walk circumspectly respecting this matter. While you declare yourself a believer in the doctrines of Christianity—while you stand out and worship the great Creator of the universe, and are sending up the grateful emotions of a thankful heart for the salvation of a lost and sinful world; then, if you would be a Christian indeed, "put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness."

II. We should be charitable when judging of the faults of others.

Mankind appear in the world in the possession of such constitutions, that no one can with truth declare that perfection is his inheritance. None are in possession of infallibility, or exempt from the blighting breath of imperfection. No man can say that he has no fault. Yet we all can more readily discover the faults of others than our own—the mote in a brother's eye, is sooner beheld than a beam in our own—and this often leads us to be uncharitable while judging of the misdemeanors of our fellow beings. Many an unfortunate man has been held in contempt—been regarded as a being almost if not quite unworthy of the blessing of Heaven, or the confidence of men; and all this for a fault, which if committed by those who are so zealous in condemning him, they would have witnessed it not, or at least remained blind to the deleterious influence now ascribed to it. But this is not as it should be. Every individual should turn his attention within—examine his own mind, and see if that is free from misdeeds, before he goes out to examine his neighbor and condemn him for his faults.

Moreover, when the conduct and actions of another are dwelt upon, we must bring many things into consideration and form a judgment, not upon mere outward appearances or by a contemplation of the act alone, but we should look to the motive and circumstances which prompted the deed. The heart is veiled from our sight, and we can not enter there and behold the emotions thereof, which if possible, in many instances where one is followed up with persevering hand, and condemnation laid upon his head, he would be commended even, for what he resisted—for going no farther astray from the pathway of rectitude, and then instead of plunging him deep in that gulf where he would be left to perish or drag out a miserable existence for life, Charity would approach and point out before him, with friendly hand, the way of wisdom, of peace and of life.

Again:—In judging of another's misdeeds, before coming to a final decision, we should invariably suppose a change of cases. How often do we behold the man of wealth—he to whom the ills of poverty are strangers—who has at his command the good things of this world, which serve to render human life a season of enjoyment:—how often, I say, do we behold that man looking down upon the man, who knoweth not the smiles of fortune, and following him with an unsparing hand on the account of his actions? But let there be a change of cases. Let the one become in possession of the affluence of the other—let the rich man step from his palace of wealth into the rude shed of poverty, and while a few helpless beings are sending up their longing, anxious looks for protection and support; there will be as great, if not greater difference in the actions of those individuals, than there was prior to that period; and he who had been so uncharitable in his condemnation of the other, will see the injustice of such a proceeding, and call aloud for charity. We urge upon you, then, before you condemn others for their faults, look well; search deep for that temptation which beset their minds—consider how powerful it was—with what force it operated upon their hearts and that it might have led you astray under like situations:—no is this all; but you can not look into the chambers of that mind and see the work of retribution which may be going on there—the anguish which is harrowing up the soul. All, all is veiled from your sight, and you know not how deeply the actor may regret his misdeed—how solemnly he may resolve within his own mind to pursue a different course in future; and say then, how should you look upon him and his deeds? With the piercing eye of condemnation? Declaring that he is unworthy of the confidence, or respect of others because he has violated a social law? No! never, never should this be done, for it is beneath the character of him who has declared himself a follower of the Son of God, and who looks to the Home of unbounded benevolence as the birthplace of his image. Ever should the conduct of others be scanned with a gentle eye.—The great truth should be had in remembrance, “to err is human, but to forgive is divine;” and directed by this noble sentiment, we should at all times “put on charity which is the bond of perfectness.”

III. We should be charitable to the wants of others, or it should be the great aim of the Christian, to labor for the purpose of alleviating the woes and distresses of mankind.

The Christian religion is an institution founded in such a manner—based upon such principles, that selfishness must be entirely excluded. Those who would have harmony exist between their professions and walk, must not only keep themselves unspotted from the world, but also visit the widow and fatherless in their afflictions, and bestow upon them that which will render their suffering less, and enable them to look upon human life, not as an evil, but as a blessing of unspeakable value. Yet this truth is often lost sight of—this, the most beautiful of all the Christian virtues, is often neglected, and there are by far too many, who would atone for that neglect, by promptness and zeal relative to the things of the sanctuary. Many will pass heedlessly by the suffering—turn a deaf ear to the solicitation of the child of wo, and yet, with a death-like grasp, cling to the forms of religious worship, and be the most deep and fervent of any in their addresses to the throne of grace.

An instance in support of this is furnished us by the melancholy death of the beggar boy in the city of New York, the present winter—but a few weeks past. It may be that he left home early in the morning, and in streets wandered afar; and was many times driven from the door of affluence, until at last his limbs, weary and benumbed with the cold, refused to perform their office, and while the wintry blast sighed a mournful requiem, he sank down upon his bed of ice! Oh! what thoughts think ye filled that soul? Perhaps they were of the widowed mother, as she sat over a few dying embers in her open habitation, waiting his return. And now, peradventure, he thought of those who clung to him with the affection of brothers and sisters—that with impatience and anxiety they were awaiting his arrival, supposing that he would bear them a morsel to allay the cravings of hunger. But alas! how are they to be disappointed. The mother oft stood by the broken windows, and gazed out into the darkness, in hope of catching a glimpse of her approaching child. But ah! sad is the tale. Away in the distant street, upon the cold ground, the night-frost curdled his blood, and his spirit winged its flight to the eternal world! But where—oh! where was the Christian—the follower of him who wept o’er others’ woes? Where those sympathetic chords that vibrate to the touch of affliction, and open the heart with benevolence? Where? Would that it were not thus. That in a city with her two hundred churches—with prayers and anthems of praise going up daily before the throne of God—that there was not charity sufficient to shield a beggar boy from an icy death: There were Christian fires within a few steps of his frosty death-bed, and Christian boards filled with plenty, and yet he must be left to perish with hunger and with cold! His death wail shall linger on the night winds, end echo in the gloom, a warning, a dread-telling seer to those who neglect to “put on charity which is the bond of perfectness!”

And you that are before me to-day—let the time be many long years in the future, ere you endeavor to make a compromise with your Father above—ere you shall attempt to send up your professions as a substitute for deeds of love, which you are required to perform towards your fellow-men.—Charity! Let this be your guide—make it to you like the polar star to the mariner benighted upon the mighty deep—suffer it not to become shaded with the darkness of selfishness, and rest assured, that its golden light will dawn upon, and open up a beautiful way before you. Follow this, and though it may guide you amid habitations where have wandered the grim spectres of want and of wo, yet soon will the solitary place rejoice, and the barren desert spring forth and blossom like the rose. A song will be awakened, that shall pour its deep-toned and life-giving music into the rejoicing soul—it will echo afar, and sink deep into other minds, and soon will many rise up and praise the beauties of that religion, pure and undefiled, which bears the impress of charity. Labor for the accomplishment of this, and then, when at last you backward cast one lingering look,—as you behold the many blessings which your charitable deeds have conferred upon the world, you will lie down with your mind undisturbed with the pangs of remorse, and silently the spirit wing its flight to a home of peace and repose, of endless happiness and lasting joy.—Amen, ## REGENERATION.

BY REV. E. R. CROCKER.

I find that in this section of country, our Limitarian friends are willing to admit that Universalists, as a body, are good moral people. They grant, likewise, that we preach good morality. So far very good. Would that we might conscientiously return the compliment. But until they cease to teach that God will save the repentant and believing from the punishment of past sins, we can not by any means admit they teach morality. For such doctrine can never make men moral. And my word for it, they never will cease teaching this, until they drop the doctrine, that sin in its nature is infinite.

Agreeable to this hypothesis, all men are infinite sinners; and hence if any person is ever saved, that person must be saved from what he deserves. For measuring the desert of sin by the magnitude of sin, the smallest being an infinite sin (and the greatest can be no more than infinite) the smallest sinner can never be saved, except his punishment be remitted. Hence to be consistent, when they adopt the sentiment that every man must receive according to his deeds—which is the plain doctrine of the Bible—they must also drop the doctrine of infinite sin. But when they thus knock out the underpinning from under their doctrinal edifice, the whole building will come tumbling to the ground. And I pray God I may soon hear the crash. I would be almost willing to have one beam of the time-worn timbers fall upon my own head, if such a thing might be. But to our subject—the subject of regeneration.

It is denied by some that we teach this doctrine. And it is true that we do deny, that there is any thing supernatural in regeneration. It is true, moreover, that we deny that a change of human nature is included in the scriptural doctrine of regeneration. We have, and can have no idea what sort of being man could be, if his nature were changed. And, furthermore, we deny that a belief in the pernicious doctrine of endless torments, is necessary to produce regeneration. What then?—do we deny the necessity of regeneration? By no means! It would be well for us, if we always knew the definition of the words we use. Especially would it be well for those of a contrary faith.

In order to the sinner's entering the kingdom of God—a kingdom of righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit—it is necessary that he be regenerated—born from above. This all admit; though some will have it, that this kingdom appertains to another mode of being. Be it so; still it was preached on earth; and our Saviour said that in his day; “men pressed into it.” Again; “the kingdom of heaven is come unto you;” and, again; “the kingdom of heaven is at hand,” i. e. close by, about to be introduced.

But how shall men enter into this kingdom? by changing their natures? by becoming something else than human beings? So say the opinions of men. But we care nothing for the opinions of men; that is, any farther than they correspond with the truths of Heaven.

Truth is, man, morally speaking, has departed from the innocency and moral purity of his nature; he has become contaminated by sin, and hence is impure and unholy. Dross—the dross of sin, has become mixed with the pure gold of his nature.—The pure gold has thus become dim. A separation is required. And when this has taken place, then men are regenerated—purified. What ever is good in man—and all are more or less good—that should not be changed. If you should change it—change that which is good, I do not know what you could make of it, unless it be evil; which would be a poor change indeed!

Hence as every man has some good in his nature, as well as evil in his practice, to change him wholly would be to change all the good of his nature into evil. And my conviction is, that if you were to make a permanent and total change of man's nature, he never could do another good act. In man's nature, there is nothing evil. And as God is the Author of his nature, it would be a reflection upon his character, to argue that such nature is evil. It would be admitting that he is the Author of evil in the worst possible sense of the word. "I am persuaded (says St. Paul) there is nothing unclean of itself." Man's nature—every faculty—is good. It is the abuse of our faculties that constitutes evil. Every thing of itself is good. To illustrate; the axe, the gun, the sword, they are all good of themselves; but still they may be perverted to bad uses; we may take life, or save life with them all. And so with man's faculties; we may do good, or evil, with them all. They are all good; and they may all be perverted to bad uses.

The regenerated man is not one whose nature has been changed. No new faculties have been added, nor any old ones taken away. He is the same person he ever was. And the only difference between him and an unregenerate person is, the former gives his moral, religious and intellectual faculties the rule, thus keeping his animal propensities in due subjection and thus using every faculty as not abusing it; while the latter person permits the animal propensities to rule over the moral, religious, and intellectual—thus perverting his whole nature. I hope the day is not far distant, when men will understand this subject more perfectly. For they must know themselves, and what the Scriptures require of them, before they can come up to the stature of perfect men and women in Christ Jesus. God hasten the day. Then will men be wise and good. Then will they rejoice in salvation.

INDIVIDUAL FALLACIES.

BY E. L. DAVIS.

When will superstition wing her flight to the regions of annihilation, and reality beam forth in refulgent brightness; or when will error resign her tyrannical sceptre, and truth triumphantly assume her legitimate sway? I unhesitatingly answer for myself and the whole world, not so long as man shall love to be deceived, and continue in his present fallacies.

It is heart-rending to the honest inquirer after truth, to observe the numerous sources of error, and the voluntary delusions, that exist in the present state of human society. Idols of the den, market, and theatre, are set up in nearly every domicile, and worshipped with an enthusiastic zeal, bordering on frenzy. Passion is put in the place of reason, and doctrines the most horrible, deriving their existence from no better origin than heathen mythology, have grown up to the dignity of principles in religion and morality—narrow and false interpretations of obscure and difficult passages of Scripture, are promulgated to the world, and sulphurous denunciations declared against all those who do not implicitly receive them—parents in opposition to the wise injunctions of Heaven, are tyrannizing over the minds of their children, and arrogantly commanding them to embrace their peculiar opinions, or to depart from their presence—local societies muffled up in the zeal and infallibility of their tenets, are maintaining a dictatorial authority over each and all of their members, and with the uplifted sword of persecution threaten to sever asunder the first apostate—doctrines are embraced for their antiquity, and new discoveries of truth are preposterously declared heresies, and unholy innovations—favorite and familiar notions are husbanded with a fanatical enthusiasm, and the character of Divinity is stamped with absurdity and error—ancestral opinions are handed down from generation to generation, and revered by the rising children, not for their truth, but because they were fostered by their parents; and are made the foundation on which they reason and judge of truth and falsehood—opinions are at first espoused, and finally believed to be true, not in consequence of their approval by the sober understanding, but because they were recommended to the thoughts by interest and passion—religious tenets are not judged of by the reality of things, but vice versa, and the harmonious order and wise arrangement of Heaven, are converted into jargon and inconsistency—those who are least instructed, and have least examined their doctrines, are holding them with the greatest tenacity, and are most forward to impose them upon others. Some with an answering self-conceit, are assuming to themselves an infallibility of judgment, and resolve to adhere unswervingly to preconceived opinions, and will neither reason themselves nor listen to reason; whilst others, on the other hand, like the weather-vane that veers to every wind, are perched upon the pivot of irresolution, and inconsiderately disposed to resign their judgment to the last speaker they hear, or the last author they read, and camelion like take the color of the last thing that is laid before them. Another class of persons, who are justly styled ignorant and arrogant bigots, resolve to read but one class of books, to come within the hearing of but one set of notions, and to treat with utter disrespect and haughty contempt, the person that dares to bring into question their tenets; and, like the ignoble mill horse that treads daily in the same beaten track, they make no advancement in knowledge, but remain the detestable dupes of their own folly—whilst some, on the contrary, are quitting their tenets, with a blind resignation to authority, which even their own understanding does not acknowledge, and assign as the only reason, because some great and eminent man has maintained so and so—others do not, as they should, examine with an unbiassed mind, all opinions, doctrines, and tenets, until truth is found; but set out in their intellectual career, with prepossessions in favor of certain opinions, and foolishly consume their time in calling out argument in their support, whilst they voluntarily shut out light and truth from their understanding,—some through laziness to examine for themselves, are receiving every thing upon trust, and are blindly embracing the opinions of others, without investigation, and are menially passing through life, as if they had no minds of their own, or, at least, have no right to use them. And lastly, a much to be pitied class of individuals, is a certain deluded set of men, who are thinking that they have formed right judgments, for no other reason than they have never thought otherwise, and are imagining themselves to have judged correctly, because they have never questioned or examined their own opinions, and are thus passing off this state of human action, the implicit believers—beings the most unworthy the name of man.

TO BR. G. W. MONTGOMERY.

Dear Sir—You may judge my surprise upon the reading of your note, published in last week's Advocate, informing me that a story is in circulation, in your place, that I have renounced the doctrine of God's impartial grace, and become a Baptist. Now I would say, in reply, that this story is not true. I am yet a believer in "the doctrine of God's impartial grace;" and trust I shall be while blessed with life and reason. And, more than this, I have had no thoughts of renouncing my faith. The longer I live, the more fully I am convinced of its truth—and while God blesses me with sight, and hearing, and reflection, I do not believe I shall embrace the cheerless sentiment of endless woe—or become a Baptist. At any rate, I hope those who have circulated the above story, will, after this, wait till they hear from me, before circulating another of the kind—for I pledge them my honor, that when I do renounce, they shall know it as soon as I can possibly get the information to them. But yet, thank God, I am a Universalist.

Yours affectionately, H. BOUGHTON.

DONATION VISIT—A CARD.

On Monday afternoon and evening, January 2d, about one hundred of our friends in this place made us a donation visit, and probably as many more would have attended, had not the day been so very stormy and unpleasant.

For a long time have I regarded the society here a one of the most wholesome and zealous in the denomination—there are more spirited young disciples in this vicinity, than in any other I am acquainted with. The fact that so many did turn out on one of the most unpleasant days we have had this winter, to make their Minister a donation visit, is, I think, tangible evidence of the statement. Myself and family will ever remember with gratitude, warm and sincere, this renewed expression of their friendship and good will. May the blessing of the Lord—the joys of unity and peace, attend them forever.

It is believed that occasions like the above are productive of much good. The cares and perplexities of life, its sorrows and pains—allanimosity and contentions, calculated to interrupt the cause of human progress, are for a while forgotten, and we feel mutually interested in the social happiness and general welfare of each other. They lead to the cultivation and exercise of the principles of philanthropy and benevolence, and encourage the preacher in the performance of his duty to his congregation, for stimulated by such expressions of kindness and esteem, he goes forward with renewed energy and zeal.

So thinks and feels the writer, while he prays for the salvation of a common world. W. H. WAGGONER.

REQUEST.—Will those Editors who have favored me with their papers, and to whom I may be indebted, please send me their accounts with their next paper, and discontinue sending after that date? W. H. WAGGONER.

SECULAR NEWS.

The dwelling of Miss Henrietta Israel, near Reisterstown, Md., was totally consumed on the morning of the 17th inst., and she with a little boy, the only inmates of the house, perished in the flames. Suspicion has been awakened, and it is now supposed that the fire and its awful results are the work of an incendiary and murderer.

The Case of the Rev. Mr. Van Zandt.—The Rochester Democrat learns that the Supreme Court at its recent session, decided against granting a new trial in this case. The amount of the verdict ($3,125) will have to be paid unless the case is carried to the Court of Errors.

Mr. Peter G. Obert announces through a New York paper, and his statement is corroborated by a number of respectable persons, that he has invented a new principle in the mechanic arts, by which mills, factories and boats of any kind can be driven without water, wind or steam, to as great advantage and less expense than either, and the works will run till worn out if they have regular attendance, without the least variation in the motion.

Rev. Caleb Bush, a Baptist clergyman, is charged on oath with the crime of seduction at Weedsport, Cayuga county.

Illinois.—A law has just been passed by the Legislature of Illinois, which must interfere greatly with the collection of debts due in that State. It provides that all property offered for sale under execution, shall sell for two-thirds of its appraised value, and that value is to be regulated by what property was worth in "ordinary times." It extends to all sales under decrees in Chancery, Deeds of Trust, Mortgages, &c., and obliges the plaintiff to buy the property in one year from the date of his execution, at two-thirds of its appraised value, or lose his lien, as to other judgment creditors.

We learn that the Sackets Harbor Bank, and the Tompkins County Bank, at Ithaca, intend making application to the legislature, at its present session, for permission to remove their respective banking establishments to Buffalo for permanent occupancy. Each institution will come in with a capital of $100,000.

The town of Westbrook, in Maine, has recently been obliged, in due course of law, to pay $1500 damages for injuries done to George W. Smith, in being thrown from a gig by a heap of gravel left on the wheel-way of the road, in the evening, for the repair of the road.

THE BIBLE.

How painfully pleasing the fond recollection

Of youthful connection and innocent joy,
When blessed with parental advice and affection,
Surrounded with mercies and peace from on high;
I still view the chair of my father and mother,
The seats of their offspring as ranged on each hand,
And that richest of books which expelled every other,
The family Bible which lay on the stand.

The Bible, the volume of God's inspiration,
At morning and evening could yield us delight,
The prayers of our sires was a sweet invocation,
For mercy by day and safety by night.
Our hymns of thanksgiving with harmony swelling,
And warm from the breast of a family band,
Half raised us from earth to that rapturous dwelling Descended in the Bible that lay on the stand.

Bless'd Bible, the light and the guide of the stranger,
With it I seemed circled by parents and friends,
Thy kind admonition shall guide me from danger,
On thee shall my last lingering hopes then depend.
Hope ripens to vigor and rises to glory;
I'll hasten and flee to the bright promised land;
And for refuge lay hold of the hope set before me,
Revealed in the Bible that lay on the stand.

Hail, raising the brightest and best of the morning,
The star which has guided my parents safe home,
The beams of thy glory my pathway adorning,
Shall scatter the darkness and brighten my gloom;
As the wise eastern sages, to worship this stranger,
Did hasten with ecstasy to Canaan's fair land,
I too will adore him, but not in the manger,
He's seen in the Bible that lay on the stand.

Though age and misfortune press hard on my feelings,
I'll flee to the Bible and trust in the Lord,
Though darkness should cover his merciful dealings,
My soul is still cheered by His heavenly word,
And now from things earthly my soul is removing,
I'll soon shout glory in Heaven's bright band,
And with rapture of joy be forever adorning,
The God of the Bible that lay on the stand.

"ORIGIN OF ENDLESS MISERY."

Br. Grosh—In the Magazine and Advocate of January 13th, I find an article in reply to one from my pen, published in that of December 16th, over the signature "S." I supposed, and do still, that I had done all that was required of me, I gave you my name, which I inferred, from what was said on a former occasion, was sufficient. But in compliance with your wishes, and the wishes of others, as expressed in the Magazine and Advocate of January 20th, I will give my name to the public. In this discussion, truth is my object; and should any thing of a contrary spirit appear in the following article, I hope it may be attributed to the head, and not to the heart. But to the reply.

Before proceeding to his reply, Br. M. corrects a mistake which he says I have made. I am glad he has done so; for, certainly, nothing was farther from my intention than to misrepresent him. But whether or not he saw the force of the correction when he made it, I am at a loss to determine. He says, "He makes me say, that the Pharisees and Sadducees believed the doctrine of endless misery. I have no where stated that the Sadducees so believed. They had no faith in a resurrection, and certainly, they could have none in endless misery." Let this correction be borne in mind by the reader, as we proceed.

The text containing the warning which Jesus gave to his disciples, to "beware of the leaven," etc., occurs in Matt. xvi: 6, and reads as follows. "Then Jesus said unto them, take heed, and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees."

The synopsis which I gave of his (Br. M.'s) reasoning, in the form of a syllogism, and to which he has not objected, only to the inclusion of the Sadducees, whom I will now leave out, was this, (viz.,)

"The Pharisees believed the doctrine of endless misery;

Jesus warned his disciples to beware of the doctrine of the Pharisees;

Therefore, he warned them to beware of the doctrine of endless misery."

Now, Jesus warned his disciples to beware of the doctrine of the Sadducees, just as much as he did of the doctrine of the Pharisees. His language conveys the same idea concerning one sect, that it does concerning the other. The same is said of one, that is said of the other. But Br. M. says that the Sadducees could have no "faith in endless misery;" therefore, so far as they are concerned, according to the correction, the warning of Jesus to his disciples, did not include the doctrine of endless misery. Then, where is his argument drawn from that warning, against the doctrine of endless misery?

I will grant him that the Pharisees believed that doctrine, if he wishes, in its worst, and most malignant form. Then, in return, I wish to inquire by what rule of interpretation, since the same warning is given in reference to both, Pharisees and Sadducees, he makes it have reference to the Pharisees, and not to the Sadducees; and if he succeeds in that, I wish to inquire what particular doctrine of the Sadducees, our Saviour meant in his warning, or what object he had in introducing them into it? If none of these inquiries can be answered, satisfactorily, I must be permitted still to retain my views on this subject, however incorrect they may appear to be to others.

I marvel, that so soon after correcting one of my mistakes, Br. M. should fall into one himself. In the next paragraph, he has fallen into one, from which I took particular pains to save him and your readers. If he examines my article, as you have already remarked, he will see that all of my conclusions were based on his premises. I did not come to the conclusion that the warning amounts to nothing, only according to his exposition of the text. He says in the same paragraph, that "if it does not militate against that dogma," (endless misery,) "then we may with the same propriety, affirm that it does not militate against any point in their doctrine." But he must be aware, however, that this is what logicians call petitio principii, a supposition of what is not granted, or more commonly, "begging the question." He has assumed the point in dispute, and then concludes, that if the warning had not reference to that, the text means nothing. This may satisfy him, but it fails to satisfy me. But farther. I think him very wrong in his reasoning, when he says that "if one important point be excepted, another important point may also be excepted—until all of them are excluded from the warning," for the text either means something, or it does not. If it means something, (and I verily believe that it does—I believe it to be one of the most full, and comprehensive sentences in the Bible,) what is that meaning? Br. M. says, that it refers to the doctrine of endless misery; but he has not yet furnished the proof.

Br. M. says he has examined the chapter containing our Lord's warning, and can not find a reservation made of any of the distinctive doctrines of the Pharisees. He seems to proceed as though his exposition of the passage was admitted by me. This is wrong. I do not think that he has given the true interpretation. If I did, I should be the last one to call in question his reasoning. I do not believe that there was any reservation, and all the force of my reasoning, as well as his own, depends on that. I say now, as I said before, "if his view of the passage be correct, it embraces the doctrine of the Pharisees as much as any part of it." Then we see no way in which he can avoid the conclusion, that if the argument disproves endless misery, "it disproves all religion—dethrones God, and blots out creation."

The way in which he attempts to avoid it, is, in my opinion, a failure. The fact that they entertained some wrong views, does not reach the case. Did they believe in the God, recognized in the Old Testament Scriptures? But they entertained some wrong views of him. Admitted—but does that disprove the fact, that they recognized the God of the Bible, as their God? By no means. Just as well might we say, that because our Presbyterian brethren entertain some wrong views concerning God, they do not believe in the God of the Bible.

The same reasoning will apply to what he says concerning the resurrection,* and the truth of the Old Testament Scriptures. Because they held some wrong views in relation to them, it does not disprove their belief of the fact itself. So far as the Scriptures of the Old Testament are concerned, it is admitted in the article before me, that "they," (the Pharisees,) "professed to adhere to the Old Testament." Grant me that they "professed to adhere to it," and so far as this argument is concerned, I ask no more.

Then, in the conclusion of the argument, I must be permitted to say, that the fact, that no reservation is made in the warning, shews that those syllogisms were not unfounded. They rest on a foundation which, as yet, has not been shaken, and all the conclusions following from them, stand equally firm. But let me repeat once more, that I may not be misunderstood, that those syllogisms were not founded on my own view of the meaning of the text, but on the view which Br. M. has taken of it, and were introduced to shew that that view is incorrect, by shewing that the arguments prove too much, therefore, nothing.

His questions in the closing paragraph, are out of place. I have no notion of taking the laboring oar at present. He has taken the ground, that in that warning, our Saviour had reference to the doctrine of endless misery. It belongs to him to sustain his position—not to me to overthrow it, by shewing that the text means something different from what he says it does. He has the affirmative, and I the negative. It is my business to follow. I will say, however, to him, and to the readers of the Magazine and Advocate, that at some future time, with the permission of the Editor, I may publish my views on the meaning of the text, but I do not feel myself called upon to do so now.

But this article is extended beyond what I intended in the beginning. Perhaps I have made it too long, but I could not well say less. I now submit it to your disposal, hoping that if it finds a place in your paper, it may be received in the same spirit in which I have endeavored to write it—a desire for the truth, and universal good will.

* I had no reference, as Br. M. supposes, to the resurrection; but rather to the fact, that man is possessed of a spiritual part, distinct from his corporeal system. Acts xxiii: 8, was referred to, to shew that that was the belief of the Pharisees. I have re-examined that article, and can not find any thing, that can be construed into a reference to the resurrection. The reason may be, however, that I had no such idea in my mind in the first place. S. J.

LITERARY CURIOSITY.

Br. Grosh—The following letter I met with in Hallam's History of Literature, and have thought that as it may not have fallen in the way of many of the readers of your paper, it might be a novelty worthy the space it will occupy there. Hallam says, "until something else shall prefer a better claim, it may pass for the oldest private letter in the English language. It was written by the lady of Sir John Pelham, to her husband, in 1399, and is probably one of the earliest instances of female penmanship." The orthography is not preserved—but here is the letter, and if others think with myself, it is, on more than one account, a literary curiosity."

THE TABLE AND ITS FOOD.

Friend Aaron—Observing in No 48, current Vol. a loud call for short articles, I fancied I might venture one for publication. But stop—let us examine again. Ah! I now discover what stamps a veto on mine at once: They are "well written articles" for which thou dost call. Those two words, "well written," have given my pen a paralytic shock, and I am obliged to make a desperate effort to give it sufficient energy to proceed. While I compare thy paper to a well furnished table, permit me to say that I think thee a little too grasping, in that thou dost covet, not only all the very best food, of the most rare quality; but thou must have all the little embellishments, with which to set it off and make it appear grandly in the eyes of the great ones of the earth. This would all be well, wert thou a Partialist and didst not allow any to partake at thy board, but the great, gay and pharisaic. But thou professest to be a Universalist, which name declares thee an impartialist.

Remember, friend A., thou dost admit at thy table all ranks, the poor, maimed, halt, blind, simple, and in short, some of every grade make up the goodly number of thy guests. Methinks thou shouldst supply food fitted to the stomachs of all. These humble guests have not been accustomed to such rich food as thy most able correspondents furnish thee. Their digestive powers are not sufficiently powerful to partake, constantly, of thy rare dainties. If thy poor, weak brother have a mite to contribute to the support of thy table; could there be any harm in, occasionally, placing it on thy board, even should it come in the shape of a large brown, or rye and indian loaf? What with thy moulding and trimming a loaf, it might serve to make a tolerable, if not a comely appearance. We think if it did not grace, it would not disgrace it. It might be very palatable to a majority of thy guests, as a rarity. Thou hast acknowledged that thou art bounteously supplied with this homely fare. Come, friend A., be kind enough to tumble out, occasionally, one of those monstrous loaves, which thou hast laid aside in thy storehouse. For ourself, as we design to eat a full meal, when we sit down at thy table, it does not matter materially, if thy loaves be not cut into very small bits, we can eat with as good an appetite, from a large loaf, as from small slices. It would do our longing eyes good to behold one of those old fashioned, true, brown articles on thy table, and were it accompanied by a brimming goblet of pure water from the spring of truth, we could sit down to it, with a hearty good will, and not arise until we had eaten the whole loaf, and drained the goblet dry.

Thou shouldst not forget the eulogy pronounced upon the poor widow, who cast into the treasury two mites. Thy able correspondents may be compared to the rich, who "cast in of their abundance," and thy less able to that same poor widow. These, in which I include myself, doubtless contribute the best "the scanty store affords," which should not be thrown to the winds; if it be worth one farthing it should be admitted into the treasury, (alias paper). Wouldst thou throw away our all? even all our living? If these articles be dressed in plain common sense and unvarnished truth, we think thy plain, common-sense readers would not pass them contemptuously by. If thy pampered guests can not partake of such coarse fare, why let them fast occasionally, (would be our motto,) which would be more for their health than to be constantly feeding on the most rich food, until their appetites are cloyed, and they can taste nothing, but a little bit of this very choice cake and a small slice of the most refined bread, with a little sweatmeats to make a meal. Or like the humming bird constantly fitting from one flower to another, sipping only honey, and leaving the coarser material as not worth their while to taste.

Coarse bread is the better food for the dyspeptic. Friend A., we think thou art levying too heavy a tax on thy able correspondents, in as much as thou not only desirdest them to contribute all for the support of thy table, but thou seemest strongly inclined, to compel them to cut their rich loaves, into very small slices, merely to pamper the appetites of thy dainty guests. And we somewhat fear, that thy fears, for the credit of thy table, are so great as to exclude some of those thy friends who occasionally send thee a plain, brown loaf, though few and far between. For ourself, we relish a plain lengthy article occasionally, and if it be not filtered through the sieve editorial until it comes out perfection itself, it suits our appetite as well as the most refined. As thou seemest desirous to gratify the tastes of all thy guests, we thought it not robbery to put in for a share; as we are the daughter of farmer Timothy, who invariably pays for his paper in advance.

Now friend A., as thou art a little inclined to mirthfulness thyself, and lovest a timely joke, though this railery has been somewhat at thy expense; and as thou sometimes openest thy columns for various trivial articles, such as recipes for chowder and the like, we trust thou wilt not spurn this humble pittance of a friend to thee, thy paper, and the cause of truth. Respectfully thy sister in the bonds of the gospel.

DOROTHY FAIRPLAY.

Watertown, Dec. 28th, 1842.

REPLY.

To Sister Dorothy Fairplay.

Dear Sister—Your letter has puzzled me exceedingly, because it is evidently written in an assumed character, which, owing to your natural frankness and ingenuousness, is not very well sustained. You use, part of the time, the plain language of the Friends, and yet "ourself" yourself like any enpress or editor—one while you utter the very plainest of rebukes, and the next flatter with all the ease and grace of a fashionable lady—you depreciate your article as poorly written, yet write as plain as a clerk, and ring the changes on words and phrases like a very pedant. In short, so completely do you change and vary, that I know not how else to reply to you, but in my own blunt, plain, unceremonious manner, which I learned years ago from the German farmers in Pennsylvania, and afterward added an extra touch to it by long intercourse with the lumbermen of the Susquehanna. Truth to say, I fear that if I were to try any other mode, I should find early education and long habit betraying themselves through any more polished style I could assume. So, here goes for the natural mode.

By "well written" articles, I meant precisely what I yet think those words mean—not grandly written, not polished, not embellished, not rare nor yet overdone articles—but plain, solid common-sense ideas, clothed in few words, fitly chosen, so that the plainest common readers can understand and be instructed by them—and written in penmanship that may be read by the printers. As to the size of the articles, we think convenience requires that they be not too large; for who would be able to stretch the jaws over a great monstrous loaf? And if it must be cut, why not allow generous slices to be large enough? If Dorothy is afraid of starving, she will always find three or four of such slices on the board for her use. And if it be true that some of our guests are weak in the digestive powers, probably one, or at most two such slices will be enough for one time.

From complaining that we do not give monstrous large loaves, Dorothy proceeds to scold us for rejecting the widow's mite! The very thing we did not do.—Fearful that some of our brethren would so fill our table with their great monstrous loaves—many of them made up of ground straw, chaff, bran, &c.—we urged them to send only well written articles—the real, pure, solid stuff itself—so that there would be more room in our Magazine for the nice little loaf of the poor; for we well know that they who pretend to but little, always send that little good. No, no, Dorothy—there is no need of filling the whole table, every week, with a great mountain loaf of coarse stuff, that, after all, does not contain more nourishment in it than a moderately sized loaf. We want as many as possible to aid in furnishing the board—and we want it furnished as neatly and cleanly as possible—and we want the provisions as good and nourishing as possible. If there is any bran bread, or slops, or coarse articles, wanted, the Editor always puts on a good sprinkling of them—for he has about spun out all the ideas he ever had, or could steal or borrow, and has very little else than "odds and ends" left to furnish.

Dorothy, however, takes another tack, and complains that we would compel our rich correspondents to cut their rich unhealthy loaves, so bad for the pampered and dyspeptic, into small slices. Bless her, she would not only have us put mammoth loaves on our table, (two or three of which would entirely fill it,) but she would have those loaves to be left whole—great big fruit, or pound, or sponge cake!—just as they came from the Confectioner's oven!!! Ah, Dorothy! Dorothy! I greatly fear you would pamper my guests worse than I do! If you keep house at this rate, your household will all have the gout in a twelvemonth, or die off with the dyspepsia. No, no; give folks plenty of good meat and bread, in reasonably large slices; and when well filled with that, give them the cake (if you give them any) in small slices only. If your neighbors send in their great rich loaves for your table, cut them up into bits, and keep them back for the dessert—especially if you have weak stomachs to feed.

Dorothy speaks of our sieve Editorial. I do wish she could see it—that's all! Were it not that we have pretty careful hands to set up what we send them, I fear she would think, sometimes, that we had made a mistake, and thrown the flour away, and made up a batch of bran, husks, straw, and a little oven-wood! Our rich neighbors send us occasionally a whole load of all the materials necessary for our table, all jumbled together, and we have used our sieve so long that it is getting rather full of holes by sifting them, so that the straw, bran, and all find their way through it occasionally, in spite of our care. It was only a few weeks ago that we received a great load from a learned brother, written in such a crabbed scrawl, that it well nigh demolished our poor sieve to pass what was good in the load through it. But Dorothy's article came already sifted—a proof of what we said before; that those who send but few articles, or short articles only, generally send that which is good. And we would wager the stump of our old goosequill against her worn-out thimble, that if she were to pick out the articles in our Magazine that are most to the taste of herself and her excellent father, she would select the very articles that have needed the least care, or trimming, or sifting, at our hands—the substantial, wholesome, cleanly portion—the very "well written articles" we called for, and that we pride ourselves most upon!

Ah, Dorothy, Dorothy, just look back, and see what a race you have led my old pen in replying to your letter! It was ever thus with me. A rosy cheek, a pouting lip, and a sparkling eye were ever powerful in setting my tongue or my pen to talking nonsense; and so, years ago, I quit corresponding with the girls—almost—that is, with one or two exceptions (for I could not break off altogether, you know!)—because they led me astray from the serious and grave subjects befitting my years and my spectacles! I hope you will not deem yourself slighted, however, but write again and again, even if I do not always reply to what you offer. I have no fear but that we will be very good friends, you as correspondent and I as Editor—though I might fear for myself were we to exchange places!—Give my best respects to your venerable father, Br. Timothy, and believe me to be your obliged, and affectionate brother.

AARON.

P. S.—A lot of neat, well prepared, digestible substantial are wanted now for our Magazine. Send on.

TAKE HEED "UNTO THE DOCTRINE." Paul.

It is the imperious duty of the minister to ascertain the doctrine taught in the Scriptures, by using every means in his power to discriminate between truth and error—between the Gospel and creeds. He is not to be satisfied with examining merely one faith, and to adopt that as the divine word, while he condemns all others, without knowing what they teach—he is to "prove all things," by the light of Scripture; and whatever he ascertains to be the truth, that he is to adopt, regardless of preconceived views or the traditions of men.

There is one test of doctrine, which is sure and decisive. Our Saviour said:—"Ye shall know the truth; and the truth shall make you free." John viii: 32. The test is not, if you believe, that belief will create the truth; and the truth, thus created by faith, will make you free—but ye shall believe what always has been and is truth; and that truth will give you Christian freedom. Now, whatever doctrine enslaves the soul with bigotry and fear, is not truth—whatever liberates and frees the soul from bigotry and fear, is truth. That there are doctrines which have an injurious effect on man, there can be no doubt. If an individual believes that God loves him and hates others—that he is destined to heaven, and they to endless wo—the tendency of his faith is to make him look with contempt on reprobates, and to treat them as harshly as he thinks God will—its tendency will harden his soul; for persons who trust in ceaseless wo, when dwelling on the doom of the wicked, affirm that parents in heaven will rejoice over the woes of their children—it will fill him with fear, if it fails to harden his feelings; for when he contemplates its horrors, he will affirm with Saurin, that it is a mortal poison, entering into every period of life. Here is intolerance, frozen souls, and dreadful fear. And, of course, the doctrine which produces these results, is not the true system which makes free, and fills the mind rejoicing.

The preacher must ascertain the doctrine which actually liberates people from the evils which beset them in life. Where shall he find it? In the very epistles where he is warned to take heed "unto the doctrine."—There it is clearly manifested. Let us give good attention to it. Paul says:—"Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus, before the world began; but is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel; whereunto I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles." 2 Tim. i: 9, 10, 11. By the death and resurrection of our Saviour, it was beyond question established, that all men will ultimately partake of immortality, when death is swallowed up in victory—this fact is made known unto us in this life; and the testimony which proves it true, excites our faith in it. The final immortality, then, of the whole human race, is one of the principles of doctrine to which Timothy was to take heed, and of which, the apostle was a constant preacher.

Look again:—"I exhort therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men; for kings, and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceful life, in all godliness and honesty; for this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour; who will have all men saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth. For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time. Whereunto I am ordained a preacher, and an apostle, (I speak the truth in Christ, and lie not,) a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and verity." 1 Tim. ii: 1-7. The principles of doctrine here developed, are, 1. There is one God. 2. It is his will to have all men saved and receive the truth. 3. There is one Mediator, the Son of God. 4. Who gave himself a ransom for all. 5. To be testified in due time. As in the other quotation, so in this, the apostle declares that he was appointed a preacher of this noble truth. By uniting the two passages, it is evident, that the doctrine to which preachers are to give heed, embraces the existence of God, the divine origin of the Saviour, the resurrection and the salvation of all men.

When the preacher has thus obtained the doctrine of the Scriptures, he is to be careful and preach it. He is to preach it, that he may give an example to those persons who believe it, and yet who are ashamed to avow it. There are those, who, actuated by worldly motives, hide their faith, and with great inconsistency sustain what they think is rank error. Such persons are like the individuals of our Lord's time, who loved the praise of men more than the praise of God. He must preach it, even though there are some who do not like to hear doctrine proclaimed. If to preach Christianity consists in denouncing people of a different faith, in traducing their characters, and in tearing down opinions, people might well dislike it. But it is far different—it consists in setting forth the high and holy principles of Christian truth, which concern man's condition in the present and future life; which enter into all his enjoyments and prospects—it consists in so holding up the character of God, as to show the falsity of those dishonorable sentiments which creeds attribute to him—it consists in preaching what the apostles preached, plainly, openly, and zealously. Those who are determined to retain their error, and to condemn all other views without examination, will of course dislike the proclamation of the truth—but those who are searching for truth, will approve its open development.

Suppose, for instance, that a mother loses her child in the woods. While in dreadful distress, lest wild beasts have destroyed it, an individual who has seen the child and knows that it is safe, visits the mother, and notwithstanding her distress, determines not to acquaint her with the salvation of the child—would he not display cruelty? and would he not deserve severe reprehension? His duty would undoubtedly dictate to him, the immediate and satisfactory avowal to the mother, of the deliverance of the lost one.

The apostles were commanded to preach the truth; not to hide it. And accordingly throughout their epistles, we find the most frank development of Christian truth, without the least attempt to keep back any principle of the whole counsel of God. And when it is evident that the Saviour endured the untold horrors of the crucifixion, to establish that truth; and that it will fill people with joy and gladness; how can it be dreamed that we are not required to preach it? For my own part, I feel it to be my duty to preach whatever the Bible commands, freely and fearlessly, whether people will hear, or whether they will forbear. And when I hear so much error promulgated from thousands of pulpits, with zeal—when I see the distress which it causes—when I examine the terrible sentiments which are ascribed to the God of love, clothing him with the attributes of endless wrath and anger—I can not hold still; but must obey the injunction of Paul, to take heed, not only to myself, but to the doctrine—and also, to be instant in season and out of season to preach it.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

We have to thank the authors for three pamphlets lately received, but which we have not yet found time to peruse. 1st. "The Salvation of Christ, or a brief exposition and defence of Universalism, for the candid and prayerful consideration of all such as are opposed to a universal Saviour. By Rev. G. W. Quimby." (Query—We see this name spelled differently, in general—which is right, Quimby or Quimby?) The pamphlet is neatly done up in a strong paper cover, contains 80 pages, 16mo, and is retailed at one shilling. It is favorably noticed by Br. Drew, of the Banner.

2d. "A Christmas Sermon, delivered on the evening of December 25th, 1842, by Rev. John Moore, Pastor of the Universalist Society in Hartford, Conn." It is a neatly printed pamphlet of 16 pp., 8vo.

3d. "An Appeal to the Board of Controllers of the Public schools of the city and county of Philadelphia; and an Appendix containing documents referred to in said Appeal. By Timothy Clowes, LL. D., Principal of one of the Grammar schools of the city of Philadelphia." This is a pamphlet of 30 pages, 12mo., detailing a list of grievous wrongs and insults inflicted on our learned, venerable, and amiable friend, because he was a Universalist. It demands and will receive full notice in a separate article. We blush at the dishonor and shame which bigots are heaping thick and fast on our native State, the land of Penn, by their most disgraceful persecutions, and rejections of men from office, for mere opinions' sake! If it is allowed, to proceed much longer, Pennsylvania will be ranked as "the Inquisitorial State of the Union," for the commission of injustice as far transcending repudiation as the robbery of character exceeds in turpitude the picking of pockets!

A CARD.

Since our last on this subject, given but a few weeks since, myself and family have been blessed with tokens of friendship and goodwill from others. We would particularly notice, and publicly thank the Lee Sewing Society, connected with the Universalist Society of Anns-ville and Lee, for the present of a beautiful and excellent bed-quilt—a very grateful and acceptable token of their remembrance of my humble labors with them before and since the organization of the Universalist society in those towns, a few years ago. The gift is the more gladly received because we feel assured that it will not lessen their liberality to our beloved bachelor Brother, their present faithful pastor, under whose ministration they are prospering finely—and, perhaps—who knows?—it may lead Br. Quaal into a state of "double blessedness," when, doubtless similar tokens of goodwill will be his also!

A. B. GROSH.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT IN GREAT BRITAIN.—Br. Sadler—I have since learned that my information. (that Great Britain had abolished capital punishment in toto.) was not correct. Some modifications were undoubtedly made in the law, but what, precisely, it is very difficult to learn from the debates in parliament as reported in the London papers. Either I am not well enough acquainted with the meaning of English words and sentences, or the Reporter of those debates, or the noble lords, have made sad English of it—for even Englishmen here understood it as I did; and do not pretend now, to know precisely what it does mean.

A. B. G.

THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE.—Universalists, and liberal Christians generally, must expect attempts to be made by our bigotted and exclusive brethren, to drive them entirely from the ground. This will be done, if possible, by absorbing the Washingtonian movement, so perfectly free from sectarianism either in politics or religion, into the Old Temperance organization. Every effort will be made to induce Washingtonian societies to send delegates, and lend aid, and pay tribute money, and acknowledge fealty to the American Temperance Union, or to some of its State or County auxiliaries—or, at least, to mingle in its County Conventions. If thus absorbed into those old sectarian concerns, then liberal Christians must submit to their religious dogmas, and sectarian and political measures of course. But if they can not succeed in swallowing up the Washingtonians, they will try to "divide, and conquer" by that division. To divide the Washingtonians, they will endeavor to seduce them from their principles—one at a time—to allow a little sectarian talk in their meetings; or to get their female societies to distribute tracts or mix up moral reform or Sunday schools with temperance; or to get a denunciatory resolution, or a resolution on voting at the polls passed in our male societies—any thing so as to violate the Washingtonian principles, and get the power into the hands of the old sectarian American Temperance Union again, and drive out those whom the old societies deem heretics and infidels. Look out!!!

A. B. G.

N. B. Is it not the duty of all liberal men to unite with the Washingtonians, and defend their cause from danger?

IRON ENTERING THE SOUL.—So long as non-professors of religion are driven to insanity by modern revivals, the orthodox churches will employ such men as Knapp, Littlejohn and Fishpool to create excitements. But let the poisoned chalice be commended to their own lips, and the game will not be so amusing to them. We perceive that an aged and respectable member of the Baptist church in Salem, Mass., was driven to insanity by Knapp's preaching there, and has committed suicide. His pastor (Rev. Mr. Banvard) in preaching the funeral sermon, assured the mourners that the deceased (Mr. Wm. Nutting) was in heaven. Had it been a non-professor, probably the home-made text, "no self-murderer shall enter the kingdom of God" would have been impressively quoted.

ANIMAL MAGNETISM.—We can not consistently devote any space to essays on this subject, either pro or con. We have not room for all we wish to publish that is in accordance with the already sufficiently varied subjects promised in our prospectus. Besides, the number of believers is so few, and the disbelief so strong as to require almost ocular demonstration, so that we feel it would be gratifying to but few of our readers, and useful to a still smaller number.

A FAREWELL.

BY MISS CELIA M. TIBBITS.

Farewell!—ye are changed, the loved ones of yore,
I meet your glance in my path no more—
A cloud hangs darkly o'er each fair brow,
And the loveliest eye beams coldly now.

We meet no more in the haunts of old,
Where love's rich tones in the ear were told,
By the rushing stream, where the forests lay,
The voice of friendship has passed away.

We meet no more where the matin bell
Sent forth its notes with a breeze-like swell,
Where glad hearts echoed to each low tone
By summer's breath to our casement blown.

Farewell!—I go to the greenwood shades,
Where fountains glance in the forest glades,
Where young leaves whisper a gentle breath
Of love that knoweth no change but death.

I go where the summer breezes sigh,
And whispered words in the wind sweep by,
To hear the music of harp string flung
From waving branches, their shades among.

I go—I go where the cataract's foam,
Sends up its voice through the heaven's blue dome,
Where dew-drops gleam in the lily's bell,
Where dark leaves quiver, I go—farewell!

I go—they will breathe me a welcome there,
In the balmy tones of the morning air;
There's a look of welcome in each bright eye,
That glanceth forth where the violets lie.

THE MAD FAMILY.

A STORY OF REAL LIFE.

"Surmises, guesses, misgivings, half-intuitions, semi-consciousness, partial illuminations, dim instincts, embryo conceptions."

CHARLES LAMB.

There are certain places, with which I used to be familiar in my younger days, whose appearance by sundry associations has become so fixed in my memory, that very often when I am in a thoughtful mood, they seem to rise up before me with all the vivid hues of reality. Some of these, such as the winding lanes through the green pastures, and the foot paths in the woods, are hallowed by reminiscences of silent, solitary walks, and those castle-building reveries in which youth so fondly loves to indulge; others, the noisy streams and game-abounding meadows, by recollections of many a victim, bird or fish, and many an hour of lonely transport which I enjoyed with my gun or rod, as inclination prompted; and there are others which are yet more endeared to me by the remembrance of the friends and friend-shared pleasures of by gone days. Of the latter description is the spot of which I am about to give a sketch, in connexion with a brief tale.

Mountain Pond is a quiet little sheet of water, snugly situated up among the woody hills which diversify the southwestern county of Connecticut; and so exceedingly retiring is its disposition, that although it is placed at least a quarter of a mile above the level of the sea, it is impossible to get a peep at it till you are on its very margin. It was originally surrounded by a thick forest of oak and hemlock trees; but these have been cut away on the north-eastern side; so that standing on a rock which reaches to the water's edge, nearly opposite this opening, you have a fine bird's-eye view of the neat white dwelling houses and rival churches of one of the neighboring villages. The pond is not more than two furlongs across, but its waters are very deep, clear, and cool, and in former days abounded in fish; but these have latterly become so scarce that old Isaac Walton himself would fail to get a nibble there. It was rare sport, some five or six years ago, to stray out to this place on the summer holidays, and fish and swim, and and pluck the richly-scented pond-lilies which grew along the margin, or to go over alone, on some moonlit August night, and sit upon the rock, and think there could be no spot in the wide world so lovely.

Why is it that the sight of beautiful scenery, especially when viewed in solitude, always makes us melancholy? I have stood on a lofty cliff and looked down upon the green fields with pleasant streams winding through them, upon the busy city sending its continual murmur up to heaven, and upon the glittering sunbeams; and I have walked along the sea beach at the still hour of midnight, and gazed out upon the waters as the bright rays of the moon glanced upon them, and listened to the autumn wind whistling through the dry branches of the trees, and the leaves rustling gloomily along the ground; and although all was glorious and beautiful, I have turned away with a saddened heart. And is it not so with all? Whence then comes this feeling? Do our thoughts at such moments recur to the past; to the friends that stood around us in childhood and youth, and who are now scattered abroad over the wide earth, or perchance mouldering in the grave? Do we sadden at the reflection that nature's landmarks are unchangeable; that years hence, when our own forms, these hands, these limbs, shall be but dust, other men will have filled our places—will be gazing on these self-same scenes, while we shall have passed away and been forgotten? Or when we behold the Almighty's handiwork, do our souls rise up within us, and long for wings to flee away to that place to which there is no admittance save through the gates of death? But I am wandering.

Mountain Pond, like a great many less worthy places, has its legend; a tale known only to a few, who are foolish enough to love to hear the wild stories which village gossips are so fond of relating. Some fifty-years ago, there dwelt in a neighboring village a family which from time immemorial had been subject to hereditary insanity. Few of that family had been known to die a natural death; the poison, the cord, the knife, or the pistol, had hastened the end of nearly all of them. No matter though the fatal malady delayed its approach till their brows were deeply furrowed by the hand of time, and their locks were turned to gray; it was almost sure to come at last. There was one of them who had been told, when young, that if he applied himself habitually to hard bodily labor, he would be secure; and he tried the scheme. Day after day, and year after year did he toil on, until his steps became feeble, and his hair white, and people began to think the sentence had been removed from him.

On his sixty-ninth birthday he rose from his couch a madman. They confined him to a small room, but he contrived to escape unseen by any one; and when his friends, having discovered his absence, made search for him, they found him in one of the out-buildings, with a mallet in his right hand, driving a chisel into his own throat, while the hot blood spouted out upon the floor! They sprang upon him and wrested the weapon from his hands; but it was too late; the old man died the next day. It is to another member of this family, however, that my story relates. The man who ended his days in the manner I have just related, left two sons heirs to his estate, and—to his madness. At the time of his father's death, one was in his twenty-third year, the other some four years younger. The former, like most people, was mainly intent upon amassing wealth for the future support of himself and his young bride. He was strong, active, and apparently reckless of the fearful curse which was hanging over him and his.

His brother was cast in a far different mould. Pale and thin, he pursued no fixed occupation, but spent the greater portion of his time in the perusal of such books as the village afforded, and in rambling about the woods and fields. The neighbors treated him kindly, for there was something in the wild glare of his keen, black eyes which told that the disease of his fathers was fast creeping upon him; and it was thought that he hastened its progress by continually brooding over his impending fate. It is a terrible thing for the young and gifted to know that ere long the light of reason must be extinguished within him; to feel that for him genius and learning can be of no avail; to go forth when the spring flowers are scenting the earth, and the songs of the merry birds are filling the air; when the sky is cloudless, and all nature is bright with joy, to look abroad upon the face of nature, and while a feeling of gladness springs up in the breast, that God hath made his earth so beautiful, to remember that the blight is upon him, turning every blessing into a curse; to sit amid the howlings of the autumnal tempest, and reflect that life has no gay prospect in store for him; that to him the valley of the shadow of death is rendered yet more dark by the gloomy cloud of insanity; to think, till the hot blood runs madly through the veins, and to fancy that the doom is already begun! And such were the feelings of the younger brother. From his earliest boyhood, Mountain Pond had been one of his most favorite places of resort.—Thither he would repair, and seating himself upon the rock during the long summer days, pore over the pages of some favorite author, or gaze upon the quiet waters, and watch the fleeting images of the bright world which seemed to lie far down in their calm depths.

It was a warm day in August, that some boys who had been over to the pond to fish, returned home, and told some of the villagers that they had that forenoon seen young William B— standing on the rock, and acting in a strange, wild manner, such as they had never observed in him before; and that they had left off their sport earlier than usual, because they were afraid of him. It was not long of course before the story came to his brother, who immediately started in search of him. With an anxious heart he hastened across the fields and over the hills, for there was no direct road to the pond; and his pulse almost stood still, as he drew near the opening which would afford him a glimpse of the rock. An involuntary exclamation of joy burst from his lips as he beheld his brother sitting in his usual place; but it was a long circuitous path through the woods, and it was some time before he stood on the little elevation immediately behind him. The young man was sitting quietly on the rock close to the water's edge, his elbows upon his knees, and his chin resting upon both hands. His brother looked at him silently for a moment, but when he saw that he stirred not, and indeed seemed scarcely to breathe, he sprang down by his side and called him by name. In an instant the youth was on his feet glaring savagely at the intruder. At length, in a low voice, he spoke:

"Yes, you are one of us, and you'll be mad, even as I am?" His voice gradually arose to a perfect yell: "Do you remember the old man? the chisel? the blood?—And why shouldn't we die too?—here? now?"

He sprang at his brother's throat, and notwithstanding his superior strength, dragged him to the edge of the rock. And now came a fearful struggle for life and for death. The elder was a powerful man, but the might of madness was in the muscles of his adversary; and every moment the contest grew more doubtful, till at length the foot of the former slipped, and with an agonizing "O! God!" from the one, and a yell of triumph from the other, they fell headlong from the rock. There was another vain struggle, a few bubbling cries, and the waves closed over them forever! Some of the children who had given notice of the young man's strange conduct in the morning, had followed the elder brother, though at some distance behind, and arrived at the opening in time to see the whole of the sad affair. By them the story was quickly communicated to the villagers; but all efforts to recover the bodies proved fruitless.

The "Mad Family" is now extinct. Strangers have filled their places in the village, and on the ruins of their old mansion a new dwelling has arisen. Their lands have passed into the possession of others, and their story is almost forgotten. But Mountain Pond remains the same; and its calm waters sparkle in the rays of the sun, or reflect back the image of the pale, cold moon—they tell no tale of grief, of madness, or of death.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

LETTER FROM DR. CLOWES.

Philadelphia, January 12th, 1843.

Br. Grosh—I have designed for several months to write to you, and so far as you please, to your readers, detailing my wanderings and disappointments since I left Clinton; but I have been hindered hitherto, not so much by the want of incidents, as by the want of agreeable incidents to communicate.

DISAPPOINTMENT I.

When I left Clinton last August, it was under the confident belief, communicated to many of my friends there, that I should enter forthwith upon the discharge of an agency informally offered to me in April last by an influential member (as I supposed,) of the Massachusetts Temperance Society. The offer was a "thousand dollars a year fixed salary, and the payment of my personal expenses, while travelling as a lecturer." To avoid disappointment, I wrote, about the beginning of July to the influential member aforesaid, inquiring if I might still consider the place as open to my acceptance, and stating further that unless I heard from him that the place was not open, I should present myself by the 12th of August to enter upon my agency. Not receiving an answer to this communication, and therefore confirmed in my too credulous belief of an immediate and profitable engagement, I hastened to Boston, and presented myself to my correspondent about the time appointed, and was asked by him, if I had not some days before received a letter in answer to mine? And when I answered no, he presented me with a circular of the Massachusetts Temperance Society, announcing in substance, their inability any longer to employ agents.

DISAPPOINTMENT II.

Grievously thwarted in my expectations which I had cherished for months, and under the influence of which I had given up my place in Clinton Liberal Institute, and determined to attend the great Temperance Convention which was to assemble at the close of August, at Portsmouth, N. H., of the Washingtonians of Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Maine. I did attend that Convention, was much delighted with the proceedings, but in reply to my proposition to devote myself to the cause of Temperance as a Lecturer, I was answered, that I might if I were so disposed, go forth as a Lecturer, as many others had done: but it must be without any prospect of remuneration other than the voluntary contributions of the people wherever I might go; and it was discouragingly added, that in the present depressed state of the times, the contributions must be very small, and hardly sufficient to support the Lecturer himself, much less his family. To these two sufficiently disheartening objections to my plans, a third was appended by some of the Washingtonian Lecturers against my qualifications for the service; for it was significantly declared as a truth fully established, that none but a reformed drunkard—and the deeper in the ditch the candidate had been so much the better—was fit to be employed as an Apostle of Total Abstinence from intoxicating drinks. As I did not know how to answer the first objection, except by working a change in the pecuniary circumstances of the times which I could not hope to do; nor the second, except by infusing a spirit of generous, open handed liberality into the hearts of my audiences; which was equally out of my power; nor the third, without entering upon a drunken debauch of five or six months and then reforming, which to tell the plain truth, was just as far beyond my wish, if not my physical ability, I confess I yielded up, though with considerable reluctance, a great portion of my Washingtonian spirit. And here I must say, that although I have lectured now, for above a year on my own hook, as it is classically termed, and have as a Lecturer travelled many hundred miles, and have proclaimed freedom from Alcohol in the states of New York, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey and Pennsylvania—in the places of worship of the Universalists, Unitarians, Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists and Unionists, and in Court Rooms, Lyceums, Lecture Rooms, Schoolhouses, and in the open air, yet with two honorable exceptions, I have never received a cent of remuneration. Possibly it never occurred to those audiences, that Temperance lecturers need money to pay for stage fares, and for meals and necessary clothing. The two exceptions alluded to, (it would be ungrateful not to particularize) were in your neighborhood, at a lecture in the Schoolhouse near Br. Peck's in Westmoreland; and at the Presbyterian meetinghouse in Manchester. I ought also to acknowledge the kindness and hospitality of the Temperance friends in Portsmouth, N. H., and at Haverhill and Newburyport, Mass., at which three places, I was not permitted to incur expense at a public house. I should not fail to mention also that in some places, I have received a vote of thanks of the audiences assembled; and in two or three instances I have been kindly conveyed from my home and brought back in the private carriages of the friends of Temperance. In all other cases, I have paid my own stage fare, or wore my own shoe leather.

DISAPPOINTMENT III.

About the first of September, being then at Newburyport, I read an advertisement in a Philadelphia paper, stating that applications would be received until the 7th of September, for the place of Principal of the Philadelphia High School, and a salary of 1800 or 2000 dollars a year. In order to become a candidate for this place, I obtained a release from an engagement which brought me ten or twelve dollars a week, and hastened to Philadelphia in order to present my application to the controllers, on the last limited day; never dreaming that I should be too late. I presented my application to the Secretary of the Board of Controllers on the morning of September 7, just before the convening of the Board; and I then heard—I confess with surprise—that a committee of the Board had already named two candidates, one of which the Board would elect. Perhaps I am mistaken, but there does appear to me something exceedingly wrong in this business. A place of great responsibility is advertised—a high salary is held out—applications, it is stated, will be received until a certain day—a candidate at a distance depending on this advertisement, gives up existing and profitable engagements—comes at great expense several hundred miles—presents himself with his paper before the electors—and is then coolly told, that it is a pity he had not presented his application some weeks before; that a committee has already recommended two candidates to the Board, out of which the Board will select one! Who after this would depend upon an advertisement in a Philadelphia paper, for a Teacher of a School? I am obliged to confess that I have depended on such advertisements not once only, but twice, thrice and four times; and just so often have been deceived.

DISAPPOINTMENT IV.

On my arrival at Philadelphia, I saw an advertisement for a teacher to take charge of the Public School at Frankford, six miles North of Philadelphia, at a salary of $750. Discouraged with my want of success in my former application, I forgot the day appointed for the examination of candidates, until I was kindly reminded of it by a friend. It was too late in the day to avail myself of the usual conveyance by stage; so I proceeded on foot to Frankford. Losing my road, by which my journey was lengthened two or three miles, I did not arrive at the place of examination, until some time after the meeting of the examiners and the commencement of the examination. Then, dispirited as I was, and almost wearied out, it was some time before I took courage to present myself to the examiners. On doing so however, the written questions proposed by Professor Baché were given to me, and with a considerable number of candidates—more than thirty I believe—I employed myself on that day and the next in writing out the solutions. At the conclusion of the examination, I presented such certificates as I had then in my possession in regard both to my qualifications and character. Several days after I was gratified with the information, that I and two others had received a certificate from the examiners, of "high qualifications in all the branches which were the subjects of examination." The following is a statement of the balloting subsequently held.

DISAPPOINTMENT V.

At the same time that I saw the advertisement for Principal of the High School, I saw an advertisement for a Principal of the Public School at West Philadelphia. So the following week I proceeded to that place, and was again examined for three successive days in company with more than twenty candidates, for the office of Principal, at a salary of 700 dollars. The result was as before, that I, and I believe one other candidate, received a recommendation of high qualifications. From various causes, the election was postponed from about the 12th of September till about the 5th of October. During this period I was required to attend frequently upon the Directors. These delays were exceedingly harassing to me. I ventured on one occasion to hint that my duty required me to be in Rhode Island, but it was intimated that absence would be considered as abandoning my candidature. With an almost certainty of eventual appointment, I was put off from day to day, till at last on the first Wednesday of October, I was told that the election had been held, and I was not chosen. I was soothingly informed that after much serious consideration the Directors had concluded, that I had been accustomed to teach branches of Education so far superior to those required to be taught in their school, that it was doubted whether I would bring myself down to the level of the studies required in West Philadelphia—that I deserved a better place and higher salary than they had to give me—that such place and salary would soon present themselves for my acceptance in Philadelphia—and that had I been elected, they could not hope to retain my services for many months—under all these considerations they had elected another man.

DISAPPOINTMENT VI.

When I came to Philadelphia, I had an intention, if I did not succeed in obtaining the place of Principal of the High School, that I would visit Bristol, and make enquiry as to the practicability of resuscitating the college at that place. You will recollect, Br. Grosh, a conversation that I had with you some months ago, in which I stated, that the only practicable method I saw of obtaining a college for our denomination, was to obtain some one of the institutions of the country which had failed in the hands of other denominations, because they have more seminaries of learning than they want or can sustain. It is in this way that the Methodists have acquired two or three colleges in this state, one in Connecticut, and probably others elsewhere; and they are thus building up the literary interests of their denomination. But this plan, long entertained by me and prominent in my mind when I came to Philadelphia, was completely defeated on the present occasion, for on the very next day (I believe) after my arrival in this city, I read a notice that the Bristol College would be opened by Captain Partridge as a Military School; and the military and the citizens of Philadelphia were invited a few days after to attend the opening of the School!

DISAPPOINTMENT VII.

I said above that my stay in Philadelphia during all the middle and latter part of September was necessary. I was thus prevented from attending to my duties as a delegate from the last New York State Convention of Universalists, to the General Convention of that denomination which was held at Providence, (R. I.) I was exceedingly anxious to attend that Convention, not only to fulfil an important trust, which had been confided to me, but that I might bring forward, and carry through, if practicable, some plan for the establishment of a College for our denomination. Brother Balch has several times conversed with me about a building at Providence, which cost originally eighty thousand dollars, which might, he thinks, be obtained at comparatively a small sum. I did hope that some means might be devised at the Convention for obtaining that building, or some other equally eligible, so that our denomination might at length have, what it exceedingly needs, one literary institution, capable of conferring a thorough education. But I was tied up in Philadelphia, during the session of the Convention, and all my schemes for a college proved abortive.

DISAPPOINTMENT VIII.

Finding myself no longer detained in Philadelphia—all the objects which had brought me there having proved abortive, I returned to the home of my father-in-law on Long Island, where I spent one or two weeks. About the end of October I went to New York to look for some means of employment in that city. And here also a favorable offer seemed to be made to me by the Directors of the Winchester School. As one room of the building occupied by that school was still vacant, the Directors very kindly granted me the use of it, upon the express condition however, that I should relinquish it, whenever they pleased. Depending on this offer, I published my advertisement of the commencement of my school, and had notice given in all our congregations in the city and in Brooklyn—hired a house for the residence of my family—purchased wood and had it sawed and piled away near the door of my recitation room—had a fire built on the morning of opening my school, November 1, I believe—took my place at my desk, and waited for my pupils:—when, the first person who entered, 10 minutes past 9, was the Chairman of the Committee who had granted me the use of that room as above mentioned. After some hesitation he told me that the pupils in the female department of the Winchester School were increasing so rapidly that the committee felt compelled to withdraw their consent to my longer occupation of their room. Of course, I had nothing to say but to leave the room, and proceed at once to get the house which I had hired for my family, off my hands as well as I could, and to remove my books and stationery from the school room to a friend's in the neighborhood. I left the load of wood which I had bought for my school, to pay the rent for one hour which I had occupied the room.

DISAPPOINTMENT IX.

Just about this time, I read in the Philadelphia United States Gazette, the following advertisement. "MALE TEACHER WANTED to take charge of one of the Grammar Schools of the 1st Section, 1st School District, City of Philadelphia, at a salary of one thousand dollars per annum. Written applications addressed to James C. Donnell, Chairman of School Committee, No. 14 South Front Street, will be received until Thursday the 10th of November." I read this advertisement over, and over again; studied it for several hours to ascertain whether it was possible there could be any thing deceptive in it; and at length came to the conclusion that I would be once more a candidate for a school in Philadelphia. From the wording of this advertisement I concluded that there were several vacancies to be filled; and I thought that if by any legerdemain I should miss of one of these Grammar Schools I might be successful with another. So I forwarded as directed a letter to Mr. Donnell, containing testimonials of character and qualifications. Honestly supposing, whether correctly or incorrectly I can not say, that I had failed in my former attempts to obtain a school in Philadelphia, by exhibiting testimonials signed by Universalists, I carefully withheld them on this occasion, and did not intend even to officiate in Universalist pulpits. But Br. Cook with whom I was domiciled was taken sick, and I would not refuse to preach for him, and requests were made from other quarters, which it would not be proper to refuse; so I continued preaching until I thought it my duty to promise one of the Directors of the Public School that I would not preach if elected a Teacher, he assuring me that it was intended to be a rule of universal application, that none of the Teachers should be preachers.—As the whole history of my being a candidate, of my examination, of my election "to take charge of one of the Grammar schools in this city, at a salary of $1000 per annum" on the 3d December, and of the attempt on the 8th day of that month to remove me from that office of Teacher thus conferred, without giving me notice of any charge made against me, or giving me an opportunity to make a defence; of my forcible ejection from the school room on the 6th inst.—as all these circumstances are narrated in "an appeal" which I have published, a copy of which I have transmitted to you, I shall pass on with a reference to the said publication for further particulars. As the city Directors elected me on the 3d of December to one of the Grammar Schools of Philadelphia, over which they have jurisdiction, as I have been forcibly ejected from that one to which I was first assigned, which act as it is publicly stated, the Directors afterwards sanctioned, though they have given me no notice of the same; I have given them notice that I will wait for them to assign me to another school. These events seem to have rendered it necessary that I should remain in Philadelphia. An attempt has been made to injure my reputation as a Christian Minister, as a Teacher and as a man, and I am not disposed to overlook the injury, until it is either repented of, or atoned for. The school authorities who appointed me a Teacher must either show legal cause for removing me, or they must pay me my salary; or those who have caused me this injury must pay me damages.

DISAPPOINTMENT X.

On Tuesday the 10th of December, I went to Holmesburg and submitted myself for examination as a candidate for the office of Principal of the Public School established in or near that place, at a salary of $400 per annum. I believe I obtained a recommendation from Professor Bache of full qualifications, but in conversation with the Directors of that school, I told them that if elected I would only accept the office of Principal of their school until the City Directors should direct me to one of their schools. Whether my non-election there, is to be attributed to the slanders of some persons in Philadelphia, or to my being a Universalist, or to my saying I would not bind myself to stay with them a year, I can not say, although it may be necessary to ascertain the facts. I have not much expectation however of an election to any public school as long as it is maintained by some persons, that the Directors of any school may hold out any offers they please, and yet incur no responsibility; that they may appoint a Teacher to a school in one hour, at a salary of 1000 dollars a year, and remove him the next hour, assigning a reason or not assigning a reason, just as they please; that acting as public officers they can incur no private risk, by ruining the reputation of an individual and destroying his ability to gain a livelihood by his honest exertions.

I trust Br. Grosh, that my disappointments are over. I have resolved until I find a place in one of the Public Schools (for which I will yet be a candidate,) to open a school on my own private responsibility. I have been however triumphantly and tauntingly told by some of the Directors who have done me so much injury, that no private Teacher can support himself against their monopoly. Trusting in God and good friends, I will see what can be done. I will, I think, represent the matter to the Legislature, and see whether in this land of civil and religious liberty, a citizen is to be trampled under foot, who honestly endeavors to serve the public interests and to gain an honest living.

I can not close this communication, long as it is, without expressing my heartfelt acknowledgements for the kind hospitalities of my friends Mrs. Henk who received me as a member of her family in August and September last; Brother Cook with whom I resided from November 10th to the 25th, and Brother Moore with whom I have since resided. Their liberality I can never forget. I do entertain a hope that I shall yet be enabled in part to repay their kindness. I am very truly your friend and brother,

T. CLOWES.

ALMOST GONE.

BY REV. W. N. BARBER.

"As for me, I was almost gone; my steps had well nigh slipped!" So said the ancient king and bard of Israel, and I presume there are many in our world who can say the same. "As for me I was almost gone; I began to wander in the field of vice; I was young and inexperienced; I supposed there was the most enjoyment where there was the loudest laugh, where the flowing bowl went round, where the loudest oath was uttered, where the dissipated rabble held its midnight orgies and the reeking sons of Bacchus lolled in revelry. But thanks to heaven's king! When I had listened to these inducements till I travelled to the verge of ruin, my eyes were opened, and I saw myself standing on the edge of the precipice, and made my escape."

It is the delusive teaching of an unsound judgment, reader, that tells us that prosperity and enjoyment attend the wicked; yet how many are deceived in this way! How many there are who think the pathway of sin is one of flowers—that sunny vales, murmuring streams, refreshing shades and sparkling fountains are found in the fields of transgression; and that those who wander in these fields are infinitely more happy, as far as this life is concerned, than those who plod the stormy and cross-bearing path of righteousness and virtue.—Alas! how many have rendered existence a curse to themselves and all connected with them, by listening to the sophistry by which such a doctrine is supported.

This was the very error, reader, that once deluded the Psalmist. In the 73d Psalm he tells how he once reasoned relative to the wicked: "For there are no bands in their death: but their strength is firm. They are not in trouble as other men: neither are they plagued like other men. Therefore pride compasseth them about as a chain; violence covereth them as a garment. Their eyes stand out with fatness: they have more than heart could wish. They are corrupt and speak wickedly concerning oppression: they speak loftily. They set their mouth against the heavens and their tongue walketh through the earth....Behold these are the ungodly who prosper in the world; they increase in riches, verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands [in vain] in innocency." Thus the king of Israel reasoned and squared his course in life accordingly. Thinking, as he did, that the wicked are prosperous in this world more than the virtuous, he went on in the way of sin till he was "almost gone and his feet had well nigh slipped;" and I opine he would have pursued his unwise course till he was gone entirely and lost to this world forever, had he not happened to have gone into the sanctuary of God. But he went into the sanctuary, and heard a preacher there proclaim the truth. His eyes were opened; he discovered his mistake. There he learned the "end" of the wicked. "Surely," says he, "thou (Jehovah) didst set them in slippery places; thou castedst them down to destruction. How are they brought in desolation in a moment! they are utterly consumed with terrors. As a dream when one awaketh, so, O, Lord, when thou awakest, thou shalt despise their image."

Let me warn thee, reader, not to get entrapped in the delusive doctrine that wickedness is happiness; it is as false as perjury! Once entrapped, you may not open your eyes to your fearful situation till you are gone entirely.

ELDER KNAPP'S PRETENSIONS PROVED FALSE.

For a long time Elder Knapp has at least hinted and insinuated, if not openly bragged, and his friends and admirers have publicly proclaimed, that he was the originator of the celebrated and glorious Washingtonian temperance Reform which commenced in Baltimore, in April, 1840. Satisfied by various circumstances, and especially by a knowledge of this braggadocio's character, that this boast was a falsehood, we publicly contradicted the statement about a year ago. We felt indignant then, as we frequently have since, at the attempts made by the old temperance societies and Elder Knapp, and their friends, to rob the "immortal six" of their well deserved honors. But the false brags still went the rounds, until lately, Br. James Shrigley, Pastor of the Calvert street Universalist Society in Baltimore, addressed a note of inquiry to him who was "Bill Mitchell, the taylor," before the Reform was commenced—"William K. Mitchell, President of the Washington Society," when the first six names were signed to its Constitution and pledge—but is now "William K. Mitchell, Esquire, President of the Baltimore Washington Society." (May God forever bless this glorious reform, for its leading-up principles and tendencies!) He promptly answered as follows, sending a certificate, (which is also given below,) signed by the five earthly survivors of the "immortal six"—George Steers, one of their number, having departed from earthly labors for his heavenly rest. Thus is the depreciating, unjust and false brag of Elder Knapp and his friends, nailed to the counter. Will they now hold their peace; or will they continue shamelessly to circulate it? Time will show.—Will the old Temperance Society, also rebuked by this Certificate, now have honor and honesty enough to cease their declarations, that one of their lecturers caused the Washingtonian movement?—that it was the result of their labors?—"We will see what we shall see." A. B. G.

Baltimore, January 11th, 1843.

DEAR SIR:—I have received yours of the 9th inst., and take great pleasure in communicating to you the information you desire, of which the accompanying certificate and book will I hope be conclusive and satisfactory.

I have received several communications on the subject from individuals with whom I had no personal acquaintance, and of whose responsibility I had no knowledge. But the request, coming from a gentleman so well known and so highly esteemed, is one which affords us much pleasure to satisfy.

Very respectfully your ob't. servant,

W. K. MITCHELL.

To Rev. J. Shrigley, Baltimore.

SECULAR NEWS.

THE MILLER TABERNACLE.—The work on this building has been resumed. We understand that it is to be insured against loss by fire.—Boston Times.

IMPORTANT FROM MEXICO.—The National Intelligencer expresses the hope that there is no just ground for the new complaint on the part of the Government of Mexico against the United States, alluded to in the following paragraph from the New Orleans Tropic of January 17:

"We learn from letters which appear in late Mexican papers, that the recent proceedings of Commodore Jones at Monterey are not the only grounds of complaint the Mexican Government have against this country. El Siglo Diez y Nueve publishes three letters from the new Governor of California, stating the particulars of what he terms an outrage on his Government at the port of San Diego. From the statement given, it appears that during the month of November a party of men entered that port and spiked eight cannon belonging to the fortification. The officers of the brig Alert, bearing the U. S. flag, are charged with the perpetration of this offence, as she was seen off the port some days before, and several boats filled with men were seen passing between the vessel and the shore about the time of the alleged offence." In his own peculiar style, the Governor invokes the action of the Supreme Government in the business.

REVOLUTIONARY RELIC.—A couple of boys on Monday afternoon picked up in Black Cove a bomb shell, which was undoubtedly thrown from one of the British ships in the bombardment of Falmouth, in October, 1775. It is about twelve inches in diameter, and now weighs something like one hundred and fifty pounds.—Portland Adv.

IMMIGRATION.—The number of emigrants who arrived in Canada from foreign countries, during the year 1842, was 44,474, viz: steerage passengers from Ireland 25,470, from England 11,892, from Scotland 5,874, lower ports 524, cabin passengers 614. The number at New York, during the same period, was 74,949.—Total, in Canada and New York, in one year, 119,323. During fourteen years, ending with 1842 inclusive, there arrived in Canada:

From England,	85,965	emigrants
" Ireland,	228,335	"
" Scotland,	47,300	"
" Other countries,	4,761	"
Cabin passengers 1842,	614	"
Total,	366,675

During the same period, at New York, 566,932, and at other American ports enough to swell the aggregate number of emigrants to the United States and Canada, in fourteen years, to at least a million; being at the average rate of over 70,000 per annum, of which, to the United States, about 50,000 per annum.

A preacher of the Millerite doctrine in Sherbrook, N. B., named Swazy, has been fined £5.10s. for committing an assault and battery upon one of his congregation. It appears that "Swazy" was in the practice, during the meeting time, of "struggling" and pretending to have visions while kicking about upon the floor.

One of his congregation happened to catch hold of the Reverend gentleman's leg as he was gyrating upon the floor, received for his pains a kick, which knocked him up against a bench in such a fair position for the repetition of the attack, that before he was rescued, he was nearly kicked to death, the preacher pegging away at him with most determined perseverance. The preacher said that he could not help it, but the beaten man chose to consider it as an assault, and so brought suit, and recovered damages.

The New York Tribune states, that the Judge Advocate, on the trial of Commander Mackenzie will be assisted by Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, and Charles O'Connor, Esqs., who have been retained for this purpose by the Hon. John C. Spencer, Secretary of War.

Neatly engraved three dollar bills, purporting to be issued by the "Rochester Canal Bank," have been set afloat at Rochester, N. Y. There never was such an institution.

There arrived at St. Louis, on the 8th and 9th inst., 1417 passengers, principally English and German.

Philip B. Winstone, Jr., a citizen of Louisa county Va., was recently killed by a fall from an unruly horse.

INVOCATION TO SLEEP.

BY MISS CELIA M. TIBBITS.

I come to thee, O sleep, with all my woes,
With the deep sorrows of a troubled breast,
From the loud tumult of the busy world,
I come for rest.

Take me, O take me from this life's dull cares,
And from the darkness of its storm-clad sky;
From the corroding of the spirit's grief,
The untold anguish of its wo-fraught sigh.

Take my o'er wearied spirit from its load,
Once more to revel in thy dreamy land,
Where the bright waters of oblivion's wave
Break with low music on the coral strand:

Thou that canst lock affliction's hidden spring;
That lies concealed within the heart's deep cell,
Bring back old melodies, the loved of yore,
My youth's bright fancies in my dreams to dwell.

Bring back to me the dear old cottage home,
That lay embosomed in the orchard shade,
With the low music of the silvery stream,
That slowly wandered through the flowery glade.

Bring the glad bird-notes, which the joyous spring
Sent warbling forth from that old poplar's height,
The rose tinged blossoms, which the apple boughs
Shed scattering o'er me, like a shower of light—

The moss grown rock beneath the quivering shade,
With some loved volume of the tales of yore,
The bright clouds sailing o'er the twilight sky,
O let me live in dreams those bright hours o'er.

And yet not such—for oh the waking hour,
Would bring a sadness more profoundly deep;
Call them not back, bright memories of the past,
Rather above them let oblivion sleep,

Nor yet the loved ones of my happier days,
With the deep meaning of their soul-lit eyes,
Those upon whom my first, last love was poured—
Oh, in my dreamings, let not them arise.

But bring to me my home—that better land
Where the worn pilgrim rests his wearied soul;
Bid the full chorus of the heavenly choir,
O'er the wild tumult of my being roll.

O let me gaze upon its cloudless sky!
And lave my spirit in the stream of life,
That I may gather from its brightness, strength
To bear me onward through the varying strife.

WHY IS IT?

BY REV. S. GOFF.

Why is it that Universalists are so backward about coming forward and engaging in the exercises of social conference meetings? Why are they so unwilling to speak in public of the great goodness of God in the gift of his Son for our redemption; of the joys of faith in the "exceeding great and precious promises" of the Gospel; of the preciousness of the "hope which is as an anchor of the soul both sure and steadfast;" and of our duty to "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour by well ordered lives?" And why is it that so few are willing to unite in prayer to the throne of grace for the outpouring of his spirit; for the upbuilding of the Redeemer's kingdom in the earth; and in praise and thanksgiving to God for the abundance of his mercies; and "for the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness toward us through Christ Jesus?" Why, I ask, are these things so? It is a fact that there are many persons among us, who are well instructed in the doctrinal truths of our faith; who acknowledge the claims it has upon us, to "live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world;" and who, when they meet a neighbor, or in the social circle, can talk understandingly, and feelingly too, upon the subject of religion; and yet, who, when they go to the social meeting, where the object is to instruct, exhort, and encourage each other, are as silent as the grave. Not a word escapes their lips. They come, and go away, and no one knows whether they have any interest, or any feeling upon the subject or not. This is truth, solemn truth, and we can not deny it. But why is it so? Have we no real interest, no real feeling? Is our religion mere theory? and are all our professions of love and regard for the truth mere pretension? If this is not so—and I hope it is not—why, we repeat, are so many so unwilling to engage in the exercises of social worship? Will some of our silent worshippers speak out, if it be but for once, and answer? We can not dismiss this subject without reminding our brethren of what the Saviour said to his disciples. "Ye are the salt of the earth: but if the salt have lost its savor, wherewith shall it be salted? it is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out, and trodden under foot of men;" and also, asking them to meditate upon the sentiment of the poet:

"Am I a soldier of the cross,
A follower of the Lamb,
And shall I fear to own his cause,
Or blush to speak his name?"

DEATH.

BY MRS. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

Death! What chilling associations, what gloomy thoughts, what undefinable emotions, are awakened at the mention of this one word! Who that has stood by the bedside of the suffering, and seen the last dying gasp of one who was once active and buoyant, now cold and lifeless in death—has never felt that Death was indeed the king of terrors? Who that has wandered in the silent enclosure which marks the congregation of the dead—has never felt how stern was the mandate which will admit of no reprieve to neither high nor low, rich or poor? Who that has stood by the open grave and seen the coffin of a loved one slowly lowered into its last narrow resting place—has never had the questions rise unvoluntarily in the mind—O God! and must I, too, die? Must this heart which now thrills with emotions I can not express, ere long throbb its last pulsation? Must this frame, through which the life-blood now flows so quickly; ere many years at most, be consigned to that breathless house as food for gnawing worms? Must such, then, be my certain doom?

Who, we ask, that has seen these things—that has learned what death is—has never had the soul swell with these chilling emotions? There is none—not one! In every heart

"There is a sacred dread of death Inwoven with the strings of life;"

and talk as much, and as cheerfully as we may of that time, when we shall be freed from our toils and sorrows—when pains and vexations shall no more oppress, and even of our willingness to lay down life as a heavy burden—it does and ever will

"chill our very souls to think
On that dread hour when life shall end."

But is this all! Is this then the mournful doom of humanity—to sink into the grave and live no more forever? Beams there not even one gladdening ray from beyond, to light our pathway to the tomb? O ye who believe in the testimony of "men who slept"—sad, sad indeed must be your musings, and dreary beyond compare, your thoughts of that "last bitter hour!" We who were placed upon this earth, with every thing that is calculated to render life pleasing, must merely taste the pleasures of existence for a few short fleeting years, and be again hurried back into eternal nonentity! These souls, formed with such longings after immortality, must have their ardent aspirations thrust back upon them, and sleep in annihilation! These minds, so widely capacitated for improvement, must have their founts of knowledge stayed forever! These harpstrings of affection, attuned by God's own perfect hand, must be sundered to be never again reunited! O say not, think not thus! Contend no longer against convictions which must inevitably dawn upon your minds if you but "search the Scriptures" and read understandingly in the volume of Nature which is open before you! There is a

God of infinite goodness, and such can not be our doom!

But is there not something to do that we may meet, with courage, this last enemy—are there not preparations to be made for death? We know that it has been said of those who have no fears of an endless world of unmitigated woe beyond the tomb—that they think it unnecessary to prepare for death. But is this so? We know, too, that there are those who say that they believe in no world of deeper woe than this—who live as though they thought, that dread moment when they should lay down life would never come—as though man were not their brother-man, and who leave the widow and orphan in their afflictions—but they are those who look upon heaven as an escapement from that dread abode, rather than as a happy home, where all shall meet in purity and equality—they are those who have never caught but a glimmering from the light of our glorious faith.

Yes, there is a preparation to be made; but will this consist in binding closely to our hearts a faith, which when we lie us down on that last bed will fill our hearts with dark suspicions of the character of the great Invisible, and with gloomy doubts and foreboding fears of our own sure calling—which will teach us that the parting with friends, kindred, and loved ones, may be an eternal one, and that the ties of sympathy and affection will never again be reunited? O say! will a faith which can but awaken such reflections, be calculated to inspire a calm resignation or a heavenly peace? Ah, no—and such is not a preparation for death. For this, rather seek for evidences which are so abundantly found both in Nature and Revelation, that shall establish perfection in the attributes of Him whose name is love—build thy faith on this immovable basis—strive, as he has required of thee "to deal justly, love mercy, and walk humbly before God"—then when called by the pale Messenger, thou canst look back without remorse, and in confidence yield thy spirit into the hands of Him who gave it! Yes,

"So live, that when thy summons come to join
The innumerable caravan, that moves
To the pale realms of shade, where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon; but, sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave,
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams."

DEDICATION AND CONFERENCE AT SMITHVILLE.

On Wednesday and Thursday, 25th and 26th ult., a Conference of the Chenango Association of Universalists was holden at Smithville Flats, and the new Universalist Meetinghouse, erected in that village during the past season, was solemnly dedicated to the worship of Almighty God. The dedicatory services were performed on Wednesday in the following order:

1. Voluntary by the Choir. 2. Reading of select Scriptures by Br. A. O. Warren. 3. Hymn. 4. Introductory prayer by Br. J. T. Goodrich. 5. Dedicatory hymn. 6. Sermon by Br. D. Skinner from Prov. ix: 1, 2. 7. Dedicatory prayer by the same. 8. Anthem. 9. Benediction.

In addition to the dedicatory services, those of the Conference were held during the two days.—Sermons were preached on Wednesday by Brs. J. T. Goodrich and A. O. Warren, and on Thursday by Brs. D. Skinner and W. M. DeLong. Notwithstanding the extreme inclemency of the weather and badness of the travelling, the congregation was large and very respectable. The house, especially on Wednesday, was much crowded, and a commendable zeal manifested by our brethren and friends in this place and the surrounding neighborhoods. The house is built of wood, 36 by 46 feet, with a vestibule and orchestra or small gallery in front, surmounted by a modest and well proportioned steeple, the whole finished in a plain but very neat and good style, and painted throughout.

It reflects credit on our denomination and much honor on the zeal and perseverance of the few choice spirits who went forward in the work, in despite of difficulties and obstacles arising from the pressure of the times and other causes, to the completion of this commodious house of worship. The society is neither large nor wealthy, and in these times were not able to complete their house without exceeding in their outlay the amount of available subscriptions; and are consequently in debt for the house about $500. An effort was made the day after the dedication to raise this amount by subscription, and nearly half the sum was subscribed in a short time. And we can not but hope they will persevere in the effort, and that our friends, one and all, in the region, some of whom have as yet done little or nothing, will put to a helping hand, pay off the church debt at once, (which is always a deadly incubus to the prosperity of any society while it exists,) thus free the society from embarrassment, and enable them to take hold with renewed courage and zeal, employ a preacher, which they will then be enabled to do for one half the time, and thus go on prospering and to prosper. Our cause is onward in all this region; moderately prosperous in most places where the preached word is enjoyed, and highly so at Oxford where our worthy Br. Goodrich ministers constantly in word and doctrine. Its aspect through the country is altogether more encouraging than it has ever been before. May the great Head of the church continue to bless and prosper it now and evermore.

THE PROGRESS OF CHRISTIANITY.

There can be no doubt that Christianity has been most powerfully influential in elevating nations and establishing peace and prosperity on the earth. Take the condition of the nations wherein Christianity now prevails, and compare it with the condition of the same nations or their ancestors before the Gospel was known to them; compare the refinement now with the barbarity then, and the institutions now with the lawlessness then, and say what but Christianity has placed enlightened nations where they are in the scale of true greatness.—From the rude barbarians of the North; the Franks, the Gauls, the Saxons, (or as Tacitus says they were all called, the Getherman, or German tribes,) to the establishment of these people in separate political powers, and thence to the speculative, inquiring, learning German, the refined and polite Frenchman, the aspiring ambitious Englishman, and the enterprising, venturesome, indefatigable American descendant, there is but the upward and onward progress of nations under the legitimate workings of Christianity. If this were to be struck out of existence, its disappearance from the knowledge of men, would be the signal for the rapid retrogression and decay of the best institutions which now characterize the enlightened nations of the earth.

But it is not alone externally that Christianity works. It operates upon individual mind and heart, giving light and increasing the thirst for knowledge, and imparting purer thoughts and holier motives. Where are the clannish robberies which used to so delight the minds of our ancestors? Where are the thousands of self-constituted and voluntary bandits, who once infested the hills and valleys of Europe? Not where Christianity now prevails; they have all retired before the advance of the doctrine of Christ. The mind can not tolerate them, where this doctrine is felt. The wholesale slaughter, the cruel barbarity of ancient times are not known in Christendom. And having dismissed—1 should say expelled—these, the mind is now bringing the light of truth to bear upon evils still existing, but which were formerly unseen, in the denser cloud of enormities. It is this increasing consciousness of right and wrong, which confirms me in the belief that Christianity is constantly making man better. In all our advances of mind and morals, the Gospel standard is still above us, and leading us on to victory over sin and death.—Refer me not to the hanging of heretics, and the drowning of witches, as though these were worse than former times amid anti-Christian people. They were a decided advance upon the morals of former times. For every heretic that was hung by pretending Christians, hundreds of wives were burned at the funeral pile. For every witch that was drowned, in modern days, twenty thousand victims fell a sacrifice to the inhuman sports of the gladiators of old.

Say not, then, that Christianity has not improved the minds and morals of man. Even now, the drowning of one witch, is more deeply execrated by those who feel Christianity's power, than the sacrifice of whole multitudes was, where the Gospel had not reached. By the power of divine truth, the old deluge of iniquity has been made to disappear; the human mind has been so elevated, and enlightened, that, in its deliverance from the excessive immorality of the past, it is now scanning and condemning acts and principles which then were not thought of as criminal. And so will the truth continue its triumphs, until the evils which it now exposes so glaringly, will be destroyed, and the practices which are now overlooked, or hid by the more serious evils, will then be dragged out to the condemning, conquering, purifying light of Christianity. This is the work of the Gospel of Christ, and the promise of the ultimate triumph over all sin. Its principles and power will be wafted in a thousand ways, to nations and people who have not learned of Jesus, and they too shall yield to the peaceful influences of Christianity, learn to know the Lord, and adore Him for His wonderful works.—Bless the Lord, O, my soul, for the evidences which thou seest that the kingdoms of this world are fast becoming the kingdom of our Lord and His Christ.

UNIVERSALIST PERIODICALS.

"The Nazarene, and Universalist Family Companion," is published every Saturday, by Gihon, Fairchild & Co., S. E. corner of Market and Seventh streets, Philadelphia, on a sheet of medium size, fine white paper, fair type, quarto form, at $2.00 per annum, payable in advance. Revs. Asher Moore and J. H. Gihon, Editors. The second volume, (reduced size), of this excellent co-worker, commenced with the year, and thus far sustains well its reputation for usefulness.

"The Gospel Messenger," a folio paper, super-royal size, is published every Saturday, in Providence, R. I., at $1.50 per annum in advance. Br. A. A. Davis, whose health prevents him from preaching, is the Proprietor, and is aided in editing it by Br. H. Bacon, Editor of the Ladies Repository, and Br. D. B. Harris, also a good writer. This paper is well conducted and well printed. The third volume, which commenced January 18th, is thus far an improvement on its predecessors. It is moderately anti-slavery in many of its articles. Br. A. A. Davis is much beloved by those who know him, and sympathy for his misfortune in being compelled to suspend preaching, has procured him the aid of many excellent correspondents, so that not only sympathy for the man, but the merits of the paper, should secure for it a good support.

"The Better Covenant" has also entered on a new volume—its second—with some improvements in its appearance, and some changes in its owners and editors. It is now wholly owned and edited by Br. S. Barnes, who will be aided by Br. Rounseville and others, as correspondents. It is published on a royal sheet, quarto form, every Thursday, at two dollars per annum, in advance. Address, St. Charles, Ill. It appears to be doing much good in that western region, if we may judge from the new societies, &c.; that are there springing up, and the fact that it is sustained by the friends in that region.

"The Primitive Expounder" is the title of a new periodical which has just reached us. It is what we would call a Baptist-Universalist or Campbellite-Universalist paper—that is, it is devoted to inculcating, "faith in the Messiah—repentance toward God, and baptism (by immersion) for the remission of sins . . . as things necessary in order to enter the kingdom of Christ—which is righteousness and peace." In other doctrinal matters, it will be the same, we presume, as other Universalist papers. We regret to perceive this exclusive and narrow feature in it—the virtual disfellowship of all our brethren who have not been baptized by immersion into water—the denial of their possessing righteousness, peace and joy in a holy spirit, simply because they have not submitted to an ordinance which Paul was not sent to perform when he was made an apostle to the Gentiles, and in ad mode, too, which few deem of binding force at the present day, in order to enter the kingdom of God, which Paul preached to us Gentiles without it! How long this exclusion from the possession of "righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost" is to continue, this number does not inform us—whether the "necessary" condition is to be dispensed with in another world, or whether we must there, as here, be immersed in water before we can be saved, our brethren of the Primitive Expounder do not state. However, as they teach that all will be saved, finally, we presume they see a way clearly in which this "necessary" ceremony can be dispensed with, or performed on us, after we become or are raised immortalized spirits! With this exception, we can commend the Primitive Expounder to the patronage of our brethren of the Abrahamic faith. It is to be published every Thursday, in Ann Arbor, Mich., on a small sheet, octavo form, at one dollar per annum, invariably in advance. Brs. J. Billings and Wm. Chase, Editors and Proprietors—Brs. A. H. Curtis and C. P. West, Corresponding Editors—all good brethren, we believe, and some of them able workmen in the good cause, if they do not allow their zeal for what they call "the Primitive and Apostolic order of things in the Church" to run them into Campbellism with its non-essential ceremonies, to the injury of Universalism. As they make it a cash business, they will soon know whether they will be sustained, or not—or what the experiment will cost them.

"Messenger of Glad Tidings"—another new Universalist paper, but to take the place of the Southern Universalist, lately gone down in Georgia. The Messenger hails from Wetumpka, Alabama. It is a weekly, super-royal folio, published and edited by Br. S. J. McMorris, at three dollars per annum in advance. Br. P. Brownson, the Editor of the late So. Universalist, still remains in Columbus, Ga., and preaches in that vicinity.

PARTIALISM.

Br. Grosh—do you think that word "Partialist" a good one as a cognomen for those who are opposed to Universalism? If they are Partialists, are not we Impartialists? Let us have both words to correspond; adopt for either that which is the most correct, and apply its opposite to those of an opposite side. Partial is not the opposite of Universal; consequently Partialism is not the proper opposite of Universalism. At least so we think—are we right?

REPLY.—So says and inquires Br. Drew, who appears to have assumed, of late, the office of Corrector General of all the philosophical and philological errors of our periodicals; and to have engaged with such zeal in weeding out the gardens of his neighbors, that he not only suffers his own to go without weeding, but even pulls up some plants in others' gardens, which his neighbors deem a little better than weeds! He and Br. Cobb came near getting at loggerheads the other day, on this account—and Br. Whittemore complains that he has been misrepresented in the Banner—and one of Br. Drew's correspondents is out on him in the Amulet for misrepresenting him, and refusing to correct it—and we notice in the very paper from which we copy the foregoing, several blunders, some of which we will correct, for fun's sake, in another place. And now, to answer the inquiries.

It is not always in the power of any denomination to choose its own name. The self-styled Christian denomination are called Christians (Christians)—the Disciples or Reformers, are called Campbellites—and even after centuries, the Friends are best known by the name of Quakers. Thus it is in many other instances, familiar to us all. Universalists are known by the name they seem to have quietly received and adopted as their own, and are, generally, so well satisfied with it, that I very much doubt whether Br. Drew and myself, even if we were to unite and concentrate all our splendid talents, profound learning and glowing zeal on the subject, could induce them to change it for that of Impartialist. Did not Br. Balch, the great Philologist, and bold Reformer of Orthography, make trial of it years ago, in his paper called "The Impartialist!"—and did he not fail?—how then can we succeed? I marvel, though, to behold Br. Drew take up with Br. Balch's "leavings!" Is he not opposed in toto to all Br. Balch's improvements?

Turn we then to the term, "Partialist." It is not used to denote that our opposers believe in a God who is partial; but to denote that, whereas we believe in the salvation of all, or a universal salvation, they believe that a part only will be saved, or in a partial salvation. In this sense, or thus explained, the term seems to us sufficiently appropriate and expressive. And as any other term we could select, might be as much misunderstood, and need therefore as much defining as this one, I do not feel inclined to take up any new term in its place. For by the time the new word had been used until it was familiar to our readers, Br. Drew might discover that it was not just what it ought to be, and would probably propose to us to adopt Br. Cobb's "leavings"—the very improvement Br. Drew now opposes—"endless miseries!" I go, therefore, for retaining the old terms, "Unitarian" and "Partialist;" and as the latter comes handiest to my German tongue and pen, I shall use it until a better one comes along. Having thus deliberately, seriously, and solemnly decided, I will now proceed to defend my chosen term against Br. Drew's charges, logic, and philological zeal.

1. The terms "Partialism" and "Partialist," have not reference, as Br. Drew's argument seems to suppose, to the temper or disposition of the believers, or of the God believed in—to the favor which the Deity, or any other being, regards mankind—but wholly to the proportion or number which shall be saved finally.—"Universalist" and "Universalism" have reference, not to the disposition of God, but to the extent of ultimate salvation; and the contrasted terms applied to our opposers must be construed in reference to the same object—the subject on which is made the contrast in our respective beliefs. "Impartialist" with its contrast, "Partialist," (the same word, I admit, but contrasted thus, bearing a widely different meaning,) might well denote that we were impartial in our affections and our opposers partial in theirs—or, that our views of God represented him as impartial in his disposition, while the views of our opposers represent him as partial—but they would not, of themselves, directly express our or their views in regard to the number, (whether none, some, or all,) that would finally be saved. But the words in question being contrasted with "universal salvation," do, at once, and directly, express this desired information.

2. Though I admit that the terms "general" and "partial" are the dissynonyms, or contrasted words—"opposites" as Br. Drew very unlearnedly terms them, instead of pursuing his usual course of coining words, (vide his coinages autodox, conspite, trialogue, etc.)—yet, as a universal salvation is not the opposite of a partial salvation, but of a universal damnation, we do not need a fully and decidedly opposite term to express the two parties in question. The terms "Partialist" and "Universalist" express as wide a difference as actually exists in our several and respective views on that subject.

3. The present terms are now well understood by the intelligent portion of our opposers, and are therefore no longer offensive, as they were when they were misunderstood as Br. Drew, now appears to misunderstand them. (We tried to word this so as to avoid charging Br. Drew with seeming ignorance greater than that of some of our opposers—but these Dutch quills have such blunt points and stiff springs, that they will not travel around a plain truth at all—at all!) The only objection of our opposers to the old and now common terms, arose from conceiving them to be reproachful and disparaging nicknames. By "Unitarian" they supposed we charged them with limiting God's attributes, when they expressly asserted them to be infinite and unlimited. But having learned that we mean by it, merely, that they believe in the salvation of but a limited portion of mankind, in contrast to our belief in universal salvation, they are satisfied. So with the word "Partialist"—it only gave needless and injurious offence, by being misunderstood—construed to refer to their dispositions, or to the disposition they ascribed to God—both of which they declared to be as impartial as our own. But applied to the number to be saved, and their objections vanish. Now Br. Drew's proposition would renew and give all this needless offence again—bring on us the injurious reproach of calling our opposers nicknames, etc.—and thus would block up the way in which our cause must advance, with prejudices well founded, and therefore hard to remove. Some may say that the names proposed by Br. Drew would, nevertheless, be correctly applied. Candor demands that we never charge people with holding tenets which they disavow—and hard names, however deserved, seldom convince an opposer.

4. But Br. Drew may throw himself on this very misapprehension, once entertained by our opposers, as proof of the correctness of his philology. He must remember, however, that a jealous opposer is more apt at once to put a wrong meaning on a term applied to him than he is coolly to investigate the intent with which it was applied, and to ascertain its true meaning by calm reference to the word with which it is intended to form a contrast. And a jealous opposer, is, for this reason, a bad example for a learned Corrector General to follow. Besides, the very fact that the calm, reflective and candid portion of our opposers now acquiesce in the correctness of the term "Partialist" as a contrast with the term "Universalist" having reference to universal salvation, is still stronger proof in favor of the definition we have given to the words, and the propriety of their application—and is, besides, a good example, which, if Br. Drew will but follow it, will lead him out of his present philological error on this subject.

My Dutchship here rests the plea for the present—what says Br. Drew's Yankeeism in reply thereto?

REV. T. CLOWES, LL. D.

I have long desired to express a few thoughts in relation to this brother, to the Universalist public, as I have often done privately to a number of individuals as I had opportunity; but have been prevented by delicacy and other circumstances. He is now distant from here, and out of employment under circumstances which may justify public remarks, and various calls made for his labors as an expositor and commentator seem to demand what I have to utter.

The call of Br. H. J. (Henry Jewel, it is presumed) in the Trumpet, of Br. Montgomery in our columns; a desire of many of our preachers and laymen, and undoubtedly of the readers of the Gospel Banner, to see a continuation of his "Doctrinal and Critical Essays" on the state of the dead, the duration of punishment, &c., &c.; and a desire expressed by several of our periodicals that he should examine Br. Balfour's views on the immortality of the soul, all show the estimation in which his learning and candor are held by us, and the necessity we feel for being benefitted by getting their results into a tangible form before our denomination. Dr. Clowes has a large and valuable library, which he has studied for many years with the engrossing devotion of a zealous student. He has marked with innumerable references the ancient Greek authors in his possession, so as to be able to quote the passages they contain which will illustrate and prove the common use of the words and phrases on which turn the controversies between us and our opposers; and has carefully noted down in the originals of the Scriptures, every passage where such words and phrases also occur. In short, by long study and much labor he has collected and is collecting stores of materials for critical and doctrinal essays, which will be of very great value to the biblical student, but which may be lost to us, if not soon embodied into some regular form, as tables or essays, accessible to those who desire to avail themselves of the results of his labors. Though in the enjoyment of good health in general, and a constitution capable of enduring great labor, and not yet far advanced in years; yet Br. Clowes is not exempt from sudden and violent attacks of illness, and can not be expected to live a very great number of years. But it will require years for him to arrange and publish even what he has already marked out—years of considerable leisure to devote to that work alone. What, then, can be done, to secure to him a support, which will enable him to devote a considerable portion of time to this much needed labor?

I wish to impress this question on the minds of Universalists, so as to engage their feelings, and secure their efforts to answer it practically. What can we do, which shall secure to Dr. Clowes a reasonable support, and yet allow him sufficient leisure to apply himself to his books, free from embarrassments and other cares, so that he may, as early as possible, give us the results of his past and present labors?

Had I the means to spare, I could answer this question without proposing it thus publicly. However well qualified the Doctor may be to take charge of an Academy or College, or however much he may desire such a station, I believe it is not the best one to place him in for the interests of our denomination. He needs a station of less care, and affording more leisure—one whose duties will conflict less with the work in which we wish him to labor for the cause. Now he is separated from his library—his mind agitated by the unjust usage received from public men in Philadelphia, and exercised in contending thoughts on the best means of obtaining a situation in which he can earn a subsistence for himself and family. Consequently, all this time, as far as the interests of our denomination are concerned, is utterly thrown away. What can be done to terminate it, and engage him in pursuits more congenial to his mind and habits?

We once thought of a monthly publication, to be edited by him, devoted to his service for the great object in view. But, really, at the present time, we fear that sufficient support could not be obtained to pay the expense and yield him a good support beside—and without the latter, the whole plan would fail. Perhaps a small select school—or his services as a preacher, might not interfere too much with his main pursuits, and add a sufficiency to make out the desired support. We have preachers, and intelligent laymen enough, able to pay for such a periodical—but, we remember the Expositor, and ask, Will they do it?—Is the prospect sufficiently encouraging to warrant making a trial? Could a plan be devised for such a publication, to make it sufficiently attractive and popular, so as to secure a sufficient support—cash support—and yet leave room enough in it for the weighty, solid matter the Doctor should furnish?

Or, if this plan will not do—what can be done—what situation be procured, the support of which will be sufficient to secure the wished-for labors? We pass these considerations and questions to our editorial and ministering brethren generally, in the hope that they will agitate the subject, until an answer to our inquiries is obtained.

WEEDING GARDEN.

In reading our exchange papers we frequently meet with errors of statements, names, syntax and orthography, which for a moment give an unpleasant sensation, and induce a desire to correct them at once in our columns. But we remember, generally at least in time, that our own education has not qualified us so thoroughly as to enable us to escape the commission of similar errors in our sheet—and so, instead of weeding a neighbor's garden, we go to pulling up what we can recognize as weeds in our own. But the other day, reading that excellent sheet the Gospel Banner, and noticing how zealously its worthy Editor, Br. Drew, was engaged in correcting the faults of others, we thought to mark a few blemishes in his own sheet. The following are all we have found in that number of his paper. We have not noticed mere typographical errors, and have confined our examinations to the editorial items on the inside pages of the paper.

1. "Newspaporia!"—as the final syllable of newspaper is spelt with an e, we conclude that this new coinage of Br. Drew's means news-pap-oria, i. e. something relating to pap called "news pap"—probably the paste made by the Imp!

N. B.—The "new coined word" in this article may pass—but it should be "newly coined word."

2. "If he would find a girl whom he would magnetize to see lost money," &c. Undoubtedly the magnetizer did will (would) to find a girl whom he did will (would) to magnetize, &c.—and yet Br. Drew would (did will) not believe in it! He meant, "if he could find a girl, whom he could magnetize," &c.

3. "There might be two efficient societies established in that place." What place? He was writing of two villages called "Camden Harbor," and "Goose River!"

4. "He would be just the man no doubt; but if he would not go, we would nominate another." Having reference to future time in the if, it should be will, which "will" being granted, Br. D. then "would nominate another."

5. The article headed "Sad," is full of wrong statements. Rev. Caleb Bush is a Baptist, not a Presbyterian—"when he left," (says Br. Drew) "as many pious ladies followed him to the cars and sung farewell songs, as usually escort Knapp out of a place." Whew! what an imagination that Br. D. has got! No cars leave Monroeton, for there is no rail road there. The original account said not a word of ladies following Mr. Bush, or of singing farewell songs! Has Br. Drew been correcting the Nazarene's statement by clairvoyance? No account is given of Mr. Bush's daily and nightly foul crimes in Monroeton, in the Nazarene. The seduced female lived, not in Monroeton, Pa., but in Weedsport, N. Y. The officers of the law followed Mr. Bush, not to Danville (Dansville), N. Y.; but to Danville, Pa. If newspapers are the stuff out of which history is made, of what use would be a history made out of such exceedingly incorrect paragraphs as this, here noticed?

6. "The house was so much more than full," [has Br. Drew any Dutch or Irish blood in him?] "that the sexton had to fill the aisles with portable benches" [a smart man, that sexton, to put benches into a house after it was more than full!—probably his great grandfather was the inventor of the trick of putting a quart into a pint bottle!] "for the accommodation of the people," [poor accommodation, methinks, to put benches into a house more than full already!] "all of whom, after all," [that's right, Br. Drew; while your hand is in at Irishisms, keep it up!] "could not get in"—and no wonder!

7. "Three numbers more will complete the series"—meaning, of Dr. Clowes' Essays, which Br. Drew is copying from our paper into his. Statement not correct. The series is not completed in this paper yet.—Dr. C. has repeatedly announced his intention of continuing the Essays—lately, in the Nazarene, he has again stated so; and in a private letter to myself, says he will soon send us another number.

There, Br. Drew, we have criticised only three columns and a half of your paper—weeded three and a half beds of your garden—and I am sure you will confess that you never Drew larger, ranker, rarer or droller weeds out of any body's garden you ever generously undertook to weed for them, whether they were willing or not. In view of this sample, would it not be well to attend a little more to your own, and a little less to other folks?—especially as those other folks appear so ungrateful for your kindness? "I ask only for information!"

A. B. G.

FACTS.

It is a fact that "hard times" are felt harder by printers than almost any other class of people—because too many think a newspaper not so necessary to their families, as some article of ornament or luxury for themselves!

It is a fact that many people deem it greater dishonesty to neglect paying for useless or even injurious articles of luxury, than it is to neglect paying for a paper which has rendered more real and lasting benefit to their families than five times the amount of its cost.

It is a fact that we want more of our subscribers to pay promptly for our paper; and that we want more subscribers, also!—because labor goes easy when pay is sure—and easier still, when we know it is doing a great deal of good beside.

A. B. G.

Br. E. H. Chapin, of Charlestown, has been chosen by the Legislature of Mass. to deliver the next election sermon. Last year he was one of the chaplains to the Legislature of that State.

Br. J. F. Witherell, of Concord, N. H., proposes to publish a semi-monthly "Anti-Millerite Expositor," in pamphlet form, at $1.00 for eight copies, for six months. It is put low, for cash, that it may be distributed where needed.

MORE NEW PREACHERS.—Hon. John Burnham, of Orland, Me., formerly a Baptist clergyman, has embraced Universalism, and commenced preaching it. He is a gentleman of great respectability and fine talents. C. F. R. Shehane, of Griffin, Georgia, a popular preacher among the Campbellites, and lately an Editor of a Campbellite paper in that section, has come out and embraced the doctrine of Universalism. He is a man of considerable learning and spotless reputation, says the "Messenger of Glad Tidings."

"THE MIDNIGHT CRY."—We acknowledge the reception of a double number of this Millerite paper, and think it well named. It is the cry of some poor mortals out of the deep, midnight darkness of old Orthodoxy, as the nightmare presses upon them its fear of the end of the world, and causes them to believe that all is light around them. They will awake one of these days, if they live long enough, and will find the hag that rode them, and the light that shone around them, and the fear that made them cry out in their deep darkness, to be altogether imaginary. We pray God that the discovery may tend to lead them into the clear, living light of God's own truth.

Will such of our friends as do not wish to preserve the Magazine for binding, return No. 2, current (14th) volume, to us. Also, Post Masters who have the 1st and 2d Nos. of our paper lying in their offices which have been sent to subscribers who have since discontinued, please return the same to this office. Will our agents and patrons also have the kindness to inquire at their several Post Offices, and if any of the above Nos. are to be found, have them returned. We are getting short of No 2, especially.

EPITAPH.

Written for a Mother and her Child.

BY MISS C. W. BARBER.

Pause, Stranger, by this grave, and drop a tear;
A mother and her babe lies buried here;
They faded in their early hours,
As fades at morn two lovely flowers,—
Passed in their brightness to the realm of shade,
And side by side beneath this sod are laid.

AN IRISH SERVANT.

BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

Mrs. L. was a lady in London, who, when she advertised for a housemaid, added the very unamiable, but by no means unfrequent, "P. S. No Irish need apply." Notwithstanding, a very decent, pretty, respectable-looking young Irish woman did present herself in the lady's drawing room as an applicant for the situation.

"I told you," said Mrs. L., "that no Irish need apply."

"It was on the paper, I know, ma'am," answered the girl; "but I thought if I had a good character, and could do my work well, that no lady would refuse me bread because of my country."

Mrs. L. was a young housekeeper, and she worded her advertisement by the advice of friends; persons who cherished a prejudice as if it were a perfection, and, forgetting altogether how frequently they have had idle, dirty, careless, and dishonest English servants, pour out the vial of their wrath upon the Irish, from whom they withhold the power of exhibiting their advantages by contrast. Fortunately for Kitty Gallagher, however, Mrs. L. was considerate as well as just. She looked into the poor girl's open and honest countenance as she stood with the flush of humble indignation on her cheek, inquired carefully into her character, and examined her three or four written discharges, which of course "went for nothing," but subsequently called on two persons who had known her; and the result was her engagement.

Mrs. L. was the wife of a highly respectable mercantile man; one of a class who, of all others, entertain great mistrust of the Irish people; their methodical, and business-like habits preventing them from making allowances for the volatility and heedlessness of their mercurial neighbors. Mrs. L. had consequently to encounter the "astonishment" of her acquaintances, and the warnings of her husband.

With every desire to do right, and habits that were tolerably clean and very active, Kitty found she had so much to learn that she frequently cried herself to sleep; as she told us herself, it was not the hard work that overcame her—she could do ten times as much, and think nothing of it—but "the particularity"—the necessity for spotless stairs and carpets, for stoves polished like mirrors, for a total absence of dust everywhere; for a manner staid, silent, smileless, and of distant respect; for a noiseless step, and a voice never heard except in the most soft and brief reply; then the getting up of fine things: she could have washed to make like snow, table-cloths, sheets, and dresses, but the difficulties of small plaiting and clear starching, the very clock-like regularity of the house, "broke her heart"—there was a place for every thing, and every thing must be in its place. Then her fellow-servants would set her wrong instead of right, and sneer at her afterwards; they ridiculed her country, and wondered she could eat any thing but potatoes, like all her people. Though loving to laugh, she did not relish being laughed at; and between her desire to do well in all things, and her national sensitiveness, poor Kitty had enough to encounter during the first twelve months of her servitude. On the other hand, Mrs. L. more than fancied she had acted imprudently. Kitty was not only blamed by the other servants for what she did not: her eagerness to please frequently occasioned blunders and mistakes; her phraseology was perplexing; and her foot was not as light, nor her "manner" as fully formed, as that of a London servant. But then her habits were very inoffensive. She was ever cheerful—willing to assist in every one's work; no matter how late or how early her services were needed, she was always ready. By degrees she blundered less, and absolutely dusted both corners and skirtings without "following." Then she was so humble when reproved, so happy when praised!

At first a sort of womanly spirit prevented Mrs. L. from confessing she was wrong in her judgment, and by degrees—slow, but sure degrees—Catharine established herself in her mistress's good opinion. We have observed a great number of the Irish in England, of all grades and classes. No instance has ever occurred within our knowledge where they failed in attaining their object, except by being drawn off from it to run after something else; when they really persevere, when they add to their native energy a singleness of purpose, we never knew them fail. Kitty, in her humble way, was evidence of this; she felt deeply grateful to her mistress for having made an exception in her favor; she had good sense enough to understand that she had bettered her condition, and to feel that in England, girls "with two or three hundred a-piece" were not ashamed to go to service. She resolved to master the difficulties with which she was surrounded, and to keep her place; gradually her good humor and good nature became appreciated.—Mrs. L.'s two little ones caught the scarlet fever, and when the nurse declared she was afraid to remain with her charge, Kitty volunteered to take her place. "I am not afraid," said she, "and sure God can keep the sickness from me by their bedside as well as by my own; and if I was to go, His will be done! but I am not afraid." Night and day this girl watched with their mother over the children; at her request no stranger smoothed their pillows or aided her exertions; what she lacked in skill she made up in actual tenderness, and her quickness and attention never wearied; in time, the children recovered, but they had become so attached to their Irish nurse that they entreated their mamma to let her remain with them, and the former nurse took Kitty's place. When Kitty was a girl, there were no national schools, and at that time she was so ignorant of "book learning" that she did not know her letters; but she managed to learn them from the children, and concealed her deficiency so well, that Mrs. L. told us it was not until Catharine could read, that she confessed how entirely uninstructed she had been.

During a period of five years she continued in her place, unspoiled by much kindness; and frequently did her mistress boast to her acquaintances of the treasure she possessed in an Irish nurse; it was quite true that Catharine's accent was any thing but correct, still her mistress declared it to be "her only fault," and one for which her fidelity and good conduct amply atoned.—Love now somewhat interfered with her duties; a master carpenter paid his addresses to the kind Hibernian; her mistress was too just to prevent her settling respectably, and as her intended husband had formed an engagement to go to New York the following spring, Kitty decided on remaining with her "darlings" until within a week of their departure, when she was to exchange the guttural of "Gallagher" for the more euphonious name of Miller.

Hitherto Mr. and Mrs. L. had enjoyed in life uninterrupted sunshine—every thing prospered which the merchant undertook; but a few eventful months made a terrible change in their circumstances; loss followed loss with fearful rapidity, until at last their house was advertised to be sold, and Mrs. L., firm and patient in adversity as she had been cheerful and considerate in prosperity, placed Kitty's quarter's wages in her hand, and told her that, for the future, she must herself attend to her children; her voice faltered as she thanked the poor Irish girl for the care and tenderness she had bestowed upon them; and she added a wish, that as the time had arrived when Kitty was to be married, she would inform her of her prospects after she and her husband had been some time in New York, and rely upon Mr. L. to remember her faithfully, if ever he had the power to serve them. We quote Mrs. L.'s own words.

"Catherine," she said, "stood without replying until I had done speaking. I was more agitated at parting with her than with all my other servants: she had evinced more affection towards me and mine in an hour, than the others had shown in a year." "It is to leave you, ma'am, you want me, and to leave the young master and miss! Ah, then, what have I done to make you think I've no heart in my bosom? I'll be no burden to you, but I'll never leave you. Leave you in your trouble? Sure, it's neither peace nor rest I'd have by day or night to think it's my two hands you'd be wanting, and they not in it. And as for Robert Miller, it will be better for him to be by himself for the first two or three years; and so I told him this morning when we parted. 'I'll never leave the mistress in her trouble, Robert,' I said; 'and if it's any bar, why, I'll give you back your promise;' and he would not hear of that, but took on a good deal at first; only it's all over—time and distance are nothing to true hearts, and if he does forget me, I'm doing my duty still. I'll never leave you in your trouble."

"Her devotion, so simple, so perfectly unaffected," added Mrs. L., "drew more tears from my eyes than my own sorrows. I had nerved myself for them, but this overpowered me; the children became wild with joy when they found Kitty was to remain with them; and she certainly was the good spirit of comfort in our humble cottage. But this was not all; she had saved in my service about fifteen pounds, and every farthing of this money she spent in buying in, at the auction which finished the desolation of our once happy home, such small things as she believed me most attached to; these she had conveyed to our dwelling secretly, and then, with a delicacy which must be innate, she entreated me to forgive the liberty she had taken, and endeavored to persuade us she had but returned us our own. I often think that my husband's proud spirit would have been bowed even to breaking, but for the true nobility of Catharine's heart; toiling as she was in all capacities for our sakes, I never saw a shadow on her brow. She was an existing proof (amid much that led us to believe to the contrary) of the disinterested generosity of human nature; she taught us the value of usefulness—she made us ashamed of our prejudices, and never did she once make us feel that she had sacrificed a pin's worth to our interests."

This is no romance—it is simple and unvarnished truth; both the mistress and the servant are intimately known to us; we have not added an iota to the story as the former told it to us. Kitty's generosity of character did not effervesce—during a period of three years she remained firm to her purpose, because Mrs. L. needed her services. At length a distant relative of Mr. L.'s died, and as next of kin, Mr. L. inherited a very comfortable property; then, indeed, Mrs. L. found Kitty more than once weeping over the letters she could hardly read, but which, nevertheless, she knew by heart. It was not, however, until she had succeeded in training "a cousin of her own," whom her mistress not only consented, but was happy to receive, that Kitty performed her promise, and rewarded her lover for his constancy.

How many other examples of devoted and disinterested attachment of Irish servants to their employers, we might add to this, and yet record only cases entirely within our own knowledge!

May we not hope that the prejudice against them in this country, so rapidly diminishing, will be, ere long, altogether gone; and that when their advantages of faithfulness, industry, and willingness to labor, in all ways and on all occasions—have been considered and appreciated, they will acquire those, perhaps, equally essential, habits of neatness and order, into which they have hitherto not been properly disciplined, because kept far too much away from opportunities of improvement?

Where learning is confined to the few, liberty can be neither equal nor universal.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Magazine and Advocate. POPULARITY.

BY REV. S. J. GIBSON.

There are many men in the world who consider the good opinion of others, their alimant, their life, their all. And certainly it is an object worthy of labor, to secure the good will and esteem of our fellow beings; but in the pursuit of the same, one should be influenced and guided, not by designing, but by honest and upright motives. By this method alone, will the effort be successful and the wished-for esteem secured. Let a way be marked out leading straight forward toward the abode of justice, and let that path be pursued with untiring zeal, and the traveller will most assuredly secure the prize. And though one would suppose this truth of sufficient plainness to secure the attention of every individual endowed with a respectable share of common sense, yet there are those who have suffered the desire of popularity to become the ruling passion of their bosoms, and the very anxiety thereby engendered, defeats the main purpose, seemingly, for which they live. Then the principles of justice are lost sight of—a cringing servility manifested by every act, look, and word, and a universal acquiescence with the opinions of others, though many of those opinions may be highly offensive to reason and contradictory in their nature.

In support of this, permit me to introduce to your notice, friendly reader, Mr. A. one of your bowing, polite popularity-loving men, and behold how admirably he secures the object of his labor. He has started from town, and on his way he meets with Mr. B.; and now let us draw near that we may listen to their conversation.

A. Good morning Mr. B.—; your humble servant, sir. Any thing new this morning, or have the dull times put to flight every object of interest?

B. Why, no;—the times are indeed dull, very dull, yet the people are living; laboring to get a living honestly; but now and then one, I am sorry to say, makes a mistake, and lays hold upon dishonesty instead of the most noble principle planted in the breast of man.

A. How so? Please explain; for there seems to be some definite and particular meaning in your language.

B. Well, there is Mr. C. the pink of perfection as most of people suppose: being in want of some money a few months since in order to meet a few payments, I applied to him for the loan of it. He very readily accommodated me, but reserved the right of "double percentage," because as he said he lived upon his interest money, which he could not do unless such a method was adopted; and upon that condition, he left it to my option, to take it or otherwise. Not knowing where I could obtain the sum under a more reasonable rate, I concluded to receive it; thinking that when due, by remonstrance I could induce him to abate somewhat of the interest. But I found out that I made wrong calculations; for last week he called upon me for the amount and positively refused to yield a solitary cent of the specified percentage. And because I refused to pay it, he strongly declared that he would expose my dishonesty in a court of justice, for not doing as I agreed, even if he thereby lost the whole sum.

A. Indeed, Mr. B. I have long been firmly persuaded that the world would become in possession of a knowledge of that man's true character.—Though many believe him to be swayed by the principles of integrity, yet I have long looked upon him as a villain at heart, and this proves my opinion correct. Yes; a man of wealth, take the advantage of the misfortunes of his neighbor—because he is involved and must have money, to tax him double interest. Out upon him! Mr. B., I should not suffer such treatment without a murmur; but now you have an opportunity hold him up in his true light.

With a few more observations upon each side, the parties separated, and Mr. A. went on his way rejoicing—priding himself upon the favorable impression he had made upon the mind of Mr. B. Henceforth undoubtedly he might rely upon the advantages of friendship from that source, and should he ever come up for an office in opposition to Mr. C. (as there was some prospect of the event,) he might safely rely upon his vote. Thus he mused with himself as he passed on, until in entering town, who should he encounter but Mr. C., when the following conversation passed between them.

A. Good morning, friend C. Your most obedient. Anything new transpired of late to serve as a subject of converse these dull days?

C. Nothing of importance, Sir. I was just thinking how some people would have us believe them the most upright of any, when but put them to the test once, and their word, upon which they pride themselves, possesses no more stability than the fleeting, transitory wind.

A. Please explain, Mr. C.; for I perceive you refer to some particular individuals; who are they?

C. Why there is Mr. B. who, you are aware, is looked upon as an honorable man. He came to me a few months since, soliciting a loan of a few dollars, I gave him to understand, that letting of money being my chief employment, and subject to occasional losses, I could accommodate him, providing he paid me an amount of interest double the established rate. He seemed perfectly satisfied—signified his assent by taking it under such a condition, and now refuses to cancel the debt unless I will deduct the surplus interest.

A. Indeed! Is it possible? I have long suspected that man's honesty, and this proves my suspicions true. I deplore your misfortune, but it may be productive of much good, if you promptly expose his dishonesty and thus put others upon their guard.

With a few more remarks the conversation ended, and Mr. A. prided himself upon his superior powers in gaining the good will and esteem of others. Now the friendship of both is granted to him; when if he had been so unwise as to have expressed his honest opinion to both men, one of them would surely have been offended. "Pity," thought he to himself, "that men do not possess the like discernment in ingratiating themselves into the favor of others, and thus become in possession of popularity!"

Thus did this individual commend with himself, until a few days after the above conversation, the two contending parties met in order to settle their difficulty. Their meeting was of quite a friendly nature, and when Mr. A. came in sight, on his way to town again, they agreed that he should sit as judge between them, and lay his decision aside.—According when he came up, the matter was stated over to him; and while a blush stole over his countenance, he declared he should be highly pleased—consider himself highly complimented to be selected as a judge between two such honorable men. At the same time bestowing a look upon the one, and then upon the other, accompanying such with a significant wink—as much as to say, you have had my opinion before;—when, drawing up the reins of his bridle, he rode off. But the two men adjusted their difficulty in an admirable manner—to the satisfaction of both parties; and afterwards, as the conversation turned upon the propriety of receiving an amount of interest above the legal rate, each one cited the opinion of Mr. A. when lo! his popularity in that quarter was forever at an end, notwithstanding the ingenuity which he displayed in procuring it. Rumour is rife, that a neighbor politely intimated to him the complexion of his standing relative to the matter, and surely he manifests of late no little uneasiness in company, where one of the parties is present, especially if the subject of discussion is—the loaning of money.

There, kind reader, is an example before you; and it is left to your option to determine whether or not you will travel the same direction. If you have suffered your love of popularity to become in possession of under strength—if it operates upon your mind with a force beyond that of justice and honesty, then go on;—bow to every one you meet—fall in with every opinion put forth—condemn every one condemned—courtesy, scrape and bow, and ere long you will reach the wished-for goal, and have the satisfaction of beholding yourself universally despised!

Now we will turn our attention in a different direction and observe Mr. D.—, a man of no little importance in the place where he lives, especially if we prefix that qualifying word, "self;" to the term. He is a member of no religious society, for report says that ere long he is to come up as a candidate for office, and it would be the height of folly for him to come out and unite with a church; for he would surely lose some friends of the opposite faith. I suppose he would be a Universalist "were it popular enough;" but as it is, he is non-committal, and hence we will observe a movement or two.—Sabbath forenoon he attended at the Presbyterian church, and the preacher discoursed upon the absurdities and licentious tendency of Universalism. On his way home he fell in with Deacon E., when the twain held forth on this wise:—

Dea. Well, Mr. D., how did you like the discourse this forenoon?

D. Admirably well, sir—sound man, that—such strong and incontrovertible arguments—such clear and forcible reasoning, and eloquent too, withal. I do wish the Universalists had been there, for I am sure those of them endowed with common-sense, (though by the way, there are but few such,) would have been convinced of their error, and made an effort to atone for their sin, by renouncing that soul-losing doctrine.

There, reader; that time our friend D. gained a feather for his cap—a waving plume that shall ever lead the Deacon's favor. At evening he muffled himself up in his cloak, though the weather was not at all tedious, and sallied forth, taking a turn around upon a back street, that none might suppose him on his way to the Universalist church. He comes out upon the main street opposite the church,—draws up his cloak a little more closely; stoops a little, and crosses over, and steps into the hall, and immediately feels relieved—breathes easy again—lays off his cloak; opens the door and stalks down the aisle with an air of importance; as much as to say,—“this is a land of liberty; no man shall put shackles upon my conscience, or stand between me and my God!”

The services soon commenced, and the speaker discoursed upon the origin of the doctrine of endless misery—its opposition to the will and purposes of God, and closed by showing its unhappy influence upon the mind when firmly believed. Mr. D. listened with profound attention, and at the conclusion of the meeting, being interrogated relative to the sermon, replied,—"that's just what I've been wanting to hear this long time—powerful and convincing testimony brought forward in that production—the effort would be a credit even to older heads; and by the way, I wish it could be hung up by the side of a discourse which I heard at the Presbyterian church this forenoon—the most flimsy thing to which I ever listened,—and they might profit by contemplation of the picture. You're aware that some people are so dull of perception, they can only distinguish error by beholding it contrasted with truth!"

O, weak and inconsistent man! Short-sighted and erring mortal! Consider the words which were pronounced of you by one in ancient days—"While the hypocrite works in the dark like a mole, and fancies he is safe, he blunders into light, and is exposed with the dirt on his head." Nay;—though you may gather around you, deceitful shining garments, and pour your flattering studied sayings into the ears of others, yet it is in vain; for well do they know the heart which throbs within your breast to be blackened with deceit—well do they know you to be a being unworthy of confidence; and well do they know your principles to be beneath respectability and a disgrace upon the name of man! Go forth, then, in your wanderings among mankind, a despised and degraded being, until peradventure three score and ten years shall have scattered their moments around you; and at last lie down in sorrow—sleep the sleep of death, and the finger of Scorn shall guide the pencil that writes your epitaph!

Reader—the love of praise was bestowed upon us for a wise and beneficent purpose. It is one of the strong bands, that have been woven around the family of man, and it is, as we said before, commendable to labor for the purpose of securing the esteem of others. But when we suffer this desire to transcend or sway the principles of integrity—when for designing purposes we avail ourselves of this principle, it is then that we have crossed a fearful line and are fast approaching a dangerous precipice, where irretrievable ruin will surely end our ignoble career! Then if you would escape this dreaded doom of the hypocrite, dwell off with the discourses of wisdom. Be swayed by nothing, and follow nought, save the golden light of truth; for this will lead you onward—triumph over every obstacle, and ere many years shall have flown afar, the boon of true popularity will be yours, and you will be crowned—the man of integrity!

MILLER ON HOSEA.

BY REV. W. H. RYDER.

Br. Grosh—To-day, I have been reading "Miller on the two days in Hosea," and if it please you, I will lay before your readers a few thoughts, connected with this excitable subject. Nor to be lengthy, I will write what I have to communicate as briefly as possible.

The supposed millennial prophecy which Mr. Miller uses as a text, reads;—"Come, and let us return unto the Lord: for he hath come and he will heal us; he hath smitten, and he will bind us up. After two days will he revive us: in the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live in his sight." Hosea vi: 1, 2. After a few remarks on the importance of the prophecy—the difficulty of comprehending it, etc., he says,—"But you will find if you examine, that in it is contained—I. Our duty to God. II. We have a promise, and the time specified when it will be fulfilled." To his remarks on the first division I have nothing particularly in objection to say. The second division is founded on the declaration that, "After two days he will revive us," and the remainder of the sentence,—"in the third day he will raise us up." He proceeds as follows, viz., "After two days," etc. In this sentence we have the time specified when the work will be finished, and these promises verified; when he will revive his children, or all who have returned unto the Lord. Revive, signifies to bring to life, to quicken. In this place it must mean to raise to life. It can not mean to quicken in a spiritual sense; for it would be in plain contradiction to other Scriptures. This must mean, therefore, their resurrection from the dead," p. 50. This reasoning when in the form of a syllogism stands thus.

"Revive, signifies to bring to life—to quicken."

"Revive, can not mean to quicken in a spiritual sense."

"Therefore," Revive "means their resurrection from the dead."

The palpable inconsistency of such reasoning may be seen by the following, viz., "Will they revive the stones out of the heaps of the rubbish which are burnt?" Nehemiah iv: 2.* Mr. Miller says—"Revive, signifies to bring to life—to quicken." "Revive, can not mean to quicken in a spiritual sense." Therefore, "Revive means their" (the stones) "resurrection from the dead." The latter syllogism proves as much as the former. If one proves the resurrection of the dead, the other does. The reader will readily perceive that this ridiculous conclusion follows from the imperfection of the argument. The relation between the premises and conclusion in either case, is destroyed. That revive sometimes means to "bring to life" is evident,—and that this life is not always to be understood in a "spiritual sense," is also evident;—but that in consequence of this, "life," (or revive) means "resurrection from the dead," is not evident;—a child can see it—and it seems quite strange that a man of Mr. M.'s abilities can not see it.

Again. The expression, "it would be in plain contradiction to other Scriptures," is calculated to mislead, and is grossly false. The verb revive occurs eight times in the Bible, (according to Cruden,) and in several cases evidently means to quicken in a spiritual sense. Vide, Isaiah lvii: 15. Ps. lxxxv: 6, cxxxviii: 7. Hab. iii: 2, etc. If Mr. M. contends for a "plain contradiction" simply because the word is differently translated, or is used in a different sense, I apprehend he will involve himself in difficulty; because he can never make a day, the usual duration of which is 24 hours, mean 1000 years. He can take either horn of the dilemma he pleases. We have seen that a thus saith Mr. Miller, and a "thus saith the Lord," do not agree.

Having finished his argument in proof of the resurrection, he proceeds to show when that resurrection will take place; by defining the time specified by the "two days," and "third day." His argument is,—"These days can not mean indefinite time; for the words "two" and "third," "to-day" and "to-morrow," are too clearly defined to admit of such a construction. They will not admit of years, for the predictions are not fulfilled. * * * Therefore the days spoken of in our text must mean so many thousand years." I object to this reasoning. First,—Because the premises are assumed, whereas they require strong proof. Second,—Because the conclusion does not follow from the premises, even allowing them to be true. With the same propriety he might have said, "Therefore the days spoken of in our text mean so many 500 years, or 5000 years." He quotes 2 Pet. iii: 8; "But beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day;" and adds "which can not, with any propriety, mean anything more nor less than what we count a thousand years God calls a day. Therefore the days spoken of in our text must mean so many thousand years." Does Mr. Miller wish to convey the idea here that God always calls a thousand years a day? If so, what does he mean on the previous page (p. 19) when he says "Days may be used as figures of different portions of time. Sometimes a day means twenty four hours; sometimes we mean only twelve hours; and at others indefinite time." How long did Nebuchadnezzar eat grass?—How long was Jonah in * This passage when used syllogistically after Mr. M.'s patent, may be made to prove the resurrection of those burnt stones, and with as much propriety as his reasoning proves the resurrection of those persons referred to by the prophet. But does Mr. M. believe that those stones were to be immortalized,—"caught up in a flame?" I hope not. Let us see to what conclusions his reasoning drives us.

W. H. R.

the whale's belly? Christ in the wilderness, and tomb? Did Satan tempt Christ 40,000 years?—How then can he be "bound" during the millennium if that commence this year? If Mr. M. does not mean thus; why does he define "the day" to mean a "thousand years?" He must show that day always means a thousand years, or that in this instance, independent of its general use, it means a thousand years. He has not attempted to do either.

But the most ludicrous part of the whole affair, is his attempt to fix a data from which to reckon. We give the matter in the form of a dialogue for brevity and plainness. I quote from pages 72 and 73. "Do you ask, when did those three thousand years begin?" Yes. "I answer they must have begun somewhere before Christ's first coming, for that is included in the two days." But, how do you know that Christ's coming is included in the two days, and consequently that the three thousand years, (or three days) must have commenced before? Have you any proof? You have given none. Does not the prophet speak of the first coming of Christ? Would he predict the second, before he did the first coming? "There is no rule but conjecture that they commenced reckoning at his birth." Is there any rule but conjecture that they commenced previous to his birth? If they did commence before, at what time did they commence? Well, "If this is correct" they must have commenced "when the Romans became connected with the Jews by league," which was "158 years before the birth of Jesus Christ, and 2000 years before the second advent of Christ: for by adding 158 to 1842 makes 2000 years, or two days." But why do you begin to reckon 158 years before Christ, or at the time of the league of the Jews and Romans? The text makes no mention of this period, and the context is equally silent. The language of the prophecy is, "After two days" etc., as if the time had commenced. Why not "begin" the "data" previous to 780 B. C. when the prophecy was uttered, instead of waiting 622 years? If you begin to reckon when the text was uttered, and certainly candor can ask no more, you prove the second coming of Christ to have been in 1220; for 2000 subtract 780 leaves 1220. I insist upon this conclusion. I again ask, why do you begin to reckon 158 B. C? Evidently, dear reader, we answer, because no number, save 158, subtracted from 2000 will leave 1842.

We are now through with this discourse. We have seen that Mr. Miller assumes that revive means a literal resurrection,—assumes that two days signify two thousand years,—assumes that we should begin to reckon 158 B. C. and from this mass of assumption draws the legitimately assumed conclusion that the world will come to an end in 1843. The reader will make his own comments.

MARYLAND DISCUSSION.

The discussion between Elder Daniels and Br. Guild has just closed. I will proceed to give the readers of the Magazine and Advocate a brief account of it.

The debate was got up by the friends of the parties, and the question was afterwards agreed upon by the two speakers. The question as agreed on, was—"Does the Bible teach the endless misery of a portion of the human race? or, does it teach the final holiness and happiness of all mankind?"

When Mr. Daniels came to the discussion, however, he came prepared with another question, and denied having agreed to the question as stated above and as published in the papers. Br. Guild proved that he did agree to that question; and when Mr. Daniels declined have any discussion on that, Br. Guild consented to the following. "Does the Bible teach the endless punishment of those who do not comply with the conditions of the Gospel in this life? or, does it teach the final holiness and happiness of all mankind?"

Eight days were occupied in the discussion of the first question, and although it embraced but one single point of doctrine, yet the discussion was so conducted on the part of Mr. Daniels (he having the affirmative,) as to involve a discussion of the following points. Calvinism, Arminianism, sovereignty of God, original state of man, fall of man, free agency, total depravity, vicarious atonement, remission of punishment, forgiveness of sin, nature of God's law, nature of rewards and punishments under the moral government of God, fall of angels, personality of the Devil, future general judgment, etc., etc.

These points, be it remembered, were introduced by Mr. Daniels, and as they had no particular bearing on the question in debate, Br. Guild had nothing to do for several days, but to get up before a large audience and expose the absurdity of the Orthodox views on these several points, and completely refute them. Their views were shown up in no very enviable light, I assure you. If Mr. Daniels was not ashamed of his devil before he got through with him, then I have only to say I sincerely pity the man. On the subject of Arminianism, Br. Guild showed that although it was by some thought to be an improvement of the old orthodox system of Calvinism, yet in point of fact it was no better, but resulted in precisely the same thing;—that, indeed, it was not as philosophical a system as Calvinism; and he gave it as his opinion, that "Calvinism will be preached in the world when Arminianism will be lost in the vortex of eternal oblivion."

When at last Mr. Daniels brought forward his evidence on the affirmative of the real question under discussion, that evidence was closely, critically and carefully examined by Br. Guild and shown to be absolutely inconclusive. The strong pillars of the doctrine of endless misery were "searched, shaken, removed" and laid prostrate on the ground.

Five days were occupied in the discussion of the last question. The arguments on the affirmative were presented with great clearness, force and power by Br. Guild, and every objection urged by Mr. Daniels was fairly met and triumphantly refuted. Br. Guild was perfectly cool, calm and collected throughout the debate. His physical strength held out remarkably; his voice was full and clear, and grew stronger and stronger. In not a single instance did his presence of mind forsake him.

Mr. Daniels is the great champion of Methodism in this section, and evidently has great confidence in his controversial prowess. He has been heard to say repeatedly, in public and in private, that he could put down any Universalist preacher in ten minutes; and on the morning of the first day of the discussion he was heard to say that if there was not more than twelve Universalist preachers present, he could "whip out the whole of them." Mr. Daniels is undoubtedly as competent and as well qualified to defend the doctrine of endless hell torments, as any one in this region. We do not attribute his failure to any lack of talent on his part, but to the untenable nature of the doctrine which he advocates. It is due to Mr. Daniels, to state, that his treatment of his opponent, and conduct throughout the debate, was generally gentlemanly, candid and fair. He found no fault whatever with the treatment he received from Br. Guild, but, on the contrary complimented him very highly for his candor, fairness and gentlemanly deportment.

An important advantage was gained by Br. Guild at the commencement of the debate. He was firm and decided, but at the same time frank, candid, fair, mild and forbearing. It was evident from the beginning that he had the good will of a majority of the audience.

The audience was large, and remarkably attentive throughout the discussion. It was estimated that, some days, there were at least a thousand people in attendance. Seventeen preachers were present in all: Eleven Methodists, two Presbyterians, two Baptists and two Universalists. Br. Guild in allusion to the improper interference of some of these Partialist clergymen, remarked as follows:—"What means this array of Unitarian preachers before me? Does Br. Daniels think to daunt me, or to frown me down by their presence? I tell him he may array all the Methodist priests from Maine to Georgia, and with the Bible in one hand and the fair deductions of reason in the other, I will meet them single handed and alone."

This discussion was probably the longest ever held on the same question in America; and it is doubted whether the relative merits of Partialism and Universalism were ever more fairly presented before the people. On the subject of the relative moral influence of Partialism and Universalism, Br. Guild showed that although Universalists were no better than they should be, and never any better than their doctrine, yet it was by no means true that all the sin and wickedness in the world is, or has been committed by Universalists. He showed that the spirit of Partialism is justly chargeable with the following enormities and abominations:—"The murder of the ancient prophets, the crucifixion of the Son of God, the persecution and martyrdom of Christ's disciples, and the death of millions of innocent Christians. That it instigated the wars of the crusades, and led millions to the holy land to war against the infidel Turk, where they left their bones to bleach on the plains of Palestine and their blood to fatten the soil of that country. That it established the inquisition, the rack, the wheel, the gibbet, the dungeon, the faggot, the flame and the torture. That it had hung numbers charged with witchcraft, put harmless and peaceable Quakers to death, tied Baptists to the whipping post, and inflicted upon them cruel stripes without cause.—That it had kindled the fires of Smithfield and plunged the dagger into the hearts of sixty thousand innocent persons on St. Bartholomew's day." Finally he showed that "Partialism had its origin in hatred, malice, malignity and revenge; that it had always been a curse to the world and ought to be banished from among men, totally, immediately, and forever."

The discussion passed off without producing any feelings of ill will either on the part of the disputants or their friends. The speakers at the close shook hands and parted in friendship, and the people imitated their example.

The following are the good results of the discussion. 1st. It has undoubtedly cured Mr. Daniels of his propensity to engage in controversy, especially with Universalists. It is generally thought it would be quite difficult to induce him to enter the lists again. 2d. It has afforded a fine opportunity to present Universalism before the people as it is, and to answer the most popular and plausible objections against it. 3d. It has produced an astonishing change in public sentiment in the region where it was held; much greater than could reasonably be expected, or was anticipated by the most sanguine Universalists. It is the opinion of all Universalists with whom I have conversed on the subject, that the discussion did more towards affecting a revolution in public sentiment in this region, than twenty years constant preaching could have done. Some Partialists who attended, acknowledge that they had been so prejudiced against Universalism, that they would not hear it preached nor suffer their families to do so; but now their prejudices are entirely removed, and they are anxious to hear more on the subject. 4th. It is known that a number who went to the discussion firm believers in the doctrine of endless misery, have abandoned that sentiment and expressed their conviction that the Bible, when fairly interpreted and correctly understood, gives not the least countenance or support to that sentiment, and that it can not be maintained from the Bible. One individual, a member of a Partialist church, said that "so strong was her conviction of the utter falsity of the doctrine, that she was almost persuaded to believe that it was blasphemy for any one to preach it." 5th. Some converts were made from Partialism to Universalism, and a number avowed themselves Universalists who were not known as such before.

SECULAR NEWS.

CONFIRMATION OF THE CAPTURE OF THE TEXIAN ARMY.—By the arrival of the schooner Doric, we have advice from Metamoras confirmatory of the intelligence received by the last steamer from Texas, that the civision of the Texian army under Colonels Fisher and Green had been captured at Mier.

On the 15th of December, Gen. Ampudia received a despatch from Gen. Woll, informing him that the Texans, 800 or 1000 strong, had taken Laredo, and that he, Gen. Woll, had been compelled to fall back; that the Texian forces were taking the northern route towards Metamoras. On the receipt of this intelligence, Gen. Ampudia left Metamoras with two battalions of sappers and miners, in quest of the enemy, and reached Mier, 50 leagues distant, on the 22d Dec. A body of Texans, under the command of Colonels Fisher and Green, had, in the meantime, crossed the river and attacked the town in the night. The Mexican troops stationed in that neighborhood immediately went to the assistance of the city, when an engagement took place, which lasted seventeen hours.

Every house and street was desperately defended.—After the battle had been maintained on both sides with determination and obstinacy for such a great length of time, the Texans, finding themselves surrounded on all sides, resolved to surrender, and finally capitulated on honorable terms. It is feared, however, that the articles of surrender will not be faithfully complied with on the part of Mexico.

The Mexicans report their loss during this engagement at 420 killed and 130 wounded. The loss on the part of the Texans was 11 killed and 10 wounded. This great disparity evinces the superior skill of the Texans in the use of fire arms, and the surrender of the invading army after so slight a loss would lead us to suppose that they only surrendered after having exhausted their ammunition. The success of the Mexicans, after suffering so severely, speaks favorably of their courage and perseverance.

Gen. Ampudia returned to Metamoras on the 7th Jan. and was received by the citizens with great rejoicings and applause. He brought with him 212 Texan prisoners, including Cols. Fisher and Green. The Texans were to leave Metamoras on the 15th inst. for the city of Mexico, there to await their destiny from the hands of Santa Ana. Cols. Fisher and Green, and the prisoners generally, acknowledged the treatment they received from Gen. Ampudia, since the capitulation, to have been humane and gentlemanly.—N. O. Bee, Jan. 26.

A Mr. Gay, and a young man in his employ, at Cincinnati were severely—the latter dangerously—burned a few days since by the explosion of a camphine lamp.

A new Jewish Synagogue was consecrated in New York, a few weeks ago. It is the sixth house of worship which the Jews have in that city, and is intended principally for emigrants from Germany.

A dangerous epidemic, thought to be a species of erysipelas, was prevailing at Montpelier, Vt., and vicinity, at last advices.

A fine drove of cattle, amounting to about thirty head, was lost in the St. Lawrence, while attempting to cross to Montreuil on the ice. The drovers escaped with some difficulty.

On the 4th inst., a female, a convert to Millerism, was taken out of one of the Harlem railroad cars in such a state of raving insanity, that it required the strength of four men to hold her. Her religious feeling was the cause of it.

On the night of the 18th ult., the house of Mr. Post, in Nunda, Allegany county, N. Y., was burnt to the ground, and three children perished in the flames. The fourth was so dreadfully burned about the neck and head, that it is feared he will not survive. The parents, after putting four of the children in bed in the room where the fire originated, went to visit a neighbor about a mile distant, leaving the house in charge of the children; the oldest of whom was but six years old, and the sequel may easily be imagined.

Messrs. B. F. Butler and Charles O'Connor applied to the Court Martial, now sitting on the trial of Col. Mackenzie, for leave to act as attorneys on the part of Mr. Spencer. The application was denied.

FRIENDSHIP.

O blush, ye poets, blush for shame,
Who sing that friendship's but a name;
Profess thou not to be my friend,
Who would this base untruth defend.

But what is friendship? not a name—
'Tis not a casual, fitful flame,
Which burns in brilliance for an hour,
Then dies, when adverse fortunes lower.

'Tis a bright, a glorious ray,
Which turns misfortune's night to day;
It is a flame that never dies,
Though clouds may lower, and storms arise.

'Tis not a plant of sunny clime,
Which blooms in beauty for a time,
Then sickens, fades, and drooping dies,
Whene'er exposed to low'ring skies.

It is a plant, that blooms as fair,
'Mid stern misfortune's gloom, as where
The sun of fortune shines serene,
And throws its glory o'er the scene.

'Tis not a flower, that only blooms,
Where fortune's sun the scene illumines—
No, no, its hues are e'en more bright,
Where most is felt misfortune's blight.

Is friendship—no, 'tis not the thing,
Which erring poets sometimes sing,
A babble, which is fair at first,
But which a trifling breath will burst.

Hail, social friendship, child of Heaven,
Thou priceless boon, to mortals given;
O dwell forever in my heart,
And all thy choicest good impart!

CONTRASTS.

BY REV. J. H. SANFORD.

Contrast 4th.—Deism further says the works of God are sufficient to "show forth his handy work" and declare his unity and goodness; and therefore there is no necessity of any further revelation from him.

But, unaided by reason and revelation, Atheists say the heavens and earth have existed from all eternity, and therefore "his handy work" is not seen, and the heathen are unable to discover the unity of God, and therefore they worship a plurality of gods; and no one is able to safely and at all times confide in his goodness; for when tempests sweep over the land, and all the face of nature is clothed with gloom; there is no voice to whisper, "peace, be still!" And when "the pestilence wasteth at noon-day;" there is no power to be heard, saying, "My grace is sufficient for thee." And when "earthquakes rock the world;" there is no friend at hand to calm the troubled spirit, and point beyond those convulsions which spread devastation and horror all around. And again the heathen, being destitute of revealed religion, worship and invoke their deities for the purpose of placating their wrath and escaping their vengeance: whereas in those countries where revelation is properly received, one God is believed, beloved, adored and worshipped, and praised "for his goodness and for his wonderful works to the children of men."

Contrast 5th.—Deism further tells us, It is unreasonable to suppose that God, being infinite in wisdom, would have made a revelation of his will and purposes to mankind in such a manner that they can publish, or alter, or suppress, or perpetuate it at their will, for if he designed to reveal himself to man, he might have done it to each, individually, so that all would have understood it alike.

But reason teaches that God being the Creator of all, is consequently the parent of all; and it is always necessary for a child to know the will and purposes of his parent, and therefore our necessity on one hand, and the wisdom and goodness of God on the other, required and prompted him to make a revelation to us. And our varied wants and different situations and conditions in life, require a variety of instruction; and that is best secured by one general revelation which is susceptible of publication and perpetuation, although some designing men may be disposed to interpolate or suppress it, for any alteration in these respects are also susceptible of detection. And further, any thought or communication made in any way to the mind of man, is liable to the same alterations; and, therefore, if we reject all revelations which are thus liable, we shall be led to reject every thing, and in spite of the wisdom of the universal Parent the world would be orphanized at last.

Contrast 6th.—Wherever Divine revelation is rejected; religion's shrine is prostrated and there is profanity, intemperance, gambling, and every evil work, and man is degraded and woman is a slave! But where Divine revelation is acknowledged and Christianity in its purity prevails, there religion "pure and undefiled" is practiced; temperance prevails, and morality characterizes man and exalts him in the scale of being and happiness; and woman, his helpmate, is honored, and in the scale of intellect is acknowledged his equal.

Contrast 7th.—Millerism says, "the world is to be moved, reel to and fro, and come to an end in the year of our Lord, 1843!"

But the Bible says, "The world is established, that it can not be moved." Ps. xciii: 1. "The world also is established that it shall not be moved." Ps. xcvi: 10; and again, "Ye [Israel] shall not be ashamed nor confounded world without end." Isa. xli: 10. "Thy testimonies are very sure." Ps. xciii: 5.

Contrast 8th.—Where Millerism prevails, doubt and anxiety, hope and fear, and mental misery and wretchedness abound. But where the people are well informed upon the subject, confidence and hope, and mental peace and happiness prevail.—More anon.

NEW NAMES FOR OLD THINGS.

Br. Grosh—It seems to be a characteristic of mankind, to give new names to old things, that an interest may be kept up in them; or, sometimes perhaps, through a desire to appear unlike others. If we should take a view of the systems and practices that have existed among men, I think we should find sufficient evidence to confirm the statement. But I have hit upon a method by which you can satisfy yourself, if you have any doubts, and which will save me the labor of writing a long article. It is this. Substitute new names in some of the old stories, which you have been in the habit of telling to your children, and see if it does not awaken a new interest.

Now, Br. G., men and women are nothing but grown up children. The same means must be employed to please them, that were necessary for that purpose in their first years. True, the things must be different, but the principles of operation are the same. A man would despise the idea of being pleased—or deriving any satisfaction from those little toys that once delighted him. But with all his boasted advancement, he is moved on the same principle now as then. The same feelings exist, but deeper—the same desires, but more grasping—the same hopes, but higher—the same wants, but more pressing—the same identical person, but increased in size. Hence, Br. G., you will see the propriety of the method.

I wish now, to make an application of this principle to a particular case, and shew you, and your readers, how well a new name can make an old thing pass. I would say, however, in the first place, that there are only four, (I will venture to call them so,) protracted meetings in this village. Three of these are called by that name—they have a new name for one of them.

About one year ago the Methodists held a protracted meeting here. The partisans of a certain sect, at that time, sneered at it. "A protracted meeting! too little business for any one to be engaged in!"

Now, Br. G., about one month since, notice was given by the pastor of this very sect, that there would be commenced in their church, that week, a "pastor's meeting," to be continued for an indefinite length of time. He said that it would not be a protracted meeting, it will be a pastor's meeting. "True," said he, "it will be carried on just the same as a protracted meeting, but then, we wish to have it understood that it will be a pastor's meeting."

The meeting is going on yet, and so far as I know, they are all pleased with it. It is my opinion, that one cause of the satisfaction, is the new name. It must be, if they esteem a protracted meeting as lightly as they did last winter.

THE END OF THE WORLD.

The recent bustle in the religious world, and indeed in the irreligious also, occasioned by the preaching and predictions of Rev. Mr. Miller, who confidently predicts the burning up of this earth next year at the farthest, founded on interpretations of the book of Daniel, and the Revelations of St. John, has caused the believers in his theory of interpretation to become rather numerous: and has been the cause of much thought and speculation to others, who think for themselves, as to the probability of such a catastrophe, as the cessation of the present events, political, and religious, as well as annihilating existing philosophical and mechanical inventions and processes, which are now so rapidly advancing, as to amount to almost a new creation.

The mind of the inquirer is naturally led back to examine what the earth he inhabits has been, and to inquire if marks of old age, or decay, are visible in any department, to indicate such a change, as must be at least, the destruction of all property, all vegetation, the whole of the animal kingdom, including all libraries, philosophical and mechanical institutions, &c., &c.

That the earth has changed, the science of Geology clearly evinces. The evidence is irresistible; the records of past ages to which they refer, are written in language more durable, and more lucid, than the events of any historian of human transactions. The relics of beings entombed in the strata which myriads of centuries have heaped on their graves, give an evidence of their past existence, with which no human evidence can compete. By studying these memorials of past ages, we are forced to admit, that this earth has been, all through that inconceivably long period, on the scale of improvement; gradual, yet perceptible, and sure.—The first race of animals discovered in the lowest strata of rocks which have contained vitality, are those of the most simple species, and are all of the marine kind, or inhabitants of the ocean, but nicely adapted to the stations they occupied. And when a rich vegetation covered the globe, animals adapted to that clothing, derived nourishment from that luxuriance, and gladdened nature's face. They made way for others of a more perfect organization, while they remains yet tell of their history: and the vegetables they fed on, are the present coal beds, so valuable to the animal man; who, the great Designer knew would need supplies of fuel, when all the groves which could be spared from building or mechanical purposes, would be exhausted. Decay and death has been their lot, and the production of others, subject to the same laws, which yet exist. It is found that each additional step in the facts of geology confirms the view, that the changes continued to rise in the multiplication of animals of yet higher orders; until at length the earth became a paradise, a fit habitation for a rational animal; and then Man was formed. The changes since it became the abode of man, are but as a page in the massive volumes of its history; but they are written in the same characters, and stamped indelibly with the notices of a yet higher condition, to be seen in the most minute variations, as being yet only the dawn of perfection.

For about six thousand years man has claimed the earth as his heritage; yet during that period, how comparatively small has been his mental improvement! Until the invention of printing, the mass were almost the creatures of instinct, and civilization advanced by slow and languid steps. It is only during the last three or four centuries, that man, as a species, has commenced the development of his faculties: and the diffusion of thought by the press, has enabled one class of reasoners to unite with another, and their observations to become the starting point of the next generation. It seems as if intellect was yet but just bursting from the bud, in which the future leaf and flower is yet in embryo. Nor has the earth itself yet attained to any thing like an ultimatum in its products. Its capability of increase has never been tested: the felling of yet boundless forests; the reclaiming of prodigious tracts of excellent, yet now useless lands; aided by the advance of improvements in agriculture, (now almost in its infancy,) give some idea of the fertility it is yet capable of, in nourishing myriads of animals, and intellectual beings, to the acme of all the happiness their natures are capable of enduring. These are facts, not resting on testimony, but on the evidence of our senses, and our highest reasoning powers.

But if the interpretations of the prophetic books are true, the pleasing vista of a boundless amelioration, vanishes before our eyes. And in the very dawn of beauty, the aurora of a rising splendor of intellect, we are to be instantly shrouded in the gloom of night, in the blackness of darkness forever. It is worthy of a calm inquiry to ascertain the amount of probability, and the basis on which rests the evidences of such fatal events: for looking soberly at the facts, there is indicated a yet higher estate for man as a rational being, and to the face of nature, as improvable under his government.

It has long been the opinion of the learned, and of many pious Christians, that the Apocalypse was not written by John, the Apostle, but by some other person bearing his name. For the following reasons,

1st. The language of the Gospel and Epistles, is, if not pure, yet tolerably correct: whereas the Revelation is full of solecisms, and corruptions of the Greek language, as is to be found in any writer of modern date. It has been observed, and perhaps very justly, that if any ancient manuscripts were to be discovered, bearing the names of Demosthenes, or Cicero, yet containing such discrepancies and barbarisms, as the book of Revelation confessedly does; fair and candid criticisms would at once decide them to be spurious, the production of imposture.

2d. The Revelation is in substance taken from the Old Testament; as the sublime picture of the ruin of Tyre, given by Ezekiel and Isaiah, and the language of Daniel, almost without variation. The substance of the Gospel and Epistles is different from any book of the Old Testament, and appear to contain the quintessence of Christian philosophy, dressed in the Apostle's own comely language.

3d. But the prophecies have never been applied to corresponding events with sufficient certainty to warrant any connection between them. But every striking feature of the Christian church has been sought, and found, by those who always find what they seek for. But the interpretations of one sect, have been contradicted by another; and mystic Babylon, the serpent, the prophet, the trumpets and vials, have been driven from one side of the theological tennis-court to the other, in proportion to their dexterity.

4th. Its whole appearance does not accord with the simplicity of Scripture, and its being long bound up in the same volume, is no test of its authority; it must stand or fall by its own intrinsic merits.

5th. Add to which the nonexistence of the church of Thyatira in the apostolic age, which is recorded by Epiphanius, as an objection started by him to its authenticity, ought to be weighed. He lived A. D. 397, and thus nearer the time of its insertion into the canon of Scripture, and consequently better able to judge of its authenticity.

It may cause a sensation of horror at any seeming doubts cast on any part of a book, we have been taught, from infancy, to esteem every word therein as dictated by the Spirit of eternal truth. But let such recollect that neither the credibility, or the power of Christianity, depend at all, on the genuineness of this book. Our heavenly Father has given us two books to read, to make us wise; the book of nature and of revelation: if the Deity is the author of both, they exactly correspond with each other, in the minutest points, as well as in generals. The records of one are written in the "everlasting hills," the other by men, who though honest, may have been miscopied by the numerous transcribers who lived between the existence of the author, and the era of printing, as some writings may have been inserted by mistake, and afterwards retained by their antiquity.

Let us, be thankful for the evidence we have of the vast duration of the improvements in the earth we inhabit; and for the complacency we have in reflecting on the security of our situation, in confidence that the Deity will not in a freak of caprice, break, as with a rod of iron, this production of his skill, brought to its present perfect state through such lengthened processes and periods; as a potter may in a moment dash his fragile productions to atoms.

NEMO.

REMARK.—We consider the argument drawn by our venerable and esteemed correspondent, from the progressive improvement of our race by the operations of Christianity, as conclusive against Mr. Miller's scheme. Nor do we deem it necessary to set aside the Apocalypse, to evade Mr. Miller's interpretations. That book itself, in its beginning and its close—in the very object which itself gives as the cause of its revelation—disproves Mr. Miller's hypothesis. It was given purposely and only, to show the Christians "things which must shortly come to pass," (i. e. at that time,) to declare that the Lord Jesus would "come quickly," the second time, as he had declared he would do. Taking the Book itself, as its own interpreter, and Mr. Miller's interpretations are blown to the winds. Jesus came in that generation, and is now in his kingdom on earth, ruling with truth and grace, gradually converting the nations into footstools of triumph that elevate him to other triumphs; so that the end will not be, until in the present "dispensation of the fullness of times," all things in the universe are subdued unto him, and reconciled to God. Then—and then only—cometh the end, when he will deliver up the kingdom to God the Father, and God be all in all. Such is the teaching of the whole Bible—the teaching is not contradicted, but confirmed by the Apocalypse itself, which declared the coming of Jesus to judgment to be "at hand" when the book was written—and thus Millerism is refuted by the very work to which it appeals for support, as it is denied by nature itself, and will be refuted by the events of this very year of A. D. 1843.

POPULAR ADMISSIONS.... NO. I.

THE LAST CHANGE.

There is, perhaps, no assertion more frequently repeated, no sentiment more obstinately clung to, than that "there is no change after death." When or where this sentiment originated, it is hard to tell.—But, fatherless though it may be, the nineteenth century blushes not to fondle the illegitimate, and Christians have rocked it in the cradle of sectarianism, until they have become drowsy with the songs which they have sung over it. It has fairly become the pet of Arminian dotage; and old, blind, staggering Athanasius, is groping about in the dark, vainly trying to find it in some unswept, nonwhitewashed corner of Calvinism.

We look upon the sentiment that there is no change after death, as a popular admission; though it is much more than this with those who embrace it. It lies at the very foundation of the doctrine of separate and conflicting human destinies. To undertake to contend, without its aid, that this mortal is a state of probation, which will give its own character of good or bad to the immortal, would be a fruitless work. For once admit that there may be mortal change, contiguous with or after death, and analogy would prove from the progress of probation here, the continued triumphs of probation under increased light and knowledge, hereafter. The popular admission, therefore, is necessary to, and at the foundation of so called orthodoxy. And yet this American orthodoxy cuts its own throat in the use of such an assertion.

We shall use this sentiment as a popular admission, and in so doing we shall show how little Limitarians are advantaged by it. We are justified in using an enemy's admissions in this way, when they are made to sustain themselves and doctrine against us. In this matter, no Universalist is a stranger to the refutation of the doctrine "there is no change after death." And he knows the circumstances which most frequently call it out. The veriest knave in Christendom pours it out upon the heads of Universalists, and smiles with the majority, at the havoc which they fancy it will make. The hypocrite utters it as the doom of all who dare to trust in the unchanging goodness of God. The pious sectarian for endless wo, meets the Universalist, and winds up a long and earnest attempt to show that some particular neighbor of his must be damned, with the very learned assertion—"there is no change after death." At all events, all Limitarians unite in supposing that it gives them safety at the expence of the believers in the Restitution; forgetting that a comparison with themselves would be far from showing the necessity of such a change on the part of Universalists.

We suppose we are to understand our opposers in a moral sense, when they put forth the doctrine in question. Let us hold them to its application. Where is the opposer to Universalism, who believes himself so much safer than we are, who can say at the hour of dissolution, "I am morally fitted for the presence of the holy One?" Who does not know, on that occasion, that he is sinful? Even American orthodoxy says that the purest will tremble before the eye of Jehovah! If they were left to describe their own moral condition, they would put their mouths in the dust and cry, unclean, unclean! And yet the doctrine of endless wrath says, that there is no change after death. Of course this doctrine will unalterably damn every one of its adherents!

But the objector says, (and objectors there are, for Partialists do not like to have their doctrine applied to themselves,) we escape your dilemma by adopting the vicarious atonement—the substituted merits of Christ—and this change must take place in this life, or never. Well, hand in hand with this no-change doctrine, is the doctrine that all men die a natural death on account of sin. Another doctrine is, that all men die a moral death here, on account of transgression. Of these two doctrines, the latter is strictly true; the former is untrue, though it is good against the advocate thereof.—Here then, the believer in no change after death, knows and admits that he is morally so constituted and bearing such moral accountabilities, and subject to such moral laws, and guilty of such immoral acts, that all the boasted merits of vicarious atonement do not, up to the very hour of his departure, prevent him from suffering present moral death. If, therefore, there be no moral change after death, then the vicarious atonement, though adopted here, will not save him from endless moral death.

Nor is this all. Lest he should borrow some comfort in the consideration of the universality of this sad consequence, we will endeavour to bring it nearer home to himself. The advocate of endless wo is confessedly miserable, unless he can cheat that portion of his creed out of its natural influence, by putting the evil day as far off as possible. The thoughts of no change after death, makes him often agonize and weep in view of the apprehended consequences. Will not the full accomplishment of that doctrine make him as miserable hereafter, as does the anticipation of it here? I am aware that a doughty antagonist of friend Abel C., would say that after death he will have none of his present sympathies for the suffering and the exposed. But this will not do, for he has them now, and an indispensable of his creed is that there is no change after death—those sympathies make him a miserable mortal, and there is no change after, or in laying off, the mortal.

Extend this idea. When a man is fully imbued with the results of this popular doctrine, what would he not sacrifice in order to save the poor wretched sinner!—Imprisonment, stripes, persecutions, are nothing. They are laboring, and pleading, and groaning, much of the time, to throw up some barrier against the fulfilment of their doctrine. They would be mangled upon the rack, or burned at the stake, for the sake of the poor sinner! So powerfully is their moral nature affected by their doctrine. Well, there is no change after death. Of course they will be so subjected to this doctrine after death, as to be ever putting forth their efforts in behalf of the suffering, and ready to be burned or tortured, for the sake of the sinner. It will not evade the conclusion by saying that the saints will know, in the immortal world, that the fate of the sinner can not be changed; because such knowledge is excluded from the possibility of working any change in the mind of the saint. He is willing to do and undergo as specified above, as long as he lives, and there can be no change for him (his doctrine says) after death.

We see, then, the consequence of the doctrine of no change after death. If it can involve the final misery of any one of the human family, it will involve its believer and advocate in endless damnation. There is as much certainty in the case of the believer, as there is possibility in the case of any other person. The only thing which can save them will effectually destroy the whole ground work of American orthodoxy. If the believer in no change after death, be consistent with truth, nothing can save him from endless suffering and sin. As long as he clings to this doctrine, let him abide its consequences. His only chance of safety lies in the Scripture doctrine of change after death—such a change as will save all, if it saves one; because it is the gift of God to all—such a change as Christ and Paul describe; a change from the mortal to the immortal, from the corrupt to the incorrupt, from the dishonorable to the glorious, from the earthly to the heavenly, so that all who are children of the resurrection, will be as the angels of God in heaven. Universalists believe in this change, and therefore “do enter into rest.” After this the old fling—“if your doctrine be true,” etc.—must be amended. It belongs to the Universalist to say to the Partialist, “if my doctrine be true, I am saved now, as I know we both shall be hereafter; but if your doctrine of no change after death be true, what will become of you?”

OMNIPRESENCE OF GOD.

However difficult it is for the human mind to conceive of the omnipresence of God—or to conceive of Him as being every where present, and, of course, capable of encompassing the boundless universe, and at the same moment of reading all thoughts and workings in the human mind;—yet this is one of the unfoldings of truth contained in the Scriptures. A few examples will prove this.

As was the custom in those days, Sarah, the wife of Abraham, gave him her maid Hagar, to be one of his wives. After a time, however, Sarah “dealt hardly” with Hagar, inasmuch that she fled to a fountain of water in the wilderness. While there, an “angel of the Lord” appeared unto her, and made known certain facts concerning her then unborn son, whose name was to be called Ishmael. Hagar called the name of the Lord, who had spoken to her, “Thou God seest me!” The simple facts of the case, show the propriety of this sublime name. Hagar had fled from the face of her mistress, and from the face of her kindred, and was alone in the wilderness—yet there did God behold her. Besides this, the angel told her, that her son Ishmael should, in his descendants, become a multitude of people.—“And he will be a wild man; his hand will be against every man, and every man’s hand against him; and he shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren.” Gen. xvi: 12. This verse is a perfect history of the Arabs or Ishmaelites—they have always been against every other people, and all other people have been against them; and having never been conquered, they have dwelt by themselves as a nation in the presence of their brethren. No attempt of generals and armies to subjugate them, has been fully successful—they are as free at this very day, as was Ishmael, when, with his mother, he went forth from Abraham’s tent, and dwelt an archer in the wilderness. Under such circumstances, could not Hagar well say of Him who could look through four thousand years and behold the condition of the multitudes of her son’s descendants; “Thou God seest me!”

There is another instance very much to the point.—When Saul was chosen king of Israel, one of the distinctive marks by which he was selected, was, his being from the shoulders upwards, taller than any man in Israel. But when Saul forfeited his throne by his misconduct, and Samuel the prophet was sent to anoint one of the sons of Jesse for the future king, “the Lord said unto Samuel, Look not on his countenance, or on the height of his stature;” (that is, of Eliab, one of the sons of Jesse, whom Samuel was inclined to anoint,) “because I have refused him; for the Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart.” 1 Sam. xvi: 7. So David was elected for the king of the chosen people. The fact here elicited, is, that God reads the heart or mind; that its capacities, thoughts, and operations, are ever open before the “Judge of all the earth;” who readeth them more distinctly than man can read the printed words on the pages of a book.

One of the most sublime exhibitions of the omnipresence of God, is found in the language of that very David whose capacities fitted him for the throne of Jacob. “O Lord, thou hast searched me, and known me. Thou knowest my down-sitting and mine up-rising; thou understandest my thought afar off. Thou compassed my path and my lying down, and art acquainted with all my ways; for there is not a word in my tongue, but, lo! O Lord, thou knowest it altogether. Thou hast beset me behind and before, and laid thy hand upon me. Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high, I can not attain unto it. Whither shall I go from thy spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in hell, (Sheol—the state of the dead,) behold, thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea; even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me. If I say, ‘surely the darkness shall cover me;’ even the night shall be light about me. Yea, the darkness hideth not from thee; but the night shineth as the day; the darkness and the light are both alike to thee.” Psalms cxxxix: 1-12. In this sublime passage, we are taught that God is everywhere present—that there is no spot, where God is not manifested—that from his vision there is no fleeing—that in heaven, on earth, in the regions of the dead, among the celestial orbs of the boundless universe, by night and by day, in the most secret recesses of the soul, God is omnipresent. Hence, from his real presence, his spiritual presence, there is no place which can hide man. Does not this fact prove, that when Paul said of the Jews who were the violent persecutors of Christ’s church previous to the overthrow of their nation, “who shall be punished with everlasting destruction, from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power,” 2 Thess. i: 9, and the interpretation given of it, is, that sinners will, in another world, be cast from the spiritual presence of God into endless anguish—does not this fact prove that such an interpretation is incorrect?—for if, according to the Psalmist, there is no place which can hide us from the presence of God, how can multitudes be driven from that presence?

What then is the meaning of the passage? A moment’s thought will show it. Although God is every where present, yet no human eye can behold him.—Hence, in ancient times, and at certain spots, visible symbols were exhibited as tangible proof of the presence of the Lord. The burning bush before Moses—the wonders at Mount Sinai while the Jews were before it—the still small voice which Elijah heard after the wind, the earthquake and the fire—were visible manifestations of the presence of Deity. The Lord’s presence was visibly manifested, in some way, to Adam, Eve, and their children. Hence, after Cain had murdered his brother Abel, it is said, “and Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the land of Nod, on the East of Eden.” Gen. iv: 16. That is, he went out from the place where the presence of the Lord was manifested by a visible object. The Jews believed that the presence of the Lord was manifested in the temple at Jerusalem—and also, that his glory was there. At the dedication of that temple, it is said, “for the glory of the Lord had filled the house of the Lord.” 1 Kings viii: 11. Jehosaphat once said in a prayer—“if when evil cometh upon us, as the sword, judgment, or pestilence, or famine, we stand before this house, and in thy presence, (for thy name is in this house,) and cry unto thee in our affliction, then thou wilt hear and help.” 2 Chron. xx: 9.

It was from this presence of the Lord visibly exhibited in the holy temple, that the Jews were to be driven.—They had crucified the Saviour—had persecuted the disciples—had given continued trouble to the churches. For this they were to be scattered to the four winds of heaven—were no longer to enjoy the presence of the Lord in their sanctuary—but as a nation, were to endure everlasting destruction—everlasting, because they have already endured it over four hundred years longer than they enjoyed the everlasting possession of Canaan or the priesthood of Aaron. And whosoever has studied their history, needs no words to convince him, that since the Jews were erased from the political world as a nation, no visible symbol of the divine presence has been vouchsafed them.

These remarks serve to show, that Paul did not declare that any individual would be cast into ceaseless anguish from the spiritual presence of God; however positively creeds may insist upon it. And here I can not forbear introducing an address to creed-makers from Dr. A. Clarke’s note on Ps. cxxxix: 12—an address very singular for him to make, since he was a believer in ceaseless anguish. “Jehovah, the Fountain of eternal perfection and love, is as unlike your creeds, as He is unlike yourselves, forgers of doctrines to prove that the source of infinite benevolence is a streamlet of capricious love to thousands, while He is an overflowing, eternal and irresistible tide of hatred to millions and millions both of angels and men! The antiproof of such doctrines is this;—he bears with such blasphemies and does not consume their abettors. ‘But nobody holds these doctrines.’ Then I have written against nobody; and have only to add the prayer, May no such doctrines ever disgrace the page of history, as they have done, the annals of the church.” We can only say to this severe reproof, Amen!

From all the proof which has been adduced from Scripture, it appears that God is omnipresent; and that at no moment of our lives, are we out of his presence. In life, in death—roaming air, ocean or earth—in the solitude of the desert, or the busy multitudes of the city—we can always say, “Thou God seest me.” We can not see God—very true!—there are many other things we can not see; but whose existence is demonstrated by their manifestations. For instance; the compass-needle may be swerved by the finger from its direction, but it will instantly return and point to the North.—Wherever the sailor or the traveller may wander, it always points North. This is caused by magnetism, which is everywhere so diffused, that there is no spot of earth where the needle is not subject to its influence. But whoever saw magnetism? To human eye, it is perfectly invisible. It is the same with mind. An individual may address an audience—his thoughts may flow forth in the majesty of perfect knowledge and in the strength of the most exact science.—But can we see the power which planned and formed that address? We see the outward man—yet that outward man might be the form of an idiot or the temple of insanity. It is obvious that the principle which thinks, and directs the organ of speech what to say, can not be seen—it is inward—it is mind—and its existence is proved by its outward effects.

Neither can we see God. We are convinced of his existence by the visible works of his providence. The solemn stars, the glorious sun, the rolling earth, the changing seasons, the ocean, life in all its forms, and mind nobler than all other created things, with all the countless objects of the universe, are so many sensible manifestations of Deity, of whom we have assurance, that though we can not see him, yet He holds us within the cicing gaze of his government, and that we can never flee from his presence.

With the sublime fact, then, that God is every where present, how should the solemn truth excite our thoughts and engage our attention. "The eyes of the Lord are in every place, beholding the evil and the good;" doubtless to reward the one and to punish the other. For sinners can not flee from God. How strong is the assurance—"Though they dig into hell, thence shall my hand take them; though they climb up to heaven, thence will I bring them down: and though they hide themselves in the top of Carmel, I will search and take them out thence; and though they be hid from my sight in the bottom of the sea, thence will I command the serpent, and he shall bite them: and though they go into captivity before their enemies, thence will I command the sword, and it shall slay them; and I will set my eyes upon them for evil, and not for good." Amos ix: 2, 3, 4. On the contrary, the good receive their reward from Him who sees all actions, even though outward things are against them. Hence our Saviour advises his disciples to lay up treasures in heaven, where moth can not corrupt nor thieves break through and steal—not, in this instance, treasures in another world; but the treasures of truth and virtue, expressed by the word heaven, and which ever give inward peace and happiness to their possessor. And so certain are we, that the eyes of the Lord are upon the evil and the good, that the declaration of Solomon can not be too often repeated, that God "recompenseth the righteous in the earth; much more the wicked and the sinner." G. W. M.

Br. S. MILES, of Pittsford, Monroe county, informs us in a private letter, that he has been unable to preach but once, since early in November last, in consequence of severe indisposition in his family. Sister Miles has been, and is yet, confined to her bed, with an affection of the left side, producing great irritability of the heart and nerves. We sympathise sincerely with our afflicted brother and his family, and hope that he may soon be able to resume his valuable and acceptable labors in the ministry of reconciliation. The ministers of the restitution find it hard enough to get along with the numerous calls made on their scanty means, without having sickness to divide and distract their minds, and stop their labors. We hope our lay brethren in the vicinity of Br. Miles, are of the right kind, and remember his labors of many years in the good cause, and his many afflictions in time past. A. B. G.

We copy the following from the Connecticut Universalist, as a just guess at the merits of a sound and faithful preacher, and a worthy man. A. B. G.

"THE RIGHT WAY.—From McLean, Tompkins county, N. Y., Br. A. G. Clark writes to the Editors of the 'Better Covenant' as follows:—

"Our church has 40 slips on the ground. We have sold 34 of them for money enough to pay for the ground, house, stoves and lamps, and have $170 left that we shall turn towards an organ. We have a good bell, weight 640 pounds, a good choir of singers, and a good congregation."

"And we may add, a good minister, good financiers, good faith, and probably good practice. This is the right way in which to do up the business of a society in order to its prosperity. May all of our societies copy the example."

Will Br. Gurley, of the Star, inform us on which volume the $1.50 received of S. Hathaway, of Rising Sun, was intended to apply? We have credited on the present, 14th, volume. Our books show that vol. 13, for 1842, is not paid for.

DEATHS.

In Bourbon county, Ky., Jan. 14th, of whooping cough, NANNIE, youngest daughter of James and Eliza Hutchcraft, aged 10 months and 11 days. Thus has one of the loveliest children that ever felt the fond paternal embrace, been removed from earth to the realms of immortal bliss. May the bereaved parents find all needed peace and consolation in the knowledge that all have the same inheritance beyond the grave, where parting shall be known no more.

W. S. B.

In Webster, Monroe county, N. Y., on Saturday, January 21st, Mr. ANDREW ROBB, aged 83 years. Mr. Robb came into this place when the country was almost an entire wilderness. His cold remains now slumber in the silent tomb, upon the very farm which he selected and occupied some thirty years ago. He has been a firm believer in a world's salvation for several years. The weight of time, and the infirmities of age had much impaired his tottering limbs and intellectual powers; inasmuch that he had scarcely known his children or neighbors for some time past. He came to his end by a fall, which caused a broken thigh, about eight days before his death. From the time of the fall at the door of his son, with whom he resided, until he expired, he could not be made to realize his condition, nor his approaching end. He supposed himself among strangers in a strange land. He struggled much to make his escape from those who had the care of him, which seemed to hasten his dissolution. How frail is man; how transitory, how uncertain is human life! A breeze of wind too strong, a shower of rain too heavy, often produces some fatal disease or disaster that hurries us to that world from whence none but Christ and a few others have been known to return. Truly, human life is blended with death: it is short and transient as the humble flower that falls before the mower's scythe. Passing away is written upon all our friends as well as our foes: "One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh: but the earth abideth forever." Eccl. i: 4.—Peace be to all the surviving children and friends of the deceased, and to all our fellow men. S. MILES.

In Preston, Jan. 9th, Mrs. MARIETTE, wife of Mr. Samuel E. Lewis, and daughter of Mr. Simon Turner, aged 18 years.

In the death of Mrs. L., her bereaved husband has lost one with whom he had been united but ten months, and to whom he was most ardently attached. As a wife, none were more affectionate and devoted; as a daughter, more tender and dutiful; as a sister, more kind and amiable; or as a neighbor, more obliging and useful. In every respect she acted well her part in the drama of life, and none knew her but to love her. She invariably manifested a high regard for the Christian religion, by practicing its most important obligations, and possessing a spirit too benevolent and a mind too enlarged to bow before the narrow creeds of men; she uniformly assembled with those who worship God as the Friend and Father, adore Christ as the Redeemer and Purifier, and view heaven as the final happy home "of the spirits of all flesh."

"Believing in Jesus and trusting in God, She feared not to walk where her Saviour had trod;" and she willingly bowed before the stroke of the fell destroyer, and in her dying moments exclaimed, "God is just and good, just so sure as I breathe the breath of life."

The beautiful flower was too fair for earth, and has been transplanted to a more friendly clime, to bloom and flourish to all eternity.

The overflowing congregation which attended her funeral, Jan. 11th, irrespective of religious tenets, showed the high respect in which she was held by the surrounding community.—Oxford Times. J. T. G.

Possessing a kind disposition, a cheerful temper, amiable and accomplished manners, and a well cultivated mind, she could but be sought after in the circle in which she moved, and esteemed for her many conspicuous virtues and attractions. Her death has prematurely blasted the fond anticipations of tender and obliging parents, and other near and dear relatives and friends; but while they mourn their loss of one whom they delighted to love, some of them sorrow not without hope.

Her youthful heart was deeply imbued with the sentiment of universal grace, which the writer presented in both its practical and doctrinal bearings, to a very large concourse of people, mostly of an opposite faith, at her funeral, January 20th. Elder Guy, pastor of the Baptist church in that place, kindly and appropriately aided in the services.

"Her race was fair but short on earth,

Her duty was well done.

Beloved by all who knew her worth,

And all who knew her, mourn.

Like a bright cloud of summer's day,

That sweetly fades at even,

Julia's spirit passed away

From earth to shine in heaven."

Though clouds which azure seemed at morn
Grow black and yield the thunder-storm.

Ye may not faint, though pain and care
Are linked with every breath,
Though all thy life a burden proves,
E'en to thy day of death—
Swift is our passage o'er Time's wave,
And "home" gleams bright beyond the grave.

Home! e'en the word sends magic thrill
Through all the veins of life;
But we are lonely strangers here,
Our home is high above,
Where kindred links are ever strong,
And angels pour the endless song;

'And floods of light forever beam,
On all the heavenly rings,
So bright that seraphs veil their brows,
Beneath their snowy wings;
And harps like gold, glance brightly there,
And pour out music on the air.

Thus sung a youth of heavenly mein,
As earth's rough paths he trod;
Then paler grew his youthful brow,
And he passed home to God—
Passed like some summer flower away,
Or golden beam at close of day.

DOMESTIC INFLUENCE.

"What are you reading, Louise?—Bulwer's last, or one of Maryatt's amusing tales? for you seem very much engaged."

"Neither; but something which I consider quite as interesting, and much more useful; a treatise on 'Domestic Economy.'"

"Domestic Economy! Really! when are you to be married?"

"Whether I am to be married sooner, or later, or not at all, it is necessary for me, as well as for every one else, to understand this important science."

"Necessary or not, I don't understand it, nor do I wish to, for it is not my intention to be a household drudge for any man."

"Nor is it mine; for there is too much responsibility, and can be too much dignity attached to the management of domestic affairs for it to be called drudgery."

"Well, if I can not maintain my dignity without troubling myself about the dirty kitchen, I will go without it; besides, Mr. Butler loves me too much to ask it of me; he will employ servants to see to those things."

"But who is to direct your servants?"

"Why, I intend to have servants who know how to direct themselves."

"Well, Mary, perhaps you may be fortunate enough to obtain such, but I do not expect to be, and even if I were, I would prefer to manage the affairs myself, both for the beneficial exercise it affords, and because the respectability and happiness of a family depend so much upon a well arranged house."

Such was the conversation that passed between two young ladies who had associated together from childhood, and whose friendship had increased with each succeeding year, until it had arrived to that degree of intimacy, so frank, artless and confiding, that sisterly affection itself could not surpass it. But never, perhaps, were girls who loved each other more different. And here I would remark, that almost invariably the strongest intimacies of the same sex, having their origin in childhood, exist between the greatest diversities of character.

The girl of gentle, modest, reserved and retiring disposition, selects for her friend and confident one who is frank, fearless and talkative; and vice versa. This seems to be in nonaccordance with the principles of nature, for there two contraries repel each other, in this they attract.

But to our story. Louise was by nature a very sensitive and a very sensible girl. She possessed a superior habit of observation;—had read and laid up for use many a lesson from the sayings and doings of others.—She had learned that earth does not present one unclouded scene of enjoyment, but that it has its winds, its storms, its hours of darkness and peril, and fortunate is he who knows how to encounter them with safety.—She had learned, too, that all is not gold that shines. She felt that she was created and destined for a higher, nobler sphere than that of a butterfly chase for fashions and pleasure, and that in proportion as she fed the hungry, clothed the naked, or helped the helpless, she labored for Him who loved active goodness more than sacrifice, and who unfailingly rewards the doer of good with a corresponding degree of happiness.

With such habits and feelings, it is not a little surprising that Louise should form an intimacy with one so light, gay and unreflecting as her friend Mary. It could not be said that education made the difference, for they were taught at the same school, and both had equally kind and good parents; but Mary did not love to read a useful lesson from every thing she saw, or lend a helping hand to others' necessities. True, she pitied the poor, and whenever she could spare a few shillings, willingly gave it them, innocently thinking that was all they needed. Pleasure was her happiness, and at every social gathering she found admirers gay as herself, and often wondered how it happened that so good a girl as Louise could attract so little attention; forgetting that an object worthy of pure, unadulterated love, is ever repulsive to flatterers.

Mary had selected from her many admirers, one to whom she gave her hand, and who loved her for her personal charms, and from his short acquaintance, vainly imagined she possessed all those amiable qualities which are necessary to render domestic life agreeable and happy. It need hardly be said, that Mr. and Mrs. Butler entered their new home full of joy for the present, and of bright, unclouded anticipations for the future.

Time passed on and brought, as it ever does, increasing happiness to some, transient pleasures and disappointed hopes to others, and change to all. But never did night's silvery queen look out upon a more happy family than that of Louise—who was now Mrs. Thompson. Three lovely children were seated around their parents, receiving, like dew from on high, instruction from Holy Writ. Their eager eyes were often filled with tears, as their father read and explained to them how, and why, the Son of God left his Father's bright realms, to dwell with sin and sorrow—how he kindly bade the erring sin no more—soothed the sorrowing—cheered the humble and contrite, and taught us all the light that leads to pure, perennial joys. They could not be blamed if their youthful hearts beat with indignation, as they sometimes did, on hearing how the envious lords played the thorns upon his meek and lowly head—how they spit upon, mocked, and derided him, and then in the last agonies of death, when the most soothing cordial should have been given, they offered to his trembling lip the bitter gall and vinegar; and as in imagination these lovely children heard his thrilling exclamation, "Father, forgive them," they could only exclaim, O my father, tell us, was ever love like his!

The sun gave a purer ray, the west a milder breeze, and the waters a gentler sound, as Mrs. T., with her usual companions, wended their accustomed way to church, where she saw her friend Mary present, for the first in a long, long time. She congratulated her, and among her inquiries asked the cause of her absence.—Mary's conscience-stricken countenance betrayed more than her tongue dared utter, which only was that she could not come. Now the truth was, she was never ready. She had always trusted to her various servants, who were often incompetent or negligent, to keep their clothes in order, dress the children, etc.—the consequence was, they could not be ready, or if ready at all, too late, and omissions had increased in number, until absence from church had become a habit with the family.

"We could not come," said Mrs. B., "but do, dear friend, communicate to me your secret of being always at church yourself, with your husband and children, all looking so neat and orderly. And Lucy, your servant, too, is here, dressed and appearing so well that if I did not know the contrary, I should take her to be your sister or cousin. For my part, my girls never looked decent to go to church, even if I could keep one long enough, which I very rarely can."

"Lucy has been with us so long, that she seems like a sister or cousin, and she takes quite as much interest in our family as either of those could; as to my secret, I have none. I only do, or see that every thing is done in its proper time, and teach my children to help themselves as much as possible."

Mary returned home with a saddened heart, but a secret hope that she might yet retrieve her husband's falling fortunes; not so much by retrenching her expences as by a proper care that nothing be lost or imprudently used.

The usual evening occupations at Mrs. T.'s were interrupted by the arrival of the following letter, which deeply affected Louise, and gave joy to all to know that a once sad family were now drinking the pleasant waters of domestic felicity.

"Dearest friend—Permit me to express my unfeigned gratitude for your kind instructions;—instructions which, if I had followed them long ago, would have saved me many a remorseful pang, and my family many a painful feeling of regret and shame that their wife and mother was not dutiful—did not love to administer to their wants and wishes; and it was not until my husband communicated to me the startling fact, that his once competent fortune was fast ebbing beyond his retentive power, that I could bring my proud heart to yield assent to imperative duty. My stricken conscience had spoken in a voice too strong to be unheard, that my negligence had caused his ill success, and long before we left your pleasant villa, hallowed to me by a thousand dear remembrances, did I resolve again and again to commence the work of reform, and as often failed; until the bleak winds of adversity actually came to nerve my arm and raise me from despair to hope. Heaven only knows my struggle; and thank the same kind Heaven that helped and sustained me, and your kind instructions and example, I have enabled my ever kind and forbearing husband to renew his smile of love, which is now doubly dear, and my children to feel that they have now a mother who cares for them.

"Dearest Louise, forget me not in your daily petitions to the Throne of grace; but pray that I may go on with the good work begun, and that I may in future make ample amends for time worse, yes, worse than lost. May I hope to be remembered as your truly penitent and affectionate friend, LETITIA.

EXCELLENT REPARTER.—The Rev. Dr. M'C—, minister of Douglass in Clydesdale, was one day dining in a large party where the Hon. Henry Erskine, and some other lawyers were present. A great dish of cresses being presented after dinner, Dr. M'C—, who was extravagantly fond of vegetables, helped himself much more largely than any other person, and as he ate with his fingers, with a peculiar voracity of manner, Mr. Erskine was struck with the idea that he resembled Nebuchadnezzar in his state of condemnation. Resolved to give him a bit for the apparent grossness of his taste and manner of eating, the wit addressed him with "Dr. M'C—, ye bring me in mind of the great king Nebuchadnezzar!" and the company were beginning to titter at the ludicrous allusion, when the reverend vegetable devourer replied—"Ay! do I mind ye o' Nebuchadnezzar? That'll be because I'm eating among the brutes!"

Christ was a preacher and pattern of humility; he did so admire it, that he set them in the highest form, that had the lowest hearts.

PATERNAL AFFECTION.

BY MRS. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

Paternal affection! Ah what deep and thrilling interest is connected with this one short sentence—what strong and undying love—what devoted and disinterested attachment, does it embody! Who that has seen the parent bend fondly o'er the infant child as he watched its peaceful slumber, or who that has noticed the light of joy which beamed in his countenance, as he gazed on the tiny features that reflected back his own—has never felt, that surely in the parent's heart, was a deep fount of one of the holiest of emotions? Who that has seen the parent open wide his arms to receive an erring and sinful child, though long years of estrangement, on the part of that child, have passed since his infancy—has not felt that there is a tie which unites the parent to his child, that nought on earth can sever? Or who that has heard the reproachful word, or bitter taunt of a child, returned for the devotedness and affection which have been lavished upon him, and has noticed that notwithstanding these, the parent wipes the gathering tear, and bestows his blessings and benedictions as ever upon the ungrateful one—who, we say, that has heard and seen this, has not thought that neither undutifulness or ingratitude can unstring that chord in the parent's heart which vibrates with a melody, such as nought else than the most unchanging love can awaken?

Surely that affection, so strong and unchanging, so deep and enduring, which binds the parent to the child, must be one of the highest and holiest of emotions; and though many may unite in saying that paternal affection is not a virtue; because, say they, it lives in the hearts of the vicious as well as virtuous, yet we do, and ever must believe, that it is not less than an emanation from the fount of love—"our Father who is in heaven." Nay, it is the "good seed" which, though planted in the heart from whence cometh vice, springs forth in beauty and fragrance, and to an extent, covers the "tares" which have taken root in the same soil.

Where is that one, who has left the light of a parent's smile, to wander abroad in a world which is by far too unfeeling, that has not turned, when his eye seemed benighted by cares and sorrows, to a parent's love, as to a star that would still beam on his darkened pathway, and give light to his feet, though all others should set to rise no more forever? But who, ah who, like the orphan can feel the need, and appreciate the value of this—one of Heaven's richest boons! Who like the orphan, can rightly prize the advice and admonitions, the smiles and commendations of a parent? And when neglect and inhumanity have aimed their piercing darts at the fatherless one, say, who then wishes as ardently for a parent's love, or feels as sincerely that could it be had it would, as a soothing balm, heal the cruel wounds? Oh then, "deal gently with the orphan's heart!" for as would be this earth were the brightest of the sun's rays struck from existence, even thus is the earthly sojourn of that one, who on earth feels not the kindly influence of a parent's love. And ye, ye who have still the "blessed boon allotted you," cherish it well, and prize it highly—prize it as you do the rays of light, for though all unworthy, like the noonday sun, it withholds not its blessed beams.

This subject was suggested by reading an inscription on a rugged, moss-fringed stone, erected in a burial ground but a short distance from the village of M——. It was traced when the surrounding country for some distance, was all a wilderness, save here and there an opening made by some enterprising yeoman or hardy lumberman. It reads as follows:—

"Heare lies the body
Of Hannah Stichind Hanah Stichind was born July 22 day 1789
Died 24 day of January 1791 Aged 18 Monthes and two days old when shee died"

Here was no marble urn or sculptured monument to tell the resting place of one whom that parent held near and dear! Here was no display of art or of science, but a rough inscription traced by one unlettered and unlearned! But does not that shapeless stone tell of an affection as deep and devoted as would a monument which wealth, art, and science had conspired to erect? Yes: and it speaks too of a grief as deeply felt, as any which ever rent the bosoms of those upon whom had been showered the gifts of science and literature! And when the loved one was laid in its last narrow bed, fain would the doting parent expend much for some testimonial of affection to mark its resting place. But when circumstances forbade his obtaining a tombstone carved by one studied in sculpture, he, after an anxious search, selected a stone which though rude and shapeless, could be made to speak to the memory of the lost. And then did his pleasing task commence. After long days of wearisome labor had passed, then, as we learn by a contemporary of his, would he return to the home now made sad, from the recollection that a sweet voice which was wont to greet him, was hushed in silence, and with a pamphlet before him from which to select the needed letters, and an instrument of iron which was intended for a far different purpose, would he pursue the task he had allotted himself. Thus did he employ many hours which but for this labor of love, would have been devoted to the repose of his weary and toilworn limbs. But at length it was completed, and what think ye, were his emotions when he saw it placed at the head of his infant's grave? Did he not feel doubly rewarded for all the labor which he had there bestowed, and did not his heart swell in gratitude when he saw a memorial raised to mark a resting place which though he could never forget, he wished should be held sacred by others? Yes, and long, long may that stone stand, not only to hallow the mound beneath which rest the ashes of one, that was once so fondly loved, but to tell also of the undying affection which lives in the parent's breast!

Kind reader; you have followed us thus far through our subject, but we ask your attention still farther. When we see the strength and devotedness of paternal affection—continuing as it does, though ingratitude, sin, and even death itself, conspire to sunder its ties—when we dwell upon its beauties and excellencies in our earthly parents, as liable to frailties and imperfections as they are, do not our thoughts involuntarily rise to our Father in heaven? And then we ask, can that fatherly love which dwells with Him from whom "cometh down every good and perfect gift"—who is of himself Love and Perfection—can it be less than that which lives in the breast of imperfect and erring man? Can it be that He who has ever been so mindful of our wants—who has taught us to love and revere him by placing around us so many testimonials of His wisdom, power and goodness—can it be that His love will be less enduring than that of our earthly parents, or that he will let us lie down in our graves to remember us no more forever?

No: the thought is derogatory to the character of Heaven, and unworthy the name of love! Has not the declaration gone forth, that with him is unchangeableness—that though a mother forget her young child, yet will the offspring of his care never be forgotten! How pleasing and salutary is the confidence which such a belief inspires! In the day of prosperity it enables us to raise our hearts in thankfulness to him who has blessed our exertions, and smiled on our efforts—and in the darkened hour of adversity we can rest assured, that though all else leave and forsake us, yet will he never forget or withhold from us, the many manifestations of his goodness and tokens of his loving kindness. And when we lay us down in that last hour, O how consoling will be the thought, that though we are to part with all on earth we hold dear, we are going to the arms of a Parent, who in due season, will gather all his children into that blissful court, where, purified from sin, they will enjoy his smiles and sing his praise forever!

O then let us cherish this belief through all seasons, and then come weal or come wo, we can look up to that Throne, as the dwelling place of a benefactor, a friend—a FATHER!

DOCTRINAL ARTICLES.....No. I.

BY REV. J. H. SANFORD.

Br. Grosh—In number 2, current volume of the Magazine and Advocate, I noticed a call for a few "brief, pithy articles of a doctrinal character" for your columns; and flattering myself that I can furnish them in as "brief" and "pithy" a manner as any one, I have concluded to suspend the pursuit of "contrasts," and offer the following for the purpose of variety.

ARTICLE 1ST. "Hear, O Israel; The Lord our God is one Lord." "O Lord God of Israel, which dwellest between the cherubims, thou art the God, even thou alone, of all the kingdoms of the earth." Hence God is not two or three, but "to us there is but one God, even the Father." Deut. vi: 4. 2 Kings xix: 15.

ARTICLE 2D. "The kingdom is the Lord's, and he is the governor among the nations." "The Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men and giveth it to whosoever he will." "Alleluia; for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth." "The Lord reigneth; let the earth rejoice; let the multitude of isles be glad thereof. Clouds and darkness are round about him: righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne." Ps. xxii: 28. xcvi: 1, 2. Dan. iv: 25. Rev. xix: 6. Therefore we under the ruling power of the king eternal, and amenable to his laws, and his alone."

ARTICLE 3D. His law "is perfect converting the soul." Ps. xix: 7, and consequently all souls being his, (Ezek. xviii: 4,) they will be converted and be healed.

ARTICLE 4TH. The Lord says by the prophet, "I will put my law in their hearts and write it in their inward parts." Jer. xxxi: 33. Therefore his law is not infinite, for if so, the heart of man could not contain it. The capacity of man to understand is finite; and it necessarily follows that the law of God is finite, and consequently the penalty annexed thereto is finite, and the punishment of course limited. Therefore endless suffering can not be.

ARTICLE 5TH. "They shall all know me from the least of them unto the greatest of them saith the Lord." And him to know is life eternal. Jer. xxxi: 34. John xvii: 3.

ARTICLE 6TH. "The law was our school master to bring us unto Christ that we might be justified by faith." Gal. iii: 24; Therefore the King eternal, the one God has instituted a perfect future law and put it into the hearts of the "chief of sinners," to give them a knowledge of himself and bring them unto Christ, and convert their souls.

THE POWER OF THE GOSPEL.

BY REV. H. BELDING.

There is something very interesting in the history of our Saviour and his disciples, considered merely as historical matter. That a private individual, without friends, without worldly means, seemingly destitute of every thing requisite for carrying on great enterprises, should, notwithstanding, effect such a revolution, as facts clearly establish, must ever remain an anomaly in the history of our race. Look at the Saviour, surrounded by his little band; and, apparently, a weaker company were never assembled. Follow them, as they go from place to place; and, on every suitable occasion, hear the leader lift his voice, and proclaim to the people that he is the true Messiah. The benevolent pity him for his weakness; while the haughty Scribe, and self-righteous Pharisee scoff, yea, deride him, as a mere pretender. What, he talk of his labors influencing the world! the son of a carpenter—a Nazarene, attended by a few ignorant fishermen; he talk of revolutionizing the world! What folly, yea, madness!

But, mark you their progress. Three years of toil and privation had effected seemingly, but little. Few were his adherents; and that few, anything but influential. Dark indeed was that time, when the leader was apprehended; and the little band scattered! How then stood the cause; and where was the evidence that he, or his doctrines would be even known, a century thence? Human judgment would say, all is lost: but far otherwise was the result. A few centuries, and the world (as it then was) had undergone an entire change. The heralds of the cross had traversed the earth by sea and land; and the doctrines of Christ had triumphed over all opposition.

Let us now inquire for the means used. What were the mighty producing causes that led to such unlooked for results? Probably it will be said, that miracles were the all-producing means. It is true, miracles did much; they enabled Christ and his disciples to silence opposition, so far as his authority, and the truth of his Messiahship were concerned; but this was not all that was requisite; nor was it the principal. Miracles could convince the understanding; but to control the passions and sway the will, something more was necessary. Independently of all miracles, there is in the Gospel a moral power, having its source in the purity of its doctrines, and the high and lofty hopes it inspires for futurity. And in the practice of the one, and under the influence of both, the disciples went through the world; and, in the event, revolutionized it.

And what may not such men do? They can outdo all the deeds of heroism and valor that have ever found a place upon the historian's page! What was an Alexander, a Cæsar, or a Napoleon? They subjugated nations, overturned governments, and in their times, became the terror of the world.—They had power over the outward man—they controlled the bodies of men; but over the better faculties of the mind, they bore no sway: hence, then, when the first acting causes were removed, things returned back much as they were before, or were diverted into other channels.

Not so with the apostles. Their labors cast an influence over the whole man—an influence that stopped not at the outward surface, but penetrated even the heart; and, by so-doing, corrected the fountain, that the stream might be pure. The spirit that Christianity breathed, was the spirit of heaven. It had in its composition, the elements of justice, mercy, truth, benevolence, humanity and love. Hence it was suited to all classes, to all conditions, and to all times. No human being existed to whom the provisions of the Gospel would not apply. Was a man ignorant? in the Gospel were sources of information, from which he might draw, and become wise. Was he already wise? let him study to become wiser. Was a man great, in every worldly sense? let him learn of Christ, and thus become acquainted with true greatness. Was a man good? then he might learn to become better. Was he young? let him spend the morning of life in search of truth. Was he old? then let the evening of life be employed in contemplations upon that same truth.

And what may we not yet expect from this truth? Divest it of those dark habiliments which Partialism has cast around it, and it will be what it was in the days of a Paul, and a Peter. Nor will it be found to have lost its ancient power. And are not the signs of the times propitious; and may we not expect that Christianity "pure and undefiled," will yet appear in all its native beauty? Then, and not till then, shall we see Christianity every where triumphing over infidelity. Then, indeed, may "the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." Amen.

THE CERTAINTY OF PUNISHMENT.

BY REV. W. M. DELONG.

All Christians will admit that the safety of our national character and government, the security of man's life and property, as well as the obedience of children to their parents, and the formation of their characters for after life, depend, in a great degree, upon the certainty of punishment for an infringement upon, or their violation of laws.

It matters not what law is transgressed—whether it be of a national, social or civil character, or whether it pertains to the parental government, all unite in saying that the penalty, annexed to the violated law, should be immediately inflicted upon the transgressor, in order to perpetuate the peace of our national and private character, and reform the disobedient. Hence, we see men of every religious sentiment, exerting themselves to execute the penalties, or cause them to be executed, upon him who has transgressed our civil laws.

And these same men, too, believing that the peace of their families, the welfare of community, and the good of the disobedient depend upon the certainty of chastisement, will inflict punishment upon their disobedient children. All of this goes to show, that in matters relating to man's present interest, all men, of whatever sect or sentiments, are agreed; so far, at least, as the certainty of punishment is concerned.

We could wish that this agreement extended still farther. But notwithstanding all men agree as to the certainty of human punishment, yet when we broach the subject of divine punishments, we are doomed to differ. "This is the rock on which we split." If our difference was on matters of a metaphysical or speculative nature, it might be accounted for, owing to a difference in our perceptive and reflective organs. But as it is on a matter of daily experience and observation, and on which there is the most clear and pointed evidence, it appears to me, to say the least, that the difference is strange and almost unaccountable.

No man can fail to see, that a slackness or uncertainty in the parental government, would soon prove the destruction of social harmony, and the ruin of the offender. Or, that an uncertain execution of civil laws, would tend to the destruction and ruin of our government. And notwithstanding men can see thus clearly and judge thus correctly on these points, they can not see the evil that would grow out of an uncertain execution of penalties annexed to divine laws!

Now, I as fully believe, that vice and crime will attend uncertainty, and non-infliction of divine penalties, as that they will be fostered and encouraged by such a course, under human institutions. And why should they not? As mankind are constituted, they will indulge in vicious habits unless checked by the chastening rod. And the institutions of men, "the powers that be, are ordained of God," to effect this object—to stop man in his career of wickedness. Hence, those who are using their exertions to bring the fugitive to justice, under our civil institutions, are using their endeavors to carry out and effect what their theology opposes, the certainty of divine punishments. That the certainty of such punishment, is indispensably necessary for the safety of community and for the good of man, is proven from the oracles of divine truth.

Solomon says, "Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men, is fully set in them to do evil." How inconsistent then, with this testimony, and how pernicious is that sentiment, which contends that it is not the immediate certainty of punishment, but the dread of endless wretchedness and torment, that will deter the sinner from crime!

Let the parent practice upon this principle—let him place his time of "reckoning" twenty years hence, and threaten his children, for a violation of his laws, with scourging, imprisonment, or death, to be put in execution at the expiration of the time—and, in order to make the illustration correspond with the common doctrine of the day—let him say to them that, if they will be sorry, or repent of their crimes, before the time of reckoning comes, their punishment shall be remitted, and their crimes forgiven—and what, kind reader, will be the effect? Think you that the children will be obedient and dutiful, chaste and virtuous?—the society in which they move, blessed by their example? and the time of reckoning find them never having deviated from the strict path of virtue and honor? Let those instances which do occur, where the parent is always threatening and never performs, or where there is a looseness in the parental government to chastise the refractory child, answer this question.

I do not say, but that the time of reckoning would find the children penitent and sorrowful. But would the intervening time tend to produce virtue and chastity in the children? and to prove the usefulness and propriety of such a course?

And here I would suggest to those who hold that future-world and endless sufferings, will deter the sinner from crime, the propriety of their acting in their official or private character, as much like their Deity as they possibly can. If they will pursue this course, they will be consistent with their theology; and probably be convinced of its perniciousness and immoral tendency.

There is no point of doctrine clearer taught in the Scriptures, than the certainty and unavoidable-ness of the punishment that awaits the transgressor. "Though hand join in hand the wicked shall not be unpunished." "God will by no means clear the guilty." "He that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done." And again: "God will render unto every man according to his deeds."

I regard punishment, as one of the blessings conferred by our Creator on mankind—as a means which he uses to effect their holiness and happiness. That all men become sinful and disobedient, will not be denied. Now, I ask, Is it not a blessing to them, to be brought back to obedience and virtue? "Yes," all will answer. Well, this is the object and design of punishment. It is to bring the sinner to reflect upon his course of conduct, and when he is thus brought to a serious consideration upon the wickedness of his past life, he will reflect upon the mercies and favors of God, of which he has been and still is the recipient. He is thus brought to repent of his follies and sins, and resolve to pursue, in future, a more honorable and virtuous course. And I ask, Was not that a blessing to him, which first aroused his moral sentiments to such a train of reflections, and such praise-worthy decision? All will answer in the affirmative—it was. Even he who has been made to feel the rod of severe chastisement will acknowledge, in the language of one of old, "Before I was afflicted, I went astray; but now have I learned to keep thy statutes."

If, then, divine governments are so necessary to effect man's present good, how absurd is the idea, that God will withhold from man here, that which will result to his best interest and virtue, and reserve it to man's endless wretchedness and woe! Forbid that a thought so revolting, so dishonoring to our Creator, should ever enter our minds.

While we believe in the certainty of punishment, may we never forget that mercy and justice should determine its amount. And while "no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous," yet let us remember, that "it afterwards yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness, unto them who are exercised thereby," and "will make him a partaker of God's holiness."

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

BR. GROSH—An oral debate came off in this place, on the third day of this month, at 6 o'clock in the evening, and continued five evenings, between our Br. G. T. Flanders, and Br. Lewis Barnes, (Methodist,) on the question, "Do reason and the Scriptures teach the final salvation of all men?" The rules of debate were as follows: 1st. Each chose a moderator to keep the disputants to the question in debate, and preserve order. 2d. Each spoke thirty minutes in succession. 3d. No more than six passages of Scripture were to have been quoted in one speech to prove a point, each of which the opponent was bound separately to examine. The above rule in regard to Scripture was not strictly adhered to, but we feel in duty bound to say, that the question was discussed in a spirit of Christian candor which we have never seen equalled in debate. The house was crowded to overflowing during the whole of the debate, and the most scrupulous attention was observed. The truth as it is in Jesus was brought forward by Br. Flanders stripped of its priestly decorations, illustrated and defended in a clear and impressive manner, such as is seldom equalled. On the contrary, the negative was defended by Br. Barnes in a manner which did honor to a sinking cause. The closing speech by Br. Flanders, (in which a review of all the arguments was made,) was such as I can not well describe, and those who were not favored with the opportunity of hearing, can but ill judge of its weight. It has left impressions that can not be easily removed, a spirit of inquiry after the truth appears to have gone forth, and is fast wearing off the tinsel with which error has vainly attempted to disguise it, and is beginning to shine in its native brilliancy, and darkness is fast receding before the glorious light of Gospel truth and salvation—

Our souls anticipate the day,
When error shall be slain;
And Gospel truth in triumph ride,
O'er falsehood's beaten plain.
When the loud thunders of the law,
Shall cease their dreadful roar;
And heaven-born truth spread far and wide,
And hell be preached no more.

It is a fact, evident to the impartial observer, that the truth as it is in the Scriptures has been strangely and extensively perverted; error has her shrine attended by a numerous host of worshippers—yes, even in this day of religious inquiry, many still shrink from the light of truth, and are bound down in the fetters of human tradition; and like the woman mentioned by our Saviour, who had a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, they can in no wise lift up themselves. Yes, by tradition and slavish fears they are kept as the Psalmist strongly expresses it, fast bound in misery and iron.

Friend, whoever thou art, lift up thy head, assert your liberty, and your fetters shall give way—the prison doors shall be opened—the captive shall go free; in the language of Solomon, I would say, "Buy the truth and sell it not." Give in exchange for it all your prejudices and sectarian bigotry; it is an inestimable treasure, seek for it as a hidden treasure, then thou shalt find the knowledge of God, which is more to be desired than fine gold; yea, than much fine gold.

But pardon me for this digression from our subject; and we will proceed. Three years ago and the truth was seldom heard among us, save when a wandering disciple of truth chanced to favor us with a call. Then we were but few in number, but now we march strong—our march is onward and upward.

The above mentioned discussion has given an impulse to the cause of truth, which can not be stayed; we have carried our victory into the enemy's camp. One more conflict and the day is ours; for truth is mighty and must prevail. Of late we have been forcibly struck with the truth of the orthodox saying, that "Universalism is running down" in the West. Down! yes, deeprooted, and firm shall it stand, and bid a proud defiance to the blighting storms of cheerless orthodoxy!

UNIVERSALISM!

BY REV. U. CLARK.

Here are balm and cordial for every wound and fear. The tempted may here find weapons strong to resist; the afflicted may rejoice in triumph, and dispel care; the mourner may dry up the tear of sorrow, and behold the brightness of the future; the dying may close their eyes on earth, and smile to welcome the whispering angel that bears the immortalized spirit to the Father's heaven and home. Here lift up the drooping heart, and be joyful in loud anthems even amidst the heaviest lowering clouds of human adversity—in life and in death; for here faith and hope lift a beacon light high above the darkest storm, and dart a ray on and on, till lost in the noon-day gleamings of immortality. O what swelling thoughts, what lofty aspirations are here inspired! Here let mind expatiate for ever, and holy ambition grasp eternal youth. Death is despoiled, and earth dwindles into nonentity, while heaven welcomes a race of regenerated intelligences. No sickness, sorrow, death, pain, night, sin, stormy wind or chilling breath, or separation there—there all is bliss extatic and unconfined. The soul, the mind soars untrammelled, and gathers strength and rides in new and undiscovered fields that open forever and ever in the immensity of space. Harps and voices of sweetest music are there, and there love and union warm every heart. The Father smiles to see the radiant beamings of joy in the faces of re-united friends, whose affection now refines into fadeless bloom; and heaven echoes with symphonious anthems as Jesus extends his arms to receive home the last earthly wanderer.

SECULAR NEWS.

DEATH OF COM. HULL.—Com. Isaac Hull, a veteran and distinguished officer of the United States Navy, whose name will ever be connected with the history of her proudest exploits, died at Philadelphia, on the 13th inst. The U. S. Gazette contains, from a correspondent, an extended biographical sketch of the deceased, from which we derive the facts for the following:—

He was born in Connecticut in 1776, and made two voyages to England, one to Ireland, one to Rotterdam, two to Lisbon, two to Cadiz, and ten to the West Indies; he commenced his nautical career at the age of 12, when he went on board a prize ship taken by his father from the British during the Revolution. He entered the Navy as a Lieutenant on the 9th of March, 1798. In 1800, while first Lieutenant of the frigate Constitution, he cut out a French letter of marque from Port Platte, in St. Domingo, at noon day, without the loss of a man. In 1804, while in command of the brig Argus, he rendered essential service in the Tripolitan war. In 1812 he was in command of the frigate Constitution, and was chased by a British squadron under Com. Broke. The seamanship manifested in the escape which he accomplished, conferred upon him almost as much renown as a victory could have done. The English, confidently relying upon their superior force, were extremely anxious to get along side their enemy. But by his admirable order, the coolness, discretion and skill, maintained in every portion of his ship, and the rapidity with which he was kedged, carried her safely out of the reach of her pursuers, without the loss of a single boat, anchor or gun.

But his most important exploit was the capture of the Guerriere, a British frigate of 38 guns, one of the squadron which had so recently chased the Constitution. Of this affair, Mr. Cooper in his Naval History has given a very spirited account. The Guerriere was discovered at about two in the afternoon, and was immediately chased and her character and quality ascertained at about half past three. Preparations for an action were immediately made, and some shot were fired. At six a disposition was manifested to engage in a yard-arm and yard-arm fight. A heavy fire on both sides was at once opened, and in about ten minutes the Englishman's mizen-mast was carried away, the American passed slowly ahead, keeping up a tremendous fire, and luffed short round on her bows to prevent being raked.

"As the vessel touched," says Mr. Cooper, "both parties prepared to board. The English turned all hands up from below, and mustered forward, with that object, while Mr. Morris, the first lieutenant, with his own hands, endeavored to lash the ships together. Mr. Alwyn, the master, and Mr. Bush, the lieutenant of marines, were upon the taffrail of the Constitution, to be ready to spring. Both sides now suffered by the closeness of the musketry; the English much the most, however. Mr. Morris was shot through the body, the bullet fortunately missing his vitals. Mr. Alwyn was wounded in the shoulder, and Mr. Bush fell dead by a bullet through the head. It being found impossible for either party to board, in the face of such a fire, and with the heavy sea that was on, the sails were filled, and just as the Constitution shot ahead, the foremast of the enemy fell, carrying down with it his mainmast, leaving him wallowing in the trough of the sea, a helpless wreck."

Since that time Com. Hull has commanded in the Pacific and Mediterranean, and at shore stations in the United States. He has been Captain thirty-seven years, having received his commission April 23, 1806, only one day after Com. Stewart.

AWFUL CALAMITY!—The Albany papers bring us the account of an awful calamity which occurred in Troy on Friday last. We take from the Argus, the following copy of a slip from the Troy Budget of Feb. 19th, which gives all the particulars which we have received:—

About 4 o'clock this afternoon, another land-slide occurred from the hill, (Mt. Ida,) where the awful catastrophe of January 1, 1837, transpired, exceeding in extent and consequences that memorable disaster.

Some eight or ten dwellings, occupied by poor families, were crushed and buried beneath the mass of earth. In these, it is supposed, there were not less than thirty or forty persons, only ten or twelve of whom escaped.

Within an hour, nine bodies had been dug from the ruins five of whom were without life, one partially injured, and three not beyond recovery.

Had this avalanche occurred in the night, the destruction of life would have been still greater, as many occupants of the houses were absent at their labor or elsewhere.

A man from the country, passing at the time with his team, leaped from his sleigh, and escaped. The horses and load of wood were buried beneath the earth.

We just left the scene of disaster. It is one of horrid desolation. Thousands were congregated on the spot, and a corps of efficient men engaged in penetrating the earth and clearing away the fragments of buildings.

SINGULAR OCCURRENCE.—On Wednesday week, two ladies belonging to the family of Mr. Creighton, who reside near the Clifton House, at Niagara Falls, had a narrow escape from an awful death. They were in a sleigh, driving a horse belonging to Mr. Creighton, and when near the well known Table Rock, by some mismanagement on the part of the ladies, the horse backed toward the precipice, and fell over into the dreadful gulf below. Fortunately the ladies sprang out, before the horse made the leap. Of course the horse and sleigh were dashed to pieces, the height from which they fell being more than one hundred and sixty feet.

The bill to abolish imprisonment for debt has been passed by both houses of the Missouri Legislature, and signed by the Governor.

A PARODY.

"The Rose that all are praising."

Sung at a Donation Party given to Br. O. Wilcox, and now published by request.

The creed that all are praising,
Is not the creed for me,
Too many doubts it's raising
Of God's paternity.
But there's a creed in his own book,
That men so often overlook,
For ALL its blessings raising;
Oh that's the creed for me.
The faith that many covet,
Is not the faith for me—
Oh, how partial! who could love it!
Save that 'twas destiny.
But I've a faith of lovely hue,
The Bible's self affirms it true,
And nature does approve it—
Oh, that's the faith for me.
A God in vengeance frowning,
Is not the God for me;
His offspring he's disowning
Throughout eternity.
But I've a God that is all love,
And he'll bless all in realms above,
Their final destiny—
Oh that's the God for me.

THE UNIVERSAL REIGN OF CHRIST...NO. I.

BY REV. ALSON SCOTT.

The Scriptures of truth are full of evidence upon the doctrine of the universal reign of our Saviour. The prophets of old sang the glory of his kingdom, and all agreed in regard to the office he should fill. Not a single writer of the Scriptures ever spake of him but as a prince and a ruler, whose kingdom should bear sway over the universe of mind, and ultimately bring all into obedience to his righteous government. Daniel, speaking of his government, says, "there shall be given him dominion and glory, and a kingdom; that all people, nations, and languages shall serve him." Isaiah speaking of him declares that "he shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David....from henceforth, even forever." The angel gave the same cheering intelligence to his mother, saying, "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the highest: and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Paul saw the same cheering prospect before him, for he declares that "he must reign till he hath put down all rule, and authority, and power; for he must reign till he has put all enemies under his feet....when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God even the Father;....and God be all in all." It was for this very purpose that he yielded to death and rose again from the tomb, "that he might be Lord both of the dead and the living."

By remarks and quotations made, it will be seen that the sacred writers saw, as with an eagle's eye, the final triumph of the principles of the Gospel over all themes, sentiments, or practices of men; and also the conquests Christ would make in his warfare against "the prince of darkness, the powers of the world, and spiritual wickedness in high places." Nor are the Scriptures the only teachers upon this point. Our reason has ever been busy upon this theme, and has brought out evidence that can not be resisted although we might deny the Scriptures of truth.

But, I may be asked, what evidence, other than that contained in the Scriptures, have we of the consummation of all things in one glorious kingdom, in which shall dwell righteousness and peace, and which shall have no end? I answer, First, the progress Christianity has made since the days of its founder—that is, if the present and the past may be considered, any evidence of what will be in the future, which none I presume will pretend to deny. Go back to the time of the advent of the Son of Man; then we beheld the people gone astray; sunk deep in sin and misery; paying more regard to the traditions of the elders, than to the law of the living God; practicing upon the old law of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. They were looking for him to come who should rule Israel, expecting that he would descend from some royal family, inherit the throne of their government, and bear sway in an earthly kingdom. Instead of this however, his birth was announced to the wondering shepherds of Judea as taking place in Bethlehem in a stable. He commenced his ministry by preaching the doctrine of repentance, a doctrine preached by his forerunner, which was disbelieved by the popular sects of the day; for none but the common people heard him gladly, or believed the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth.

His disciples were despised, as a body, by the Jews, on account of their low stations in life. In short his doctrines were every where spoken against, and the most bitter persecution raised against him, until, for the paltry sum of thirty pieces of silver, one of his own disciples betrayed him into the hands of his enemies. He is brought before a tribunal, accused of blasphemy, condemned and crucified; and not only so, but his disciples all forsook him and fled, while one of them, when accused of being with them, declared with an oath, "I know not the man." Notwithstanding all this, Christianity was destined to flourish. Its branches were yet to spread until they should form a cool retreat for the whole family of man. To have seen Christianity at this time, one would have supposed that it was dead, never more to rise. Its founder is dead, and deserted by his most zealous followers. This, however, was but a time of sleep from which it awoke with renewed power and might. From this time it gradually increased until near the time of the dark ages, when it again sank into oblivion, and its name became almost lost. Soon again it is seen bursting forth with splendor from its state of sleep, and with rapid strides marches from hamlet to hamlet, from city to city until we see it pervading a respectable portion of our globe.

Its votaries may now be found in almost every nation. It has out-stripped the most bitter persecution; subdued the most ferocious dispositions; converted them to its ranks, and inspired them with feelings of charity, and benevolence. Nor has its progress ceased; even now we see it gaining ground as fast as time can carry it: and should it continue to increase for a few centuries to come, as it has during the one that is just past, but a short time will elapse ere it will pervade all lands and climes, ere every heart shall become an altar of praise.—The prospect is a glorious one. The east is radiant with the glow, while the western horizon begins to be lit up with its heavenly, cheering light.—Were one now to judge of the future by the present and the past, he would predict the final triumphs of the Gospel, an overthrow of all bigotry, superstition, idolatry, and false religion, and a universal reign of the Redeemer which shall know no end.

"REMEMBER LOT'S WIFE."

LUKE XVII: 32.

There are thousands, and tens of thousands in this age, who are following the example of Lot's wife, that would do well to remember the cause of her being converted into a pillar of salt. We are sympathetic beings that can not but feel another's woe; and if that woe should be augmented before our eyes, our hearts and limbs would soon be petrified, and changed into blocks of salt or statues like marble. Did Lot's wife look back upon the horrible flames of fire and brimstone that were falling upon the plains of Sodom and Gomorrah? Let those who are constantly holding up a similar picture before the eyes of men, beware lest their very heart's blood should freeze in their veins, while they are relating their awful stories.

How long—oh how long shall there be so much said and done to drag the thoughts and meditations of men, women and children, from the upper and higher fields of sweet contemplation and glory, to behold the appalling, the dark side of the most gloomy picture that the distempered imaginations of men can invent? There seems to be a train of thoughts in the minds of men, that reminds me of the tail of the old Dragon spoken of Rev. xii: 4. "And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth." It should be here remembered that this old Serpent (that "deceiveth the whole world,") was not the first that fell from heaven; the Revelator says he "saw a star fall from heaven unto the earth: and to him was given the key of the bottomless pit. And he opened the bottomless pit:" etc. Rev. ix: 1-5. Now, all this must first take place before the old Dragon could accomplish the work of prostration described in connection with the history of his fall. And this is a striking pattern which has been most faithfully imitated by men in later times. Behold how untiring their efforts to arrange their sermon so as to fix some awful fire picture before the minds of men, and then hitch on the tail of their story in such an artful manner as to "cast" their distressed victims into long and black despair! Now, if lies about the end of the world or any thing else, makes professed Christians, then the Father of lies ought to have the credit of inventing such falsehoods as those that are told to make proselytes.

"By this amusement of government, men are taught to believe in inconsistencies and utter impossibilities; whips and dungeons, fire and gibbets, and the solemn terrors of eternal torments after this life, may persuade weak minds against their senses; and in direct contradiction to all their reasoning powers."—Dr. Watts.

TRUE RICHES.

"I will pull down my barns and build greater."

Luke xii: 18.

When the grounds of the rich man brought forth plentifully, when the flood tide of prosperity poured in upon him, he cried out in the very language of want, "what shall I do? because I have no where to bestow my fruits and my goods." Had not his heart been hard and unfeeling, the answer would have been ready,—viz., to assist the poor, the widow, and the fatherless. But no, the idea of enlargement strikes his mind, and he exclaims, "I will pull down my barns and build greater,—and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods." Ah foolish man, they are not thy fruits nor thy goods. "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof"—they are only lent thee a short time, by your Maker; and as well may you bury them in the earth, as to keep them hoarded in thy barns. They will answer the purpose for which God intended them as well in one place as the other. "And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years, take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry." Can thy immortal soul feast on earthly goods?—and are they laid up for many years? When thou art not sure of a single day, when in the midst of life we are in death, wilt thou calculate on many years? "Eat, drink, and be merry." How vain, indeed, is such a resolution! "for a man's life (i. e. the happiness of it) consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." While soliloquizing on the wisdom of his plans, "God said unto him, Thou fool, this night shall thy soul be required of thee." All the riches of the Indies, all the wealth thou possessest, can not rescue thee an hour from death, nor add another moment to thy life; thou art now called upon to go the way of all the earth. The father of thy earthly frame, the mother who watched over thy cradle, the brother and sister of thy youth, (if thou art in possession of such friends,) thou must leave them all—thy body must return to the earth, and thine immortal spirit, separated from it, must take its upward flight beyond the sun, moon, stars and flaming worlds to God who gave it. "Then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided?" They are not thine now—thou hast no longer any part or lot in any thing on earth—thy projects of ambition and thy dreams of adding dollar to dollar, of enlarging thy buildings, and multiplying thy plans, are now vanished forever! Thou hast toiled for heirs, thou knowest not who.

How unspeakably vain and useless is such a life—yet, "so is every one who layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich towards God."

The great moral to be derived from the above, is—that as riches have a tendency to harden the heart, and render it impervious to the calls of suffering humanity; and as poverty is hard to be borne, we should pray with Agur, for God to "give us neither poverty nor riches." It teaches us not to calculate on "many years," when we know not what a day may bring forth. To day we may be rich, to-morrow poor; to day in health, to-morrow in sickness; to day in life and health, to-morrow gasping in the pangs of death. Oh the mutability of every thing around us! God is the only object on which we can depend—he is "the same yesterday to day and forever"—a Friend that sticketh closer than a brother—he has stood by us in six troubles, and will he forsake us in the seventh? His goodness and mercy extend around, above, and below, and even to us here, and will they forsake us hereafter? He has been our best friend on earth, and will he change and become our worst enemy beyond the grave? No, never! There is nothing in the universe be it ever so small, but what is under the intimate inspection, wise conduct, and powerful influence of Jehovah's government; hence let us learn to rest our hopes on God, believing he doeth all things well—"Who will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth."

How cheering to the weary soul, to the worn-out pilgrim, is such a doctrine as this. It is glorious indeed—it is the truth of the Bible—it has the prayers of every holy being for its triumph—it has for its object the reclamation of the human race—it has for its end the endless felicity of every individual—it will do to live and to die by—it has been spoken of by the mouth of all God's holy prophets since the world began—it stands on a base firmer than Etna's, established by reason and Revelation—the happiness which it brings the mind will last with eternity, and be measured only by the skies. And can you disbelieve it? O ye doubting souls, "where is your faith?" Are you afraid to believe God—are you afraid to believe the Prophets—do you distrust the Bible? If so, you are wretched in the extreme, and it is possible you will leave the world believing, or pretending to believe, that a great part of mankind, with an equal proportion of your near and dear friends, must forever endure the excruciating torments of the wicked in hell. "Why will ye die?"—for you are in reality dead while you believe in such a doctrine as this. O rather turn and live; believe in the glorious restitution, and practice its requirements, and you will live—you will live a life of happiness, and die the death of the righteous, and your last end be like his.

PREJUDGING.

The practice of condemning a religious doctrine before investigation, is a fault in which by far too great a portion of mankind are prone to indulge. And there is no one thing which is so readily denounced, and that too by those totally ignorant of it, as Universalism. Yet in this they are inconsistent with their uniform practice in temporalities. Should there be any who are disposed to be incredulous in relation to this statement, he need not pass many days in any of our villages, before he can assure himself of its correctness. Ask a person what he thinks of the science of Galvanism. Why, perhaps he will tell you, he is skeptical upon that subject. But tell him there is truth embodied in it, and that a series of lectures is to be given upon it, and his answer will be, "I will attend and see what foundation they have in truth." He accordingly does so.

Ask another for his views of Mesmerism. He will perhaps be an unbeliever, but will express a wish to know and see more of its effects. Of Phrenology, the same. If there are to be lectures he will attend; if works are published relative to it, he wishes to possess and peruse them. But ask the whole orthodox world, (so called,) for their views of Universalism, and with one voice they all condemn it as a damnable heresy.

Here is a test of their consistency. They freely acknowledge their inability to judge of this or that science, or theory, for the reason that they are not familiar with it. But they are willing and ready to condemn Universalism, without giving it a hearing. One would naturally think, if it was as dangerous and erroneous a doctrine as its opponents represent it to be, that what they esteem to be truth would not suffer by a comparison with it, but would shine the brighter; and that so dangerous a doctrine as they esteem Universalism to be, ought to be well understood, that they might know best how and where to direct their forces against it.

It is an admission made by all, that to judge properly of any subject, we should first acquaint ourselves thoroughly with it; but this is a course very rarely pursued in relation to the believers in the restitution. It is a well known fact, that in proportion as people are ignorant of the doctrine, so are they opposed to it. This is well known by the Partialist clergymen of this day, and it is for this reason that we so often hear them exhorting their flock to beware of Universalist meetings, and to avoid associating with them. They know full well that their only safety is in keeping their people in ignorance; and as one means of effectually doing it, they get up their anxious meetings, create an excitement, get orthodoxy to its height, make people beside themselves, and in proportion as they get their crazy zeal excited, in the same proportion are they opposed to investigation. These preachers call Universalism a bear, which is ready to devour them; and lest this should be true, they keep aloof from it. Such is the consistency of many who oppose Universalism! A more honorable way would be to prepare themselves to meet it understandingly.

POPULAR ADMISSIONS. NO. II.

REWARDS AND PUNISHMENTS.

It is a good thing to make the opposers of the doctrine of impartial grace abide by their own arguments. It shows them their own weakness and the madness of their man-made schemes. There is no scheme that has been concocted by man, whose several parts so completely nullify each other, as American Orthodoxy.—Take the whole system, and set a man to defending it, and before he gets through with it, he will completely sweep out every stone of his foundation. There is no such thing as making the popular theology of the day hang together. It fairly hates its own shadow. I am, therefore, frequently in the habit of making the believer in the doctrine of endless torments stand by the consequences which he would fain throw upon the shoulders of his neighbors. We have already weighed the notion of no change after death. Let us try another one.

The assertion is very frequently made, that the distribution of rewards and punishments in this life is very unequal. We are told that the very worst men in the world, prosper and enjoy most; and that the very best men suffer the most. And this is insisted upon as a proof, that the present inequality will be remedied by a future endlessness of rewards and punishments. And it is very consistent with the general principles of popular religion. It is very much indebted to the rule of contraries. But this same system also says, that there is no change after death. Now, kind reader, I am in a perfect quandary, how these two notions can be made to coincide, in connexion with the doctrine of endless suffering. How a short life of impunity to the sinner, and misfortune to the Christian, (supposing the premise to be correct, which, by the way, it is not,) is so unequal as to make the endless reverse of these conditions equal, is rather a puzzler. But how the present sufferings of the saint, and the unpunished sins of this life, can prove the infliction of endless suffering upon one, or the bestowment of endless happiness of another; especially when there is to be no change after death; is more than any philosophy can comprehend. Perhaps some wise D. D. can enlighten me on this point. We will therefore follow up the notion in another light.

The sinner is not punished, the righteous are not rewarded, in this life—so say the reputedly wise ones of earth. But if such a state of things is consistent with the wisdom of God who changes not; who shall say it will not be equally consistent in the immortal world? What is the fair inference from such a proposition as this? Certainly it is far from proving the existence of any punishment hereafter. The sinner, we are told, goes on through a whole life, unpunished. And not only unpunished, but God bestows upon him less care, and more joy than upon His obedient children. If this be true; if God does thus bestow his approbation upon sin, it must be done in accordance with the laws of His government. The consequence will be, that all the Reverends who complain so much of their present sufferings, will continue to suffer; and all the sinners to whom Limitarians give so much joy, will continue to be joyful, as long as they are governed in accordance with this orthodox theology—unless they become holy, and in that case they will be sufferers too!

We have a more consistent theory. We say that holiness is always accompanied with the reward of joy; and that God punishes the vicious with a view to their amendment. And as he can not err in the choice of means, all will ultimately be restored, and enjoy the happiness of holiness. But the multitude reject this doctrine, and refuse to recognize their sufferings as the consequence of their errors. They insist upon it, that the distribution of rewards and punishments are very unequal in this life. They say that sin gives more happiness than obedience. The moral law of God, the moral nature of man, and the natural influence of sin, all combine to make the sinner happy. While on the other hand, misery, and want, and degradation, and misfortune are the natural attendants and companions of righteousness. According to this doctrine, if God was designing to make all men miserable, he would make them holy; and if he designed to make them all happy, he would only need to leave them to the natural influence of sin. Had not some of the great theological Seminaries of our land better improve their doctrines? Verily, if they do not do it soon, it will be done for them.

MILLER'S CALCULATIONS.—A paragraph from the Journal of Commerce (an up-to-the-hub and bigoted Orthodox secular journal,) is going the rounds, that Miller has stated that he has made a mistake of 1000 years in his calculations respecting the end of the world. In copying it we marked it doubtful, for we knew the source whence it came. Mr. Miller has made no such statement in his lectures while in this section. He still says that the world will be burned up in 1843; but professes not to be certain when the prophetic year—the real year, 1843, commenced—perhaps it will not begin until next March, perhaps it commenced last March—so that 14 months may elapse before the conflagration begins, though he looks for it every day. We hope his opposers will be honest enough to tell the truth about him and his theory; for many of them are as absurd as he—they believe in the same event, but profess not to know whether it will take place next month, next year, or next century—and yet they ridicule Millerism!!! A pretty set of fellows these religious teachers—they have collected the kindling, piled on the fuel, got the match ready, and declare that the fire must be got up; and yet, when a man comes along and tells the people to take care, for the blaze will soon be started, they ridicule him as a fanatic, a visionary, a madman, a fool, and a hypocrite! And when Universalists, and a few of their own most learned and able teachers, unite in showing that the whole foundation which Orthodoxy has planted for Miller to build upon, is false, unreasonable and unscriptural—that the end of the world (Jewish dispensation,) and the second coming of Christ is past, they turn round and call us infidels, and abuse Professors Bush and Stuart as vile heretics!! “Oh, consistency, thou art a jewel!”

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

This relic of the barbaric revenge of society against the criminal—of a self-perpetuating blood thirstiness, is vigorously assailed on almost every hand. Universalists are no longer almost alone in efforts for its utter abolition—many of some of the strictest sects in our land, are up and doing, and some of our states have been successful in its removal. It is virtually abolished in the States of Vermont, New Hampshire and Connecticut, by an enactment declaring that the criminal shall not be executed for one year after being found guilty, nor then, unless expressly ordered by the Governor. Of course, one year will allow all feelings of revenge to die away, and no Governor will be found so fond of blood as to order an execution, unless powerfully urged so to do.—In Maine, efforts are being made to abolish the relic. In Massachusetts, Governor Morton has very emphatically urged its abolition as necessary to securing certain and salutary punishment, and as demanded by the spirit of our institutions and the age. Several Conventions opposed to hanging have been held, and are yet to be held in Boston, on the subject. In the city of New York we notice that a public discussion of the subject has been held in Broadway Tabernacle, in which the advocates for hanging showed their fears, by avoiding a fair and full discussion of the subject—or probably, their shame at advocating so unchristian a code of morals; for they were ministers of the Gospel! Revs. Mr. Cheever and Dr. Cox. That discussion, however, (by giving the advocates of capital punishment all the advantages they claimed, and demonstrating their cowardice in meeting the subject fully, and their inability to sustain even their best and chosen positions,) has done much good, and will hasten the downfall of capital punishment. The opponents of these clergymen, (who occupied theological ground as much as possible,) were laymen only. In fact, the managers gave humanity and reason as little chance as possible.

Besides these popular movements, showing that the people are in advance of their teachers and leaders, we notice also, that the secular press generally is out in favor of the abolition of the punishment of death. Here and there a clergyman (who has been shut up among the musty volumes of a past century until his heart has forgotten to beat in unison with the humanity of this century, but still thirsts for blood as when the law of barbarous retaliation was enforced under the name of Christianity!) has ventured into the secular press, and “made darkness visible” by his exhibitions of exploded pleadings, which were used by the advocates for the rack, the thumbscrew, and the whipping post of a former day. And occasionally some editor, deeming his clergyman to be infallible because his spirit and his pleadings accord with the genius of a few centuries bygone, takes up on that side of the question; but generally the secular press—the best portion of it, for morals and intelligence—is opposed to capital punishment. The religious press is more equally divided—being more under the influence of men who live in the near past, instead of the present and the future of Christianity. But even here, change is at work, and in a few years more we may hope to see a sheet that advocates capital punishment flung from the hand with a shudder of disgust, as now would be the gory cloth with which a murderer had wiped his reeking hands! Then will the “occupation” of these spirits of a dark age be at an end—like the believers in infant damnation, they will be silent, if not convinced of their error.

So well satisfied have I been with the rapid rolling onward of the ball which we have aided so greatly to put in motion, that I have stood still, and seen it rolling onward under the work of other hands. Satisfied that its triumph was near at hand, and approaching as rapidly as could be desired, (for it is not desirable to secure the abolition of death as a punishment, until a large majority of the people are favorable,) and that Universalists needed no further urging, we have said and done but little in our columns, for a year or two past, in aid of the movement.

Among the states that have moved in this matter, Michigan stands distinguished. On the 30th of January last, her legislature passed a law abolishing death as a punishment, and substituting imprisonment for life.—The term solitary was stricken out; as, indeed, it should be. And what renders this act more peculiar is the fact, that no one has ever been executed in Michigan. May she ever be kept free from legal blood-guiltiness. The act passed the house of Representatives by a vote of 35 to 15—a majority of 20 out of 50 votes, or a two-fifths majority! That was surely well done, may it be as well maintained, and the example be as strongly followed by the states that have not yet moved in the matter—for we are firmly persuaded that the abolition of capital punishment will at once produce a very great decrease in the crime or crimes for which it is now inflicted.—Such, at least, has been the effect in every known case where the experiment has been tried—sometimes decreasing the number of cases one half—and as surely as human nature is the same, we may expect the same happy consequences to follow in this country. Mild punishments are not only necessary to render punishment more prompt and certain, but the promptness and certainty also render them more effectual in repressing crime, and efficient in reforming the criminal.

WILL THE FAITH OF THE UNIVERSALIST DESTROY HIM?

We propose to offer a few considerations in regard to a proposition, which those who do not believe the Restitution, affirm is applicable to those who do believe it. This proposition is, That our faith must eventuate in our destruction. My object is to show that this proposition is unfounded, and without evidence to support it—that it has its origin in the want of that divine charity which “thinketh no evil,” and leads to results which clothe the character of the most Holy One of Israel with revenge, shocks the best feelings of the soul, and establishes sentiments which are not taught in the Bible, in nature, nor in the right dictates of reason.

Let us look carefully at the statement, that if the doctrine which we believe, turns out to be error, our endless destruction is certain. If this statement is correct, then the conclusion is also true, that every person who is so unfortunate as to embrace error, no matter how sincere he may be, nor how virtuous, must ultimately be lost. If the first is true, the last also must be true—and it will apply not only to one sect, but to all sects. For, if the conclusion is followed, at what point shall the line be drawn, so that we shall decide how much error a man shall believe, in order to effect his destruction, and how little error he may believe, and still escape that destruction? If the fact, that a man is in error, is proof of his suffering endless loss, must it not also apply to the Old and New School party in one sect—to the free will and close communists in another sect—to the Orthodox and Hicksites in another sect—to the Protestant Reformed and Episcopal Methodists in another sect? One or the other of all these parties, is certainly in error—and if my believing an error will effect my destruction, why not of others, in other sects, who are also in error? What becomes of those who lived before our Saviour preached among men?—they were in error. And of the pagans since his day?—and of the Mahometans?—and of the Roman Catholics?—and of all those who belong to no Protestant sect whatever?—for all these are in deep error, according to those who declare that we must be lost for cherishing our faith. And yet, according to the conclusion flowing from the proposition adopted, all these must be ruined without remedy. Who can admit such a horrible conclusion as this?—involving the ceaseless misery of countless millions, who were perfectly sincere in their faith, and who strove according to the light which they possessed, to perform the duty which they deemed incumbent on them to fulfil. It is shocking to suppose that the ever blessed Deity has sanctioned such a doctrine. Yet there is no method of avoiding this conclusion—for if one kind of religious error will destroy one person—another kind of religious error will destroy other persons—and there is no rule, by which a sect can determine that ceaseless woe will follow one error, and not follow another error. Now this carrying the proposition that we must be lost for believing the Restitution, to its full extent, shows its absurdity; for it involves a doctrine which no person admits.

Let us, however, attempt to discover in what consists the mighty error for which our denomination is sentenced to unceasing anguish. 1. We believe in one God, infinite in all his attributes, and just in all his ways. All religious sects believe the same—therefore, the evil does not lie here? 2. We believe in the authenticity of the Christian Scriptures. All sects believe this truth, likewise. 3. We believe that Jesus is the Son of God, “the man Christ Jesus,” as the apostle designates him. This truth is common to all denominations also. 4. We believe in the resurrection of all the dead. All sects join with us in receiving this truth. 5. We believe in the necessity of repentance, of being “born again,” of conversion, and of “good works.” As to this necessity, all professed Christians agree. 6. We believe that God will reward every man “according to his works.” This abstract fact, all sects receive, however much the doctrines of some of them entirely nullify it.

The belief, which it is said will eventuate in our destruction, is not contained in the points of faith mentioned—for though we do not agree with other sects, as it regards the nature, application and extent of many of these points, yet, there is one common admission that all of them are taught in the Bible—and with this common admission, we most heartily concur. Where then is the particular faith of which our ruin is predicated? It is easily ascertained. All sects believe that a certain portion of the human family will be saved, and made endlessly holy and happy in the glorious immortality—we do most firmly believe in this most excellent truth also. But we go farther than this—we believe that the work which God will effect in relation to a portion of the human family, he will effect in relation to all—that he will redeem, purify, exalt, and in the power of his love and grace, raise to infinite joy and knowledge, every son and daughter of Adam. This is the sum of our offence—this the belief, for which destruction is to overwhelm us. If we believed that only a certain number of the human family will be saved, and that the other portion will be lost, then it would not be affirmed that our belief will end in our ruin—we should then become orthodox, according to the common meaning of that word, and heirs of salvation. The subject then, is narrowed down to this simple point; viz., others believe that one portion of the human family will be endlessly ruined, and this belief in the ruin of others, will save those who exercise that belief—while we, who believe that this portion, like the other, will also be saved, must be lost—so that the salvation of people is made to depend on their belief of the destruction or redemption of their neighbors. The absurdity of such a notion is still farther apparent from this fact—you are to be saved; for instance, because you believe that I am to be lost; and I am to be saved, because I believe that you are to be lost—so that while we believe each is respectively, to be lost, it turns out that both parties are saved, by believing the falsehood of the destruction which neither party endures—hence, the belief of what may prove a falsehood, is, after all, made the way of salvation.

But admit the Restitution to be untrue. The admission is only for a moment; for it can not be untrue, unless the Bible is a fallible book. But suppose it untrue, and even then it does not follow, that our destruction will be the result of belief in it. For, can it be true, that individuals who humbly strive to know the truth as it is, in Jesus—who constantly search the Bible for that purpose—and who as constantly endeavor to practice what they deem the truth—can it be true, that such individuals, even if they have fallen into error, will be cast into ceaseless wretchedness, notwithstanding their sincerity, their virtue, and their confidence in the goodness of their heavenly Father? The thought is not only without the least countenance from the Scriptures—but it ascribes a character to the divine Being, which would disgrace even frail human nature. Surrounded by so many influences which lead to error, as men are; and yet, to suspend their eternal destiny on a mistake, as it regards the truth, is the height of cruelty, and such a result as God would never permit, if the Psalmist were correct in saying, “the Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works.” We believe that God will save the world; and we found our faith upon his promise; his pleasure, will, and purpose; the mission of his Son; and the teachings of his inspired servants. He formed the plan of universal redemption in the beginning—he sent his Son to make it known, and to accomplish it—and when the end shall come, and all things shall be subdued unto the Saviour, then God shall be all in all. And this doctrine so perfectly agrees with those feelings which have been purified by Christian love, that all true Christians pray for it, and hope that it may prove true. If it be error, and our heavenly Father was disposed to destroy us for believing it, would he have suffered language to appear in the Bible, which irresistibly leads us to that belief, and have made it so charming to the benevolent soul, as to excite the most ardent desires that it may prove true? Most assuredly not! There is then, not the least foundation for the statement, that the belief of the Restitution will eventuate in our ruin.

The declaration grows out of a spirit, which is as lamentable in its effects, as it is contrary to the teachings of the Saviour. It has constantly been the practice of many sects, to denounce others of a contrary faith, and to give them over to endless perdition. This has been the invariable fate of every new sect, no matter how pure in faith and correct in practice. What others have received, we are now receiving. Let it be so. While such treatment has no countenance in the Bible, let it teach us the salutary lesson, not to fall into the error of abusing and misrepresenting those who differ from us in faith. But while we strive to convince them by the power of the Scriptures, let us endeavor to overcome their prejudices by the influence of that love which worketh no ill to its neighbor. In religious subjects as well as in all others, we are bound to do unto others, as we would have others do unto us. “Overcome evil with good,” is the duty of the Christian. G. W. M.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

REMOVALS.—Br. Wm. Sias has removed from Mansville, Jefferson county, to Hannibalville, Oswego county, and desires to be addressed accordingly. Br. J. B. Dods has removed to the city of Boston; Br. C. W. Mellen, from South Orange to Foxboro, Mass.; C. H. Webster, from Clinton, N. Y., to Salem, Mass. Br. C. S. Brown from Prompton, Pa., to Marshall, Oneida county, N. Y., and desires all papers and letters addressed to “Deansville, Oneida county.”

NEW PREACHERS.—We find among new accessions the names of Clement Webster, one of Editors of the Portsmouth (N. H.) Washingtonian, and of the Balm of Gilead, of Concord, N. H.; Geo. H. Emerson, of Ellsworth, Mass.; Edwin T. Quinby, of North Yarmouth, Me.; Joseph B. Jackson, Racine county, Wisconsin; Hon. John Burnham, (formerly a Baptist clergyman,) of Orland, Me.; Rev. C. F. R. Shehane (Campbellite,) of Columbus, Ga.; Rev. Daniel Kelso (Methodist,) of Louisville, Ky.; J. W. Moffit, Richmondale, Ross county, Ohio; and Josiah Marvin, Paper mill village, N. H.

NEW SOCIETIES have been organized lately in Patten, Me.; Lowell, Mass. (the third); and three, numbering more than 20 members each, in Br. W. Y. Emmet's district (why not give the names of the places, Br. E?)

NEW CHURCHES have been organized in Highland,

Vermillion county; Williamsport, Warren county; and in Jefferson, Clinton county, Ind., by Brs. Manford and Foster; and in Lowell, Mass., (second society) under charge of Br. A. A. Miner, of 183 members.

A NEW MEETINGHOUSE was dedicated lately in Gardiner, Me., (house cost $6000).

ITEMS.—Br. I. D. Williamson's health is again poor, so that it is feared he will again have to suspend ministerial labors, at least for a time.

By letters from Br. C. P. Mallory, of Ohio, who is now itinerating in Lower Canada, we learn that our cause is rapidly advancing in that province. Millerism and a species of erysipelas are raging there to a fearful extent; but still inquiry is going on, and of course, our cause is gaining ground in the minds of the investigators.

The cause is advancing in Norwich, Conn., under the labors of Br. R. O. Williams. The pews rent this year for $175 more than they did last year.

The brethren in Worcester, Mass., purchased a lot last year, for $5,500, but delayed building on account of hard times. They have resolved to wait no longer, but to proceed with their meetinghouse. It will be 50 by 75 feet, with four stores in the basement.

Arrangements have also been made for building meetinghouses in Saco, and in Hallowell, Me.; in Foxboro, Mass.; and in East Liberty, Ohio.

The third Universalist society in Lowell, Mass., will probably build also, as soon as incorporated. They have already secured a lot for $6000.

By a statement of the average number of attendants on Sunday meetings in the Congregational, Episcopal, Unitarian and Universalist churches in Boston, it appears that the Universalists have the largest Protestant congregation in the city, and the best average attendance in proportion to their numbers. Yet it is urged that if the doctrine were to prevail, the churches would be abandoned, the Sabbath abolished, religious worship fall into disuse, and moral chaos and misrule reign in society!

The practice of holding Conference or Praise meetings during the week evenings, is increasing greatly among our societies in Boston and its vicinity. They are principally carried forward by the lay members.

N. Y. S. CONVENTION—BOOK OF RECORDS.

During last Summer, some person got the Book of Records of the New York State Convention of Universalists, (done up in stout brown paper, together with a number of copies of the Constitution and By-Laws in pamphlet form,) for the purpose of delivering the same to Br. G. W. Montgomery, the Standing Clerk. It is my impression that it was given to the person in Mr. Hutchinson's Bookstore, in this city. Be that as it may, Br. Montgomery has not yet received it. Will not the person who thus received it, please inform me, or Br. Montgomery, by letter, and immediately, where it is? Let there be no delay in this matter. The book itself can be sent afterwards, by the first favorable and safe opportunity. A. B. G.

PARTIALISM AND INSANITY.

By the official report of the Ohio Lunatic Asylum, it appears that out of 408 persons admitted as insane, 54 cases were produced by religious excitement, and 32 by intemperance; being a gain of Partialism over intemperance, of 22 cases, for heretofore they have had about an equal number of victims.

In the Maine Insane Asylum, in two years 23 of the admitted cases were caused by religious excitement, and 12 by intemperance—showing that Partialism makes two victims to where intemperance now makes one.—Of the 87 new patients admitted during the past year, 13 were driven to insanity by “revivals,”—more than one-seventh of the whole number!

Washingtonianism is rapidly drying up one great fountain of insanity, and thus destroying the equality of power to drive to insanity, that existed between intemperance and Partialism. It is high time that the poor victims of Partialism in its many forms of Mormonism, Milerism, revivals, etc., should take up arms against the cause that has so long opposed them, and drive it also from the land. Universalism will do it; but the present professors of Universalism seem to be too indolent to labor, or selfish to spend, in the work. Where shall the Reformers spring up, that will first break their own chains, and then go forth to free others? Let them come—there is need and room for them. A. B. G.

A. C. A. R. D.

I acknowledge with gratitude the generosity of more than 100 friends in this town, who attended a donation party at my house, lately, and gave evidence by works as well as words of their friendship and zeal. May Heaven reward and bless them.

I wish also to mention, though at this late day, that I am under similar obligations to the friends in Rutland and South Champion, for similar evidences of their kindness, while I labored with them, one half the time, last year. O. WILCOX.

Ellisburgh, February 7th, 1843.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in March, by Br. H. GREEN in the new school house, near Br. Snow's in Willet—Br. GROSH in Syracuse—Br. C. S. BROWN in Marshall and once in two weeks thereafter.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in March, by Br. S. JENKINS in New Hartford.

Br. O. WILCOX will preach in Little York, (Fowler,) on the evening of the 27th inst.; and in Summerville on the evening of Wednesday, March 1st.

MARRIAGES.

In Pottsville, Pa., (on St. Valentine's day!) February 14th, Rev. ABEL CHARLES THOMAS, Pastor of the Universalist society in Brooklyn, L. I., to Miss MARIA LOUISA PALMER, of the former place. God bless them!

DEATHS.

In Cedarville, on the 9th of January, Mrs. MARIA DEVENDORF, wife of Lewis Devendorf, aged 21 years. Mrs. Devendorf was educated a Presbyterian, and lived and died a believer in that doctrine. But truth compels me to say, that whether right or wrong in theory, she was right in practice. From personal acquaintance with the deceased, as well as from the undivided testimony of her neighbors who knew her well, I am prepared to say, that love to God and her fellow kind, was a conspicuous trait in her character.—The friends of Br. Devendorf, her husband, whether clergymen or laymen, were cordially received and kindly entertained. In one word, her charity was of that kind, that “thinketh no evil.”

May God in mercy bless her bereaved companion, and numerous friends, with Christian faith and Christian resignation.—COM.

In West Leyden, Feb. 9th, Mrs. MEHITABLE JENKS, consort of Wm. Jenks, aged 62 years and 3 days. In the death of this amiable woman we again witness the triumphs of the Christian faith. She was educated to believe in the doctrines of Calvinism, but for about twenty years of her life, she has been convinced of the unlimited goodness and impartial grace of God. She lived a Universalist, and in the full enjoyment of her faith, she died happy—she died a Christian. Br. Jenks is left with a family of seven sons to mourn their loss. May the Lord bless, and strengthen, and support them in their affliction. Her funeral was attended on the 12th, at the Presbyterian church in that place, and the consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourners, and a respectable number of sympathizing friends, by the writer. G. SWAN.

A BRIGHTER HOME.

BY MISS C. M. TIBBITS.

'Tis a bleak world we live in
But all is not lone,
For oft we have heard,
Of a happier home;
But the heathen are mourning
In sadness and grief,
There's a voice o'er the waters
Implo'ring relief.
Messenger! haste o'er the ocean's foam,
Proclaim to the heathen a brighter home.

'Tis a bleak world we live in,
And sadness is here,
And tones of deep anguish
Are borne to our ear,
The dreams of life's morning
Are melting away,
And friendship's bright flowers
Are gone to decay.
Messenger! haste o'er the ocean's foam,
Proclaim to the heathen a brighter home.

'Tis a bleak world we live in,
For death enters here,
And calls from among us
The loving and dear;
The voices that echoed
In gladness and mirth,
Are silenced forever
And hushed in the earth.
Messenger! haste o'er the ocean's foam,
Proclaim to the heathen a brighter home.

'Tis a bleak world we live in,
But short is our stay,
Soon we shall be called
From its darkness away;
A voice soon will echo
O'er life's darkened sea,
Come home—now forever
Thy spirit is free.
Messenger! haste o'er the ocean's foam,
Proclaim to the heathen a brighter home.

YANKEE PUNISHMENT OF THEFT.

A MELTING STORY.

No other class of men in my country possess that facetious aptness at inflicting a good humored revenge, which seems to be innate with a Green Mountain boy. Impose upon or injure a Vermonter, and he will seem the drollest and best natured fellow you ever knew in your life, until suddenly he pounces upon you with some cunningly devised offset for your duplicity; and even while he makes his victim smart to the core, there is that manly open-heartedness about him which infuses balm even while the wound is opening, and renders it quite impossible that you should hate him, however severe may have been the punishment he dealt out to you. These boys of the Green Mountains seem to possess a natural faculty of extracting fun from every vicissitude and accident the changing hours can bring; even what are bitter vexations to others, these happy fellows treat in a manner so peculiar as completely to alter their former character, and make that seem to us agreeable, or at least endurable, which was before in the highest degree offensive. Another man will repay an aggravation or an insult by instantly returning injury, cutting the acquaintance and shutting his heart forever against the offender; but a Vermonter, with a smile upon his face, will amuse himself while obtaining a far keener revenge, cracking a joke in conclusion, and making his former enemy forgive him, and even love him after the chastisement.

One winter evening, a country store keeper in the Mountain State was about closing his doors for the night, and while standing in the snow out-side, putting up his window shutters, he saw through the glass a lounging, worthless fellow within, grab a pound of fresh butter from the shelf, and hastily conceal it in his hat.

The act was no sooner detected than the revenge was hit upon; and a very few moments found the Green Mountain store-keeper, at once indulging in his appetite for fun to the fullest extent, and paying off the thief with a facetious sort of torture for which he might have gained a premium from the ancient Inquisition.

"I say, Seth?" said the store-keeper, coming in and closing the door after him, slapping his hand over his shoulders and stamping the snow off his shoes.

Seth had his hands upon the door, his hat upon his head, and the roll of new butter in his hat, anxious to make his exit as soon as possible.

"I say Seth, sit down; I reckon, now, on such an eternal night as this, a little something warm won't hurt a fellow; come and sit down."

Seth felt very uncertain; he had the butter, and was exceedingly anxious to be off, but the temptation of "something warm" sadly interfered with his resolution to go. This hesitation, however, was soon settled, by the right owner of the butter taking Seth by the shoulders and planting him in a seat close to the stove, where he was in such a manner cornered in by barrels and boxes, that while the country grocer sat before him, there was no possibility of his getting out; and right in this very place, sure enough, the store-keeper sat down.

"Seth, we'll have a little warm Santa Cruz," said the Green Mountain grocer, as he opened the stove door and stuffed in as many sticks as the space would admit. "Without it you'd freeze going home such a night as this."

Seth already felt the butter settling down closer to his hair, and jumped up declaring he must go.

"Not till you have something warm, Seth; come, I've got a story to tell you too; sit down, now," and Seth was again pushed into his seat by his cunning tormentor.

"Oh! its tu darn'd hot here," said the petty thief again attempting to rise.

"Sit down—don't be in such a plagny hurry," retorted the grocer, pushing him back into his chair.

"But I've got the cows in fodder, and some wood to split, and I must be goin'," continued the persecuted chap.

"But you mustn't tear yourself away in this manner. Sit down; let the cows take care of themselves, and keep yourself cool; you appear to be fidgetty," said the roguish grocer with a wicked leer.

The next thing was the production of two smoking glasses of hot rum toddy, the very sight of which, in Seth's present situation, would have made the hair stand erect upon his head, had not it been well oiled and kept down by the butter.

"Seth, I'll give you a toust now, and you can butter it yourself," said the grocer, yet with an air of such consummate simplicity that poor Seth still believed himself unsuspected. "Seth, here's a Christmas goose—(it was about Christmas time)—here's a Christmas goose well roasted and basted, eh? I tell you, Seth, its the greatest eating in creation. And, Seth, don't you never use hog's fat or common cooking butter to baste with; fresh pound butter, just the same as you see on that shelf yonder, is the only proper thing in nature to baste a goose with—come take your butter—I mean, Seth, take your toddy."

Poor Seth now began to smoke as well as to melt, and his mouth was as hermetically sealed up as though he had been born dumb. Streak after streak of the butter came pouring from his hat, and his handkerchief was already soaked with the greasy overflow. Talking away as if nothing was the matter, the grocer kept stuffing the wood into the stove, while poor Seth sat bolt upright, with his back against the counter, and his knees, almost touching the red hot furnace before him.

"Darnation cold night, this," said the grocer. "Why Seth, you seem to perspire as if you was warm! Why don't you take your hat off? Here, let me put your hat away!"

"No," exclaimed poor Seth at last, with a spasmodic effort to get his tongue loose, and clapping both hands upon his hat. "No! I must go, let me out; I ain't well; let me go!" A greasy cataract was now pouring down the poor fellow's face and neck, and soaking into his clothes, and trickling down his body into his very boots, so that he was literally in a perfect bath of oil.

"Well, good night, Seth," said the humorous Vermonter, "if you will go;" adding, as Seth got out into the road, "neighbor, I reckon the fun I've had out of you is worth a nine-pence, so I shan't charge you for that pound of butter."

WHO ARE THE INFANT'S ACQUAINTANCES AND FRIENDS?

"Died, in West Plains, HENRY WILLIAM, youngest son of John and Mary Henderson, aged eight months. His friends and acquaintances are invited to attend his funeral, on Sunday afternoon, at 4 o'clock, from his father's residence."

We extract the above from an exchange paper—but who will go to the infant's funeral?

The mother will be there, of course, with crushed affections, following the little coffin, with its sacred contents, to the grave, and the father will be with her, sustaining her, and sharing her grief. And the others of the flock will be there—a tapering down procession, from the largest to the smallest. These are the relatives that will go to the funeral. But who are the friends and acquaintances not of the class of relatives, that shall be of the solemn host, going forth to the silent home of the dead? Not many, it would seem. For how could an infant have acquaintances? How could the little one, unable to utter its name, or sustain its weight, have friends, except its home relatives? One would suppose then, that they alone were there—that none came to conduct the baby to its new found grave, but those who felt the brotherhood diminished, and that they alone were mourners. Not thus—friends and acquaintances were there in throngs, and but for the pall that hung before the eyes of the stricken family, they would have seen that they were not alone. Friends the little one had. The countless host that stand between us and the world above, hold acquaintance with the pure and unsmirched infant mind. Awakening, the child, unborn to active sin, feels the contact of the influence of good, and gazes around, wondering whether those that meet his eye, are the same that stand in his mental vision.—Sleeping, the whole world of spirits is his own again, and the enjoyment of that intercourse is told in the smiles that wreath his lips.

He has friends, too, with the first breath of earth there is placed beside him—the guardian friend, perhaps visible then to eyes not dimmed by sin or sorrow—the friend that travels through, nor quits him when he dies. And often the guarded one, in dreams, connects his spiritual guide with his mental protector, and clinging closely to the sympathetic fount, confounded in his simple perception, the gentle mother with the image of guardian power, whose form grew dimmer and dimmer as the things of the world pressed upon the sight, until at length the mother occupied all the heart, combining parent, friend, and guardian angel.

And these, the unseen but beautiful, were at the funeral—not joyous that the spirit had come back, but tearful, if angels have tears—sorrowful, that their task was so soon closed. The simple and the lovely are not all their thought. Their reward is for leading up to wisdom and dignity, and they mourn as we mourn, when the unfinished and immature pass upward without the trial that makes a virtue.

He that pleases himself without injuring his neighbor, is quite as likely to please half the world, as he who vainly strives to please the whole of it; he also stands a far better chance of a majority in his favor, since upon all equal divisions he will be fairly entitled to his own casting vote.—Lacon.

THE END OF THE WORLD.

A SERMON,

BY REV. GEO. W. MONTGOMERY.

"And this Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come." Matt. xxiv: 14.

In the name of religion, there have been men in all ages, who have originated and proclaimed the most fallacious and fanciful systems. And unfortunately, such men have found people enough, characterized by ignorance, or instability of mind, or by blind fanaticism, to adopt their systems and believe their wild dreams. No matter how absurd those theories—no matter how contrary to established truth—no matter how vile the conduct they inculcated—no matter how fruitful of folly and insanity—yet they spread like the baleful pestilence, bewildering the unthinking, unsettling the weak-minded, and breaking up good order in society. The history of superstition amply sustains these positions. And the vices and follies of those who followed Matthias the modern impostor; the absurd claims and conduct of fanatics in Perfectionism; and the wide sway of the Mormon delusion; only add strength to what has just been stated.

The supposed fact, that the earth will be destroyed by fire, has been and is now, a fruitful source of excitement and error. For century after century, men have appeared from time to time, and with systems elaborately prepared and lengthily argued, have proved to the satisfaction of thousands, that the destruction of the earth was nigh at hand. To illustrate this fact, it is only necessary to state some instances. In 1688, a sect arose in France, whose members claimed to be inspired—they were called the French prophets; and soon numbered thousands of followers. In 1706, four of these prophets visited England, and notwithstanding their absurd views and ridiculous conduct, their principles rapidly spread among the people. They stated that the day of judgment would transpire in three years, and would be preceded by famine, pestilence, earthquakes, and the fall of popery. Buck's Theo. Dict. p. 192. A sect arose in the times of Cromwell, called Muggletonians, from an individual by the name of Muggleton, who, with his companion Reeves, announced that they were the two last witnesses spoken of in Revelation, who were to precede the destruction of the world. Ibid. p. 398. Some German journalists stated that the comet of 1832 would strike, and wholly destroy the earth. This announcement excited great alarm in France—so much so, that the astronomers of Paris were requested to come out and allay the public fear. The inducement to do so, was, that when a similar prediction was made in 1773, some people died from fright; while designing persons, taking advantage of the timid and ignorant, sold places in Paradise at enormous prices. Dick's Sideral Heavens, p. 336. A German by the name of John Albert Bengel, a man of great talents and profound education, persuaded himself, by an ardent study of the book of Revelation, that the world would be destroyed in 1836. And he adopted this faith under such circumstances, as preclude all doubt of his sincerity.

But notwithstanding these instances of delusion and folly, selected from a great number of similar character—notwithstanding these dreams have been falsified, and the earth, neither smitten by a comet nor destroyed by fire, still moves in its appointed course—yet people are still eager to grasp the same error and to run headlong in the way of those who have been deceived in past time. For when some one vamps over the old story with apparent plausibility, and with vehement assurance points out the supposed errors in former predictions, and fixes a yet future time for the destruction of the earth, there are multitudes ready to hear and rejoice in the new tune which is sounded from the same old instrument, while they run about the country, warning people of the approaching day of judgment.—And though a little examination would convince them, that while the downfall of Popery, of Mahometanism, and of the conflagration of the earth, have been predicted a thousand times, and to as little purpose; for Popery and Mahometanism still exist with apparently as little diminution of power as ever, and the earth still jogs on in despite of the dreams of its people; yet they are as ready as ever to chase the same bubble, and to be caught by the same snare, and to be led away by the same folly.

Now the error has again revived, and the same anxiety is cherished, and the same eagerness for new things is manifested. As clearly as figures can prove it, 1843 is the eventful year, in which the "New Jerusalem" is to descend from heaven—in which the kingdom of Christ is to be set up—in which the earth is to be destroyed—and the end of all earthly things is to be accomplished. Thousands, composed of clergymen and laymen, are embracing these views with zeal, and for aught we know to the contrary, with sincerity. Still, a review of the system shows that it has no better foundation than those which have preceded it—that it is a mere fiction, sustained by passages of Scripture to which a false sense has been attached. And those of us who shall be permitted to see 1844, will discover that its followers have been most egregiously duped, and that it will prove as erroneous as that prediction of its author, concerning the signs which he supposed would precede the burning of the earth. He says:—"Mankind will for a short season give loose to all the corrupt passions of the human heart. No laws, human or divine, will be regarded; all authority will be trampled under foot; anarchy will be the order of governments, and confusion fill the world with horror and despair. Murder, treason and crime will be common law, and division and disunion the only bond of fellowship. Christians will be persecuted unto death, and dens and caves of the earth will be their retreat. All things which are not eternal will be shaken to pieces, that that which cannot be shaken may remain. And this, if am right in my calculations, will begin on or before A. D. 1839." Miller's Lectures, p. 84, Ed. of 1836. Where is the fulfilment of this prediction? No where, save in the imagination of its author! His calculations here, have proved entirely fallacious—and 1844 will prove the rest of his system to be a dream, with as little foundation as the precious moon hoax.

There are three pillars which are the main support of Millerism. I. Those passages which speak of the "end of the world"—II. Those passages which speak of the burning of the earth—III. Those passages which are supposed to designate 1843 as the year in which these events are to be accomplished. If these three pillars can be taken away, the whole system will disappear like an air-castle before the eye of sober sense.

I. We will attend to those passages, which speak of the "end of the world." Let it here be carefully observed, that the end of the literal world, of the physical earth on which we stand, is no where spoken of in the Bible—for the Greek word "kosmos" is not connected with such an idea. On the contrary, the word "world" in the phrase "end of the world," is from the Greek word "aiōn," which though rendered "world," means simply duration, an age. Hence, when our Saviour in explaining the parable of the Wheat and Tares to his disciples, said, "the field is the world," the original word is "kosmos," meaning the literal world on which the men lived, of whom he was speaking—but when, in the same parable, he said, "the harvest is the end of the world," and when, in the parable of the Fishing Net, he said, "so shall it be at the end of the world," the word is "aiōn" in both instances, and means the end of the then existing age. Hence, Dr. Campbell translates the phrase, thus; "the conclusion of this state."

The full explanation of these phrases, however, will be found in the answer to Mat. xxiv: 3, which reads thus:—"Tell us when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming? and of the end of the world?" (aiōn). Now, even if we admit that the last question refers to the end of the physical world, yet there is proof in the 24th chapter of Matthew that no man knows the time of that destruction. Our Saviour said:—"Of that day and hour, knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only." vs. 36. * In the parallel passage, Mark xiii: 32, he declares that he was not acquainted with the time. Now observe the facts in the case. The personages who informed Daniel of the time of those events recorded in his book, upon which Mr. Miller relies, were angels, and the Saviour affirmed that the angels did not know the time of the "end" to which he referred. The book of Revelation, upon which Mr. Miller also relies, was written by one of the disciples who did not know the time of which Jesus speaks. Our Saviour had perfect access to the book of Daniel, and yet he did not know the time—"the end"—of which he himself speaks. Still, modern, uninspired men, pretend to know more than the Saviour, the angels, and the disciples knew, and to define the precise period of time of which Jesus speaks. This fact alone, is sufficient to destroy such fallacious calculations, and to stamp them with absurdity.

But the disciples, in asking for the signs which were to precede the end of the world or age, had not the most distant allusion to the destruction of the earth. They inquired of the Saviour, when the things should be, of which he had just spoken, viz., the punishment of the wicked Jews, and the destruction of their city and temple. They inquired of him, what signs were to precede his coming? They knew that his coming was to be in the then present generation: for he had already told them:—"For the Son of Man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works. Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom." Mat. xvi: 27, 28. The signs which were to precede this coming, not in person, but in power, at the final overthrow of the Jewish state, are so clearly stated in the 24th chapter of Matthew, that they can not well be misunderstood. They then inquired of him the signs which were to precede the "end of the world" or age. MacKnight informs us what the disciples meant by the "end of the world." He says:—"Wherefore, that the everlasting kingdom might be effectually established, it was necessary that Jerusalem and the Jewish state should be destroyed by the Roman armies.

* Mr. Miller's friends object to the force of this passage, by saying that they do not pretend to know the precise day and hour, but only their near approach. But if in prophecy, a day means a year of common time, as they assert, then this means a year, and this hour 15 days of common time, and Mr. Miller does pretend to know the year, if not the very month, when the world will be burned up.

Now, since our Lord foretold this catastrophe..... seeing he told his disciples, vs. 34. 'This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled,' can there be any doubt, that the apostles....' by their master's coming,' and by 'the end of all things,' which they represent as at hand, meant his coming to destroy Jerusalem, and to put an end to the institutions of Moses? It is no objection to this, that when the apostles heard Christ declare, 'There shall not be left here one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down,' they connected the end of the world, or age, with that event; Mat. xxiv: 3, 'Tell us, when shall these things be, and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the age?' For, as the Jewish doctors divided the duration of the world into three ages; the age before the law, the age under the law, and the age of the Messiah; the apostles knew that the age under the law was to end when the age under Messiah began. And therefore, by the end of the age, they meant, even at that time, not the end of the world, but the end of the age under the law, in which the Jews had been greatly oppressed by the heathen." Preface to 2d Thess., Sec. 4. That this is the precise thought which the apostles attached to the phrase "end of the world," is evident from its use in the epistles. Paul, speaking of certain things, said:—"And they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world" (aion) "ARE come." 1 Cor. x: 11. Speaking of the death of Christ, he said:—"But now, once, in the end of the world, (aion), HATH he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." Heb. ix: 26. The apostles lived in the time, when the Mosaic world or age was to be concluded, and it was in the ending of the same world, that the Saviour was crucified, in order that he might save his people from their sins. Referring to the same time, Peter said:—"But the end of all things is at hand." 1 Peter iv: 7. Macknight and Clarke both explain this passage as applicable to the destruction of the Mosaic institutions. And to show that the end of the world or age, was shortly to close, Paul said:—"The night is far spent, the day is at hand." Rom. xiii: 12.

Our Saviour clearly shows that the "end of the world" or age was then nigh its fulfilment. One of the signs which were to precede that one, is this:—"And this Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come." Mat. xxiv: 14. Turn to Coloss. i: 6, and Paul assured the Colossians that the Gospel had come to them, as it had to all the world. He also affirms in vs. 23, that it had been preached to every creature under heaven.—Hence, this sign, as given by our Saviour, was fulfilled in the days of the apostles—and as the end was to come, when that sign was accomplished, it has long since transpired.

Our Saviour has so determined it. He showed his disciples, that the end of the age, his coming in power, and the destruction of the Jewish nation, were then nigh at hand. Hence he said:—"Now learn a parable of the fig-tree; when his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh. So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near at the doors. Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." Mat. xxiv: 32, 33, 34. More positive proof that the "end of the world" or age was to be accomplished before the generation, in which he lived, had passed, could not well be given. Still, notwithstanding these express declarations of our Saviour, people yet persist in applying the phrase "end of the world" to a future time, and thereby produce those feverish and unprofitable excitements, which, when the fire has gone out, leave coldness and infidelity behind them as their legitimate results.

II. There is another class of passages which speak of the stars falling, of the sun failing to give its light, of the heavens passing away, of the earth being on fire, and many other similar expressions, which are relied on as proof of the destruction of the earth. But these expressions, so far from referring to the destruction of the physical heavens and earth, are used in a figurative sense. For no fact is more readily recognized by every careful reader of the Scriptures, than that the sacred writers were constantly in the habit of representing the destruction of nations by commotions in physical nature.

Hence it is said in Isa. xxxiv: 4, 5:—"And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll, and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth from off the vine.....behold it shall come down upon Idumea." The sense of this passage is still farther explained in the same chapter, by the statement, "a great slaughter in the land of Idumea." The reference of the figures here used, can not well be mistaken. By similar figures, the destruction of Babylon is set forth in Isaiah 13th chapter. In the 21st chapter of Luke, in order to show the commotions which were to attend the destruction of the Jewish nation, our Saviour said:—"And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars.....for the powers of heaven shall be shaken." And to prevent all mistake as to the application of this language, he said to his disciples:—"This generation shall not pass away until all be fulfilled." vs. 32. In Mat. xxiv: 29, the language is still stronger:—"Immediately after the tribulation of those days, shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken." Now, not only does Dr. A. Clarke apply this passage to the destruction of the Jewish nation, but our Saviour, as has already been shown, expressly fixes the time of the events thus prefigured, to the then existing generation—or, as he elsewhere expresses it, when speaking of his second coming: "Verily I say unto you, there be some of them that stand here, which shall not taste of death, till they have seen the kingdom of God come with power." Mark ix: 1. These passages are sufficient to induce the greatest caution in applying such figurative expressions to the destruction of the physical heavens and earth—for they may be only expressive of commotions among and the overturn of nations. After an examination of the passages which are supposed to prove that the earth will really be burnt up, I am satisfied that they can not be legitimately so applied, but refer to entirely different subjects. Let us examine two of them.

In Mal. iv: 1, it is said:—"For behold, the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of Hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch." To what period is this language applicable? Mr. Miller affirms that it refers to the time when the earth will be destroyed. Let us appeal to higher authority. In the 5th verse, the prophet said:—"Behold I will send you Elijah before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord." Now, if we can ascertain who was Elijah, we can also ascertain the time of the day spoken of. Our Saviour said to his disciples:—"Elias (Elijah), is come already, and they knew him not, but have done unto him whatsoever they listed. Likewise shall also the Son of Man suffer of them. Then the disciples understood that he spake to them of John the Baptist." Mat. xvii: 12, 13. John the Baptist, who, our Saviour declares, was the promised Elijah, preceded that destruction of the Jewish nation, when the murderers of our Lord were punished and the faithful believers were delivered from the evils which descended on that generation. On the authority, then, of the Saviour and of Malachi, the period of that destruction was "the great and dreadful day of the Lord."

The strongest passage, however, in favor of the destruction of the earth, is found in the 3d chapter of 2 Peter—where the apostle describes the elements as melting with fervent heat and the earth as being burned up by fire. After this description, he says:—"Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." vs. 13. By ascertaining what are the "new heavens and a new earth," we shall at once see what old heavens and earth were to be destroyed. Turn to Isaiah lxxv: 17, and we find the promise:—"Behold, I create new heavens and a new earth.....but ye shall be glad and rejoice forever in that which I create; for behold, I create Jerusalem, a rejoicing and her people a joy." It is evident that the new heavens and earth, and Jerusalem, mean one and the same thing. But that it can not be a place where immortal beings are to dwell, is clear from vs. 21st:—"And they shall build houses and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards and eat the fruit of them." They must be singular immortal beings who require houses to live in, and the fruit of vineyards to eat.

In Rev. xx: 1, 2, it is said:—"And I saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea. And I, John, saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven." That the period was near when this was to take place, is manifest from his statement, "for the time is at hand." By the passing away of the old heaven and earth, John prefigures the destruction of the Jewish nation and covenant—by the new heaven and new earth, and the new Jerusalem, he refers to the Gospel, which came from God, and whose full glory was established on the removal of the Mosaic institutions. Now this destruction of the Jewish nation and covenant, Peter describes by the melting of the heavens and the burning of the earth—thus imitating the Saviour and the prophets who represented the same overthrow by commotions in physical nature. That this interpretation is not peculiar to Universalists, I remark, that the commentators Hammond, Lightfoot, and Cappe, clearly refer it to the abolishment of the Jewish state.

But it may be inquired, if I do not believe that the earth is to be burned up at some time or other. I answer, that the Scriptures preserve a profound silence in regard to the fate of earth—I find nothing in them which proves that it will be destroyed by fire. That the present race of beings will finally terminate, seems to be indicated by the fact, that the time is coming in the reign of the Saviour, when all men will be immortal. Of course, no human beings, as such, will then exist. What will be the fate of the earth, after that period, we have no information. God has not revealed its fate to us. He may place another race, like the present, upon it—or he may refashion it for a higher order of beings. But this is conjecture. And all theories in regard to its ultimate destiny, must, of necessity, be the result of pure speculation—they can not be proved. And to trouble ourselves with the folly of every enthusiast, who pretends to point out the time and manner of its end, no matter howsoever sincere he may be, is as useless as it would be to become excited about what will be the final doom of the sun or of the remotest heavenly body. We know nothing of it—we can not know any thing of it—and to agitate the subject, serves only to gratify a morbid taste for marvelous notions.

III. We proceed now to notice the computation of time, by which it is proved, as is pretended, the earth will be destroyed by fire, in the present year.

In Dan. vii: 13, 14, we are told that the prophet had a vision, in which he was informed that the sanctuary and the host, or the Jewish temple and priesthood, should be trodden under foot 2300 days, after which the sanctuary should be cleansed.—Mr. Miller contends that these 2300 days stand for as many years. By dating these years at the time the decree was given by Artaxerxes, king of Persia, for the Jews, after the Babylonian captivity, to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, which was 457 years before Christ, it brings them down to 1843—for 457 from 2300, leaves 1843.

In Dan. ix: 24, the prophet was informed that 70 weeks were determined on his people and the holy city, to finish the transgression and to make an end of sin. These 70 weeks make 490 days, which, as is asserted, stand for so many years, and which, being dated at the time of the decree of king Artaxerxes, ends then in A. D. 33, or at the crucifixion of Christ. From the crucifixion of Christ to the taking away the daily abomination, which Mr. Miller calls the pagan rites, he makes 475 years. From the taking away of the pagan rites to the setting up the Papal power, he makes 30 years. He then gets 1260 years, by taking the times, time, and half a time, or three and a half years, mentioned in the 12th chapter of Daniel, and making each day stand for a year, and dating them from the setting up of the Papal power. He then obtains 45 years from the destruction of the Papal civil rule, which destruction was accomplished, as he says, by Bonaparte. These added together, make 2300 years from the decree of Artaxerxes to 1843, in which the world is to be destroyed and the saints are to rise from the dead.

This chain is defective, and not to be relied on, for many reasons. By a calculation just as plausible as that of Mr. Miller, Dr. A. Clarke makes the years 2300 end about the 2000th year of Christ—though he thinks that the calculation is not certain. It is also deficient in historical accuracy—for while he dates the taking away of the pagan rites in the Roman empire at the year 508, historians date it at 395, and affirm that the work fully commenced with the first Christian Emperor, Constantine, who was converted from paganism in 313.—Besides, it is not true that the civil rule of the Pope is ended. For, though that rule was suspended by Bonaparte for a certain time, yet, in his own dominions, the Pope is now both a civil and an ecclesiastical ruler, and seems likely to continue such.

But his method of computing time involves errors which lead to the destruction of his calculations. It is admitted on all hands, that four years have been omitted in our Chronology; so that our reckoning, instead of dating at the 1st year of Christ, commenced at his 4th year. Hence the present year, is, in fact 1847. Of course the 2300 years would end in 1839 instead of the present year, and then, the earth ought to have been destroyed. There is another error which is fatal to the whole scheme. The prophetic year contained but 360 days—but since the time of Christ, by a better arrangement, the year contains 365 days and nearly six hours. But Mr. Miller reckons the years from the time of Christ, as prophetic years of 360 days each; thus making a mistake of 5 days and nearly 6 hours in each year; which, in 1843 years, amounts to about 26 years. Add the 4 years of omission, and we have 30 years. Subtract these from 1843, and we have 1813, as the ending of the 2300 years, when the world, if Daniel says any thing about its end, ought to have been burnt up. But it was not destroyed; and it is probable that it will not be so accommodating to the dreaming theories of men, as to cease its duties in the present year.

Mr. Miller assumes, that, in prophecy, a day is to be reckoned as a year. And he quotes three passages to prove that such is the rule to be regarded. But those passages do not sustain him in establishing such a general rule.

The first passage is Gen. xxix: 27, which reads thus:—"Fulfil her week, and I will give thee this also, for the service which thou shalt serve with me yet seven other years." Jacob had served with Laban seven years, that he might receive Rachel as his wife. But Laban deceived him, and gave him her sister Leah. On the complaint of Jacob, Laban told him to fulfil Leah's week of marriage-festivity, which was the custom of that age, and then he might commence another seven years of servitude for Rachel also. The week, then, refers to the marriage-festivity, and not to the seven years which were to follow it. Hence the passage does not appoint a day for a year.

The second passage is found in Num. xiv: 33, 34, where it is said, that for their sins, the children of Israel should wander as many years in the wilderness, as the spies spent days in searching the land of Palestine, viz., 40. But suppose that it had been said, that the Israelites should wander as long as the spies were in searching the land—would any person dream that 40 days meant 40 years? Clearly not. Hence this case, instead of forming a general rule for interpreting Scripture time, is an isolated case of departure from the ordinary mode of reckoning it, sanctioned by Jehovah.

The third passage is in Eze. iv: 5, 6, where it is said that the prophet was directed to lay upon his side a certain number of days, 390, and after that for 40 days—he was directed to make each day a year, as the time of the iniquity of the children of Israel. Now, every one must perceive, that in this instance, a day is not appointed for a year in order to form a general rule for interpreting time, but for this plain reason, viz., that the life-time of the prophet was not of sufficient length for him to lay upon his side the requisite number of years, to set forth the iniquity of the house of Israel. Hence, a day, by divine appointment, was made significant of a year—and the reason of it was well understood.

The first passage then, has no reference to the subject. And the other two, are only isolated cases of departure from the ordinary mode of reckoning time, and therefore have no bearing on the question.

The prophet Daniel no where states that the times mentioned in his book, are to be taken a day for a year. Indeed, Mr. Miller would not dare to apply such a rule to all the periods spoken of by Daniel. For instance—it is said of Nebuchadnezzar in Dan. iv: 32, that he should be driven from among men, by reason of his insanity, and should eat grass like an ox, for seven times, or years. Seven times 360 days make 2520 days or years. According to this, the king will not cease to eat grass like an ox, until over 100 years after the earth is destroyed by fire! The antediluvians were told that at the end of 120 years, the flood should come.—Reckon 360 days to a year, and it makes 43,200 years. According to this calculation, the flood has not yet transpired. It is said, in reference to the flood, that it should rain 40 days and nights, which we must understand to mean 40 years. Rather a long rain, certainly! The prophet Elijah said that no rain should fall on Israel for three years, or 1080 years. And what renders it more ridiculous, is, that king Ahab was to live sufficiently long to see rain fall once more.

A rule could not be devised, which would more effectually turn the Bible into ridicule, and stamp it with the seal of shameless fable? If it be said, that the rule is not to be so extensively applied, the answer is decisive, that if an individual has a right to apply the rule to any passages he pleases, in order to establish a favorite theory, then the skeptic has also the right to apply the rule to all the periods of time mentioned in the Scriptures, in order to prove Revelation unworthy of credence.

That Daniel did not make a day stand for a year, and that he reckoned time in the ordinary way, is evident from this consideration, that the events to which he referred have long since transpired.

In the 9th chapter Daniel was meditating upon the 70 years of Babylonian captivity which his people were then suffering. An angel then told him of another period of time, when another important event was to transpire. In vs. 24, he says:—"Seventy weeks are determined, &c. (See the passage.)" Professor Stuart informs us, that the Hebrew, literally translated, instead of "seventy weeks," should read "seventy sevens"—"seventy sevens," not of days, but of years. It is well known, that the Jews had weeks of years, as well as of days—for, under their institutions, they were to cultivate their land six years, and then they were to suffer the land to rest one year, which was its sabbath. So Daniel speaks of weeks of years, or "seventy sevens" of years, viz., 490 years. Now these years, dated at the time king Artaxerxes gave forth the decree for the restoration of Jerusalem, viz., 457 years before Christ, end in the times of the Messiah, when, by his sacrifice, he established the power which is ultimately to finish sin, and when the Jewish nation was desolated by the Roman armies. And though there is some difficulty in accurately applying the periods into which the angel cuts up the "seventy sevens" of years, yet the current of the latter part of the chapter, shows that such is the reference.

In the 8th chapter of Daniel, the prophet had a vision of the Median and Persian Empires. He then saw a he-goat, by whom Alexander the Great is intended, who conquered the Medo-Persian Empire. He then saw four horns springing from the horn of the he-goat, which four horns represent the four kingdoms which were established by four generals, out of the empire of Alexander, after his death. Out of one of these, there sprang a little horn. This was Antiochus Epiphanes, who ascended the throne of Syria in the second century before Christ. He most cruelly oppressed the Jews. Of the continuation of this oppression, Daniel was informed, when he was told that it should be 2300 days—thus showing that his rule over the Jews was about 6 years, 4 months, and 20 days. During the latter part of these 2300 days, the "time, times, and half a time," spoken of in Dan vii: 25, of three years and a half, transpired. These three years and a half commenced in the year 168 before Christ. Antiochus, at this time, sent his general Apollonius to plunder Jerusalem—which he did with the greatest cruelty. The daily sacrifice in the temple was taken away—all worship was stopped—the Jews were made to eat the flesh of swine—and an idol was introduced into the temple, to which worship was offered. This pagan army is called by the prophet, "the abomination that maketh desolate." This same period of three and a half years, is also spoken of in Daniel 12th chapter. In 165 before Christ, Judas Maccabeus, the renowned defender of the Jews, obtained possession of the city and temple, so that the abomination that maketh desolate ceased to have power at the end of three and a half years. But as it took Judas some time to cleanse the temple and restore the worship of God, the prophet, in chapter xii: 11, states the whole time to be 1290 days, which exceeds the three and a half years by 30 days. In chapter xii: 12, it is said:—"Blessed is he that waiteth, and cometh to the thousand, three hundred, five and thirty days." Antiochus Epiphanes, having heard of the success of Judas Maccabeus over his troops, was enraged, and started for the purpose of destroying the Jews. But while on his way, he was taken sick, and died a little time after the close of the three and a half years. Then, those who had lived through the tremendous persecutions to which they had been subjected, were blessed, in the fact that the death of the tyrant who had oppressed them, exempted them from farther war and persecution.

Thus we discover that the 2300 days, instead of being so many years, ending in 1843, as Mr. Miller asserts, are so many days designating the full time of the oppression of the Jews by Antiochus, ending in the year 165 before Christ.

Another fact is well worthy of notice. Antiochus undoubtedly set up the "abomination that maketh desolate," or the army and heathen sacrifices, by which he so bitterly persecuted the Jews. And because similar events were to happen near to his own time, our Saviour applies the language of Daniel to the Roman Army, who were to destroy Jerusalem. Hence he said to disciples:—"When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place,.....then let them which be in Judea, flee into the mountains." Mat. xxiv: 15, 16. In the 21st of Luke, this desolating abomination is called the Roman Armies, and the holy place, Jerusalem. Yet, notwithstanding the express language of the Saviour, the system we are examining, makes the abomination of desolation to mean the Papal power. A more unwarranted assumption can not well be conceived.

The periods of time spoken of in Revelation, have no more reference to the destruction of the earth, than those mentioned in Daniel. Though many commentators place the writing of the book of Revelation after the destruction of Jerusalem, yet many place it before that event. And that it was so written, is evident from the fact, that the temple must have been standing when John wrote, because he frequently referred to that building. No one can read the book attentively without discovering, that the main subjects of which the Revelator treats, are, a bitter persecution of Christians and their deliverance from it, the destruction of the Jewish nation, and the full establishment of the "New Jerusalem" or the Gospel. Consequently, the periods of time he mentions, refer to those events, and not to Bonaparte, the Pope, and the burning of the earth. That these events were to be accomplished near to the time in which he wrote, is clear from his declarations in the first and last chapters, that these things were shortly to come to pass; for, says he, "the time is at hand."

Thus, as far as the limits of one discourse will permit, we have examined the system which places the destruction of the earth in 1843. And not only do we find its main proof failing in it, but we discover that its rule of making a day stand for a year, is wholly without foundation, and that, if admitted, it turns the Bible into nonsense. It is no difficult matter to make a system which will prove that the earth is to be burned up at any and at all times, if we concede to dreaming enthusiasts the right of making the Bible mean what they please, and of referring parts of it to local events, to which it has no particular allusion whatever. But such dreaming is always fraught with evil. And the result of the present excitement will be, that when its followers shall perceive the deception under which they are now laboring, many of them will throw away the Bible as unworthy of their faith.

It is in these excitements, somewhat as it is in business-speculation, All at once, from a variety of causes, by startling theories, and by terrific representations of the near approach of the burning of the earth, masses of people become thrilled with fear, and animated by animal excitement, rush with ignorant zeal into the propagation of the new creed. But when the storm is past, then the extreme follows. Many become bankrupt in reason—many lose what little religion they had, and descend into the poverty of skepticism, and live without hope and without God in the world.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

'Oh my loved country! First among the lands!
First among the nations! Red with shame!
A gory scapere dripping in thy hands,
A clot of human blood upon thy name!
My country,—Oh my country!—shall thy fame
Go forth to unborn myriads, dyed in gore,
And History, with pen of scorn, proclaim
With what a deadly guilt thy cup runs o'er—
How chains corrode thy nerves, and gibbets line thy shore?

Awful the crime of murder,—yet 'tis thine!
Written with blood the fearful record stands—
Malice aforethought! Coolly, line by line,
The dread decree was written by thy hands.
In vain thou throwest the crime on other lands,
In vain wouldst lade meek Justice with thy guilt;
Right in the face of Heaven's sublime commands,
Thou on her altars human blood hast spilt,
And batted the avenging sword deep to its iron hilt!

Justice abhors the gory offering laid
With sanctimonious hand upon her shrine;
And thou, my country, wilt be doubly paid,
Whatever plea thy cruel laws assign.
Crime shall rise up, and with a face supine,
Shall mock thy power, and laugh thy threats to scorn;
Murder will light her hellish fires by thine,
And social Hate, of legal Vengeance born,
Will stand, thy household god, with reeking dagger drawn!

Oh, wash thy hands! It ill becomes a queen,
So mighty and so beautiful as thou,
To sit amid her court in robes unclean,
With Freedom's crown upon her youthful brow.
The mighty should be merciful, and bow
In angel pity to the sons of crime;
Should chasten for their profit; for the vow
Of "blood for blood" was writ in olden time,
Ere, with the creed reversed, CHRIST came, in love sublime.

Blot from thine archives, regal one, the page
Smeared with the blood of many a human heart,
And let the spirit of this Christian age
Its law of kindness to thy code impart.
For, beautiful and honored as thou art,
The eye of love turns drooping aside,
To hide, in secret shame, the tears that start
From the deep springs of wounded filial pride.
To see such guilt in one for whom our fathers died.

AN EXTRACT FROM THE JOURNAL OF A SCHOOL TEACHER.

Br. Grosh—Our opposers, finding they can not put down Universalism by Scripture, scandal or perversion, have tried persecution. No one has suffered more of their sectarian bitterness than the teacher of youth, who believes in the restitution. The following dialogue, as near as I can recollect, took place between myself and two Trustees of a school, for which I had applied.

November 5th.—R. Good morning, Mr. M. I have called according to agreement, to see if you have concluded to hire me to teach your school this winter.

M. During your absence, we have improved every opportunity to ascertain your character, and your ability to instruct and govern a school, and we are perfectly satisfied that you possess those qualifications; but before we consent to hire you, we wish to know whether you belong to any religious society.

R. I do not.

M. I do not wish to send my children to a teacher who does not belong to some religious society. I want them to go to a school where they can learn something that will do them some good in eternity.

R. I consider it my duty to teach science and morality, and prepare the youth to become good and wise citizens. There are houses prepared for religious worship, and ministers to teach in them. A father can teach his children such religious views as he thinks proper; and on Sunday, he can take them to church, and have them instructed from the pulpit.

M. I do not want sectarian views taught in the school, but I wish to have the principles of "vital piety" taught, viz., rewards and punishments in a future state, and the endless misery of the "finally impenitent."

R. That puts me in mind of a person, who would not send his boy to school, because the teacher did not belong to some orthodox society. He probably was too negligent to instruct his own child in religion, and wished to have others do it; for, the next Sunday after, he and his boy attended church, and while he sat in one of the front slips below, "nodding assent to every sentence the preacher uttered;" his boy was seated on the floor in the back part of the gallery, playing cards with his associate!

M. I generally take my children into the slip with myself. What is your opinion of religion?

R. "Pure and undefiled religion" is the greatest blessing ever bestowed upon man; it is a guide to youth, a solace to old age and, it "Will throw a bright radiance round the cold tomb,

And light up its vaults with an immortal bloom."

M. What is your belief?

R. I believe that God "will have all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth."

M. I think Mr. R. is a Universalist; I do not wish to have any more conversation with him on the subject; and I shall not consent to have him teach our school. What is your opinion, Mr. D.?

D. I agree with you.

November 6th.—An affectionate friend of the Methodist faith called on me this morning, when the following conversation took place.

H. Did you engage the school in the village of —?

R. No, Sir.

H. Why?

R. Because I did not believe in endless misery.

H. It is just as I have told you before, and as long as you embrace Universalism, you will meet with persecution and disappointment. The doctrine is not only erroneous but unpopular; and what makes it worse is, there are many, who knowing your moral worth and excellence, will think that you are safe enough, and will copy your example; and by that means be led down to the regions of endless despair. If you wish to be respected by the Christian world, and be successful in all your endeavors to obtain employment, renounce your Universalism, and embrace some more popular doctrine.

R. Deal out the cup of poverty to me, and I will drink it to its very dregs without a murmur, before I will sell my Saviour for thirty pieces of silver.

H. If you can not give up your belief, say nothing about it, and if they ask you concerning your faith, evade the question.

R. Give up my belief in a world's redemption for the soul-withering doctrine of endless misery! I had rather "be a dog and bay the moon than such a" coward. Deny my faith in the Restitution! I can not deny myself of that solace of my remaining years, which will

"When all other comforts cease—
Like a kind angel whisper peace,
And smooth the bed of death"

H. I see you are so bent in your way, there is no use in saying any more about it. ROLAND.

REFLECTIONS OF DEATH.

"I looked along the laughing earth,
Up the blue heavens, and through the middle air,
Joyfully ringing with the gay birds song,
And wept! I thought how sad for one so young,
To bid farewell to so much happiness."

When we are called upon to bid adieu to our near and dear friends in the morning of life, around whose hearts the spell of affection has entwined a wreath of friendship that grows brighter and brighter as life's busy scene wears away, our minds are naturally led to reflect on the various vicissitudes and changes to which human life is subject. The uncertainty of life, and the certainty of death, are then brought before us in their awful reality; and our thoughts are naturally directed to the boundless eternity that lies beyond, where all is darkness and doubt, save to him whose mind is enlightened by the Christian religion, which alone, in such seasons of darkness and distress, is capable of giving consolation and support to the lacerated bosom. This with an eye of faith, enables us to look beyond the dim vista of this world, to that heaven where we soon shall meet our departed friends, to spend an eternity together. There are many things that bind the young to earth, especially in those seasons of the year when nature is decked in its most beautiful apparel, when bloom and fragrance are scattered profusely in all her bowers, when a thrill of joy runs through our bosoms at the sight of all things grand, and animating in creation; at such seasons it seems hard for the young to bid farewell to the fading scenes of earth; at such periods we perceive the utmost necessity of having the mind well supported by that faith which points him to the region of happiness awaiting him. How cheering the thought to behold the young when struggling on the bed of death, calmly and resignedly trusting to the allwise Disposer of human events, to whom death has no terrors, and who can look beyond the dark valley and shadow of death, to the bright resurrection morn, and can say in the language of the Poet,

"I bow my soul to the will of Heaven,
O death! and not to thine!"

May all then see the necessity of arming themselves with such a faith, as will yield them consolation in prosperity as well as in adversity, and which will support them in all the transient scenes through which they may be called to pass in this everchanging state.

Fathers, has it been your lot to part with your sons, and follow them to the cold and silent tomb—mothers, do you cast an anxious and imploring look to yonder grave-yard, where lie the slumbering remains of a once blooming daughter—brother, have you been called to bid adieu to an amiable and gentle-hearted sister—sister, do you mourn the loss of an affectionate brother? Oh, may the Christian's faith be yours. May your minds, although tossed about on the billows of affliction, be sustained and comforted by the blissful assurance of a happy reunion, where death no more shall enter to harass our feelings, and where parting shall be no more. This will render pleasant the rough stream of life, sustain you while on the couch of sickness, and enable you to shout as the spirit leaves the body, and wends its way to the mansions above, "Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." We close in the language of the Poet,—

"Hope looks beyond the bounds of time,
Where what we now deplore,
Shall rise in full, immortal prime,
And bloom to fade no more."

HAUNTED HOUSES.

The age of imaginary witches, ghosts, hobgoblins, etc., has passed way, and the age of telling about them, too, has nearly passed. We now hear only occasionally a story of the kind, which, traced to its source proves to be nothing more than a white goose, spotted cow or some thing equally innocent and useful. But there are some few (would there were fewer!) ignorant mothers, who endeavor to frighten their children into submission, by relating some of the impossible bug-bears which answer their purpose only till the rashness of the child proves it to be false, then a new story must be invented ten times more improbable than the first.

But haunted houses are now more in vogue than witches. Poor puss in her nightly peregrinations, often acts upon the superstitious until they walk their own rooms with fear and trembling. And sometimes an object with no power of locomotion whatever has the same effect, that is on the imagination. Of this we have an instance. An old lady, who thinks herself a very good Presbyterian, once told us that her brother, a good Universalist, presented her with "Morse and Lee's Discussion;" she took it to oblige him, but had not opened the book nor would not; that she put it in the drawer under her towels and locked it there, and added with much mincing and twisting, that "I—I really felt as though I could not sleep night's with it in the house." Whether the good lady ever destroyed the apparition we know not, but should think it had made no very sensible effect on her, as she appears as hale in both body and mind as ever.

INCIDENT.

Cold and wintry. Was travelling a few miles. Stepped into a licensed tavern to warm because there was no other convenient place. Landlord extremely gentlemanly—asked a thousand questions concerning the uncomfortableness of travelling in the inclemency without—then stepped around behind the bar, as much as to say, "Sir, I am ready now—and do be so kind as to come up and pay me for my civility." Ah, that singular wink was in his eye. Good, my dear fellow, but don't you see the trick in the trade is discoverable? Saw a man step up to the bar—poured down one, two, three—didn't count any more. His companions were there, all jovial. A child came—poor, cold, shivering, in tattered rags. "Father, will you come here a minute to the door?" The inebriate looked, and his companions laughed. "Father, another wants—" "Hush!" said the father. "Oh father, mother—" "Away!" said the father. He went, and oh, there stood the landlord and the drunken parent. The boy was followed home, by a hand to aid. Poor thing! well might he say "mother," in appeal to that father, who knew the misery of his deserted home. "She lay there a spectacle of—what? Her vow to an intemperate man. But love was still there. Her husband came. He was sober, and was pointed to the wife and mother and the little sufferers there. She spoke kindly. The wretched man cried, and vowed again. His wife and children wept for joy, and he in penitence.—The landlord heard of all, and thought, and thought, till his bar was out, his custom too, and his sign came down; and that is now a bright little village of reformation. ### CAN A UNIVERSALIST BE A CHRISTIAN?

It is said, that with our faith, we can not be Christians. Why? It is affirmed by an apostle—"Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is born of God." 1 John v: 1. No person will deny, that if an individual is "born of God," he is a Christian. We most devoutly believe that "Jesus is the Christ." In him centre all our hopes of salvation—around him cluster all our expectations of another life; purer, holier, and better than the present life. We believe all his instructions—we believe all that the author of the passage has said of our blessed Lord. In chapter ii: 1, 2, it is written:—"If any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world." In chapter iv: 14, it is written:—"And we have seen, and do testify, that the Father sent the Son, the Saviour of the world." This we believe—and that our faith is right, is evident from chapter v: 10, 11:—"He that believeth on the Son of God, hath the witness in himself; he that believeth not God, hath made him a liar, because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son. And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son." God hath prepared eternal life for all—this life is in his Son, or is given to men by that Son—and that it is for all, is evident from the fact that Jesus tasted death for every man—and all that is necessary, in order that men may receive it, is to prepare men for it, by salvation and righteousness. Now, if an individual refuses to believe that God has given him eternal life in his Son, he makes God a liar, by refusing to believe the record of this fact. But we firmly believe the record of this all-glorious truth—and the rest and joy which our faith imparts to us, is the witness within us, that we rightly believe on the Son of God. Now, so far as believing in Christ is concerned, there is no proof from the Scriptures, that we should be denied the Christian name. Nay, our faith is broader and more comprehensive than that which other people cherish—for we believe that the full object for which Christ died, shall be accomplished—and as he is "the ransom for all, to be testified in due time," so he will "see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied." There can be no failure of the object of his mission. So we believe—so we preach—and so we trust in God and the Saviour.

On what other grounds can we be denied the Christian name? This leads us to inquire, what besides this; composes the Christian character. On this point, the Scriptures must be our guide—for there is our light and direction. Our Saviour said to his followers:—"By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." John xiii: 35. Again he said to them:—"Herein is my father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples....if ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love; even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love." John xv: 8, 10. Again he said:—"He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me." John xiv: 21. And it is a rule clearly laid down in the Scriptures, that in judging of men as the disciples of Christ, we must judge them by their works. Jesus said that false prophets should be known by their fruits. As the apostle said:—"Doth a fountain send forth at the same place, sweet water and bitter? Can a fig-tree, my brethren, bear olive-berries? either a vine, figs? so can no fountain yield salt water and fresh. Who is a wise man and endued with knowledge among you? let him show out of a good conversation, his works with meekness of wisdom." James iii: 11, 12, 13. If we pluck fruit from a tree, and find it bitter and unpleasant to the taste, we correctly decide that the tree is bad—if we pluck fruit from another tree, and find the fruit pleasant and desirable to the taste, we also judge correctly, that the tree is good. No evil tree produces good fruit—no good tree produces bad fruit. So no man, whose passions are ungoverned, whose spirit is revengeful, and whose conduct is sinful, is a disciple of Christ, or a Christian. But he, who to his faith in Christ, adds holiness, righteousness, virtue, is a disciple of the Saviour. Thus we see, that to be born of God, to be a disciple of Christ, or to be a Christian, we must love one another, and obey the commandments of God. And actions form the rule of judgment—for this is a certain rule—one which can not be mistaken—and one which speaks truly.

But in these days, we have a different test. Now, it is faith—belief in a particular creed—it is not so much an exact attention to the conduct; a perfect conformity of the life to the requirements of the Saviour; and the exercise of a piety which breathes good will and kindness; as it is zeal for a sect; the reception of certain articles of faith, which fallible men have pronounced divine. Have these requisites, and then persons are esteemed Christians. But if other persons see fit to reject creeds altogether, and to rely solely on the Bible for their faith, then they are denounced as anti-Christians, no matter how pure their conduct, how strong their benevolence, nor how admirable their example.

Not so in the days of the Saviour—virtuous lives were the test in deciding the sincerity of Christian profession. The reason of this, is obvious. An individual may profess to be a Christian, and yet be corrupt at heart, having assumed that profession, in order to carry out schemes of wickedness with greater impunity and success. But when an individual professes to be a Christian, and when his actions correspond with his profession, and in labors of love, mercy, and virtue, he shows that he has been taught in the school of his master, then there can be no doubt of the truth or reality of that person's being a Christian.

Now, if our lives correspond to this test, there can be reason for denying us the Christian name. That there are some in the denomination, who do not live up to their profession, we readily admit—that we are all imperfect, we as readily admit. But if we are to be judged by this, as undeserving of the Christian name, what will become of other sects, if they are tried in the same way? For where is the sect that is not made up of fallible human nature, and which has not members whose conduct is any thing but that which belongs to the Christian? We claim to make the instructions of our Lord, the guide of our lives; and if we strive to obey them, though we may sometimes fail in some parts of our duty, yet we may claim to be followers of Jesus.

But still, notwithstanding all this, they will continue to deny us the Christian name. So be it. We thank God that we can appeal to higher authority than that of man. If men had power, their passions and prejudices would fill earth and heaven with gloom. They denounce others, who differ from them, with endless woe; but well is it for us, that supreme power rests in a higher and wiser source. Men can talk—but their jurisdiction extends not into the spiritual world—there they have not the prerogative of executing the woes which they pronounce on their fellow-beings in this life. And praise be to Him who, like a kind and vigilant Father, watches over us all, the spirit which gives utterance to denunciation, will be thrown off with the flesh which clogs the soul, and will never be permitted to weigh down the mind when it rises into the pure air of immortal glory—it will give place to the noble disposition of the angels, who, instead of uttering words of wrath, rejoice over even one sinner that repenteth. Most precious is this admirable truth!

I said that there is higher authority to appeal to, than that of man—it is that righteous Father who judgeth justly. Men may speak of us harshly, and deny us the Christian name—but God looks at the motives and conduct, and if they are right, that person receives his blessing, no matter what may be the name of his sect. Hence, when the prophet Samuel was sent to anoint one of the sons of Jesse, as king, in place of Saul, God said to him:—"Look not on his countenance, or on the height of his stature; because I have refused him; for the Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart." 1 Sam. xvi: 7. Hence, it is true now, as it was, when Hagar, in the time of Abraham, said in the wilderness, "Thou God seest me." He can not be mistaken. And if we truly believe that Jesus is the Christ—if we trust in him for salvation—if we strive to conform our lives to the great principles of the Gospel—if we cherish that love which the Gospel inspires—he knows that we are born of him, and by faith and virtue, have entered into the kingdom of heaven. Nor can aught which men can say, deprive us of justification in his sight—for, as he has declared that he will recompense the righteous in the earth, so shall we find his word true.

This is the course we should pursue—and in time, it will live down all opposition, and deprive prejudice of its venomous sting; when people will judge us, not simply by our faith, but by our conduct. For in the practice of the great requirement, "do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with thy God," there is a divine power which will overcome the Satan of narrow feelings, of unjust slander, and compel people to observe the pure charity which emanated from God. G. W. M.

POPULAR ADMISSIONS... NO. III.

HOLINESS AND HAPPINESS.

A Scripture doctrine is, that without following peace and holiness, no man can see the Lord. But with that mistaken eagerness which so often accompanies zeal without knowledge, Limitarians have attached a meaning to this, which a little consideration would teach them was far from consistent with other parts of their doctrine. They insist upon it, that it teaches, that without holiness here, in this life, no man can see the Lord hereafter; that is, in the future state. And they insist upon introducing this nursing of partialist exegesis to our notice as often as occasion will allow. Well, so be it.

But let us see how long they will be willing to stand on this foundation. Without holiness in this life, no man can see the Lord in the future life. Of course, then, they must give up their doctrine of a future general judgment day, for this doctrine stands exactly, and irreconcilably opposed to the sentiment which we are considering. And yet these two doctrines, form essential parts of what, at this day, would fain exalt itself into orthodoxy! Just look at it. The Scripture says the Lord himself shall descend with a shout. And Partialism says this refers to the last day, when God comes in judgment, to revive the dead and receive the living, and when that day comes, all eyes will see him, and both small and great will stand before him—the saints to rejoice, the sinful to be abashed and confounded. Here, then, while listening to this popular feature of the popular doctrine, we are calmly assured that all will see the Lord. And yet in the very next breath we are assured, by the authority of the same doctrine, that there are some who will never see the Lord. If any man should advocate, or recommend to our notice, a system of political economy as glaringly contradictory as is this theology, we would think him a fool. And yet thousands swallow it, and call it truth!

"O, but you mistake us," says Mr. Orthodoxy. Seeing the Lord, means, enjoying the Lord. And we only say that those who are not holy in this life, can not enjoy the Lord in the future state. This is the true ground." Well, this is considerable of a change, from the sentiment with which we started. Let us see how long it will last. Come forward, ye candidates for future glory, and tell me who, among you, are now as holy as you must be, in order to enjoy the Lord in heaven. Wait a moment, till I mention two thoughts. Partialism says there is no change after death, and he who is not holy here, can not enjoy the Lord hereafter. And the Bible says no man liveth and sinneth not. Now answer my question—Who, from the youth, to the aged closing his eyes in death, is fitted for heaven? What, all silent! Yes, every mouth shall be stopped, and every tongue dumb before God. And yet, the advocate of the above doctrine, is led by his creed to expect either an election to life, or a preparation for heaven by grace. So, Mr. Orthodox, you are again at loggerheads with your own creed. It seems to me that the advocates of the Partialist creeds ought to explain this matter, unless they mean to stick to their contradictions.

At this stage of our inquiry we shall be told that we have not sufficiently regarded the substance of Partialism. It finds some men very sinful all their days, and they continue stubborn till death. Hence it is concluded that they will be always sinful. If so, they can not be happy; for no unholiness can ever enter heaven. Some opposer will tell us that this is his true position—when it is said that without holiness no man can see the Lord, the substantial doctrine is, that sinfulness can not exist in heaven. This is pretty near the truth. But let it be compared with another portion of Partialism. The devil was once a holy angel—so we are told. He was in heaven, too. And while there, he rebelled against God, and became so sinful that God was obliged to cast him and his companions out of heaven, to prevent a universal rebellion. Now, then, according to this system, sin was very extensive in heaven, and yet the same system would pretend that a man who has been a sinner here can not enter there. If sin could once enter heaven, without the influence of precedent, I should like to know what security we have against the occurrence of a like event again, among those who have been sinful before they left the earth. Or if sin can not enter heaven, I should like to know how the doctrine of holy angels rebelling against God in heaven, came among the creeds of men. It is high time that American Orthodoxy got rid of these contradictions.

There is one way that they may be disposed of—and I know of but one way. It is true that sin can not enter heaven; and more than this—it never did. It is true that the sinner, wherever he is, can not enjoy God, while he continues to be a sinner. And it is as true, that mankind will not be always sinful. The doctrine of the Bible is, that "every tongue shall confess, surely shall say in the Lord have I righteousness and strength." In the proposition of this paragraph there is no contradiction. Would it not, then, be preferable to take the doctrine of the Bible, instead of the contradictions of men?

AMUSEMENTS.

He who will qualify himself for the task, will see that all actions—all amusements—all pursuits and all enjoyments, should be regarded in the light of utility. What good will they effect?—how much will they promote health and enjoyment without working injury? What knowledge will they promote?—how much light will they shed abroad in the world, without decreasing its pure happiness? What moral results will they produce?—how much will they enhance spiritual enjoyment?—how much promote holiness and well doing, without detracting from any pleasures, any knowledge, any affections consistent therewith? These should be the tests by which to determine the utility of every pursuit, every action, every mode of thought in which man feels a desire to engage.

And so far as each individual is concerned, their sinfulness or moral desert, must be ascertained by the motives from which spring the actions which will bear these tests. A useful pursuit—whether physical, mental or moral—engaged in from pure motives, can not be injurious to man—is not forbidden—nay, is even required by Christianity.

The "mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus," was "in all points tempted as we are, yet without sin." His example warrants us in declaring that his religion is perfectly adapted to man as he is, and for man in this world, where he exists. He wore the dress, he observed the manners, he followed the customs of his age and nation. He ate, and drank and slept—he had his social and domestic attachments; and the most tender scenes of his life were those in which he manifested his friendship for his apostles, for Mary and Martha, and Lazarus, for the beloved John—and his filial affection for his mother was evinced in the midst of his expiring agonies on the cross.

He was not insensible to the beauties of nature, nor to her vast and awful sublimities; for he almost always mounted an overlooking eminence when he chose to address a multitude, and frequently appealed to natural objects around him, as the lily of the valley, the birds of the air, the currents of wind, the waves of the sea, the bubbling spring, in words of admiring praise, in illustration and proof of his doctrines. The works of art in the temple and in the city of Jerusalem, we have reason to believe, engaged his attention, and awakened pleasurable emotions in his soul—for it is generally believed that from a gorgeous vine made of the most costly and precious jewels and metals, and fastened in the temple, he drew the beautiful lesson of the vine—the true vine and its husbandman. The gardens around Jerusalem were his favorite resorts—the awful mountain height, capped with the cerulean vault, and gemmed with the stars of heaven; was to him a favorite retreat for prayer and meditation.

May we not suppose, that these beautiful and glorious evidences of God's wisdom, goodness and power, aided in inspiring with deeper and more fervent reverence the bosoms of even our Saviour and his followers?

Perfumes were delightful to him, or he would not have received complacently the bathing of his feet with the precious spikenard, by the humble Mary Magdalene. Even music and dancing, and the hilarities of a Jewish wedding, considered by so many religionists of our day as so exceedingly sinful and irreligious, were named and witnessed by him with evident delight and approbation.

If, then, the Son of God, who by his very mission and lonely station of pre-eminent duty, was cut off, as it were, from participation in the enjoyments and social intercourse of the world around him—if, even he, delighted in the pleasures with which music, and nature's beauties, and art's graces and wonders regale the senses of man—if he admired the varied hues of nature's robe, and the splendors and sublimities of her form—if he mingled in the social festivities and amusements of his people, with a holy participation—if he indulged in the affections of our nature with purity of feeling—surely we do not sin in reverently and gratefully imitating his pure example. Surely, also, the religion given to us through such a social, intelligent and refined mind, does not forbid any enjoyments and amusements that are beneficial to body, mind or morals, and that are rightly conducted, and engaged in with pure motives—motives in accordance with the dictates of reason, and in agreement with the moral sentiments.

That these amusements are often abused—perverted from useful objects, can not be denied; and when so abused and perverted, they should indignantly be frowned on, and be most righteously condemned. But, I maintain, we should ever carefully distinguish between them and their abuse—between the useful, and the useless or the injurious.

A DOZEN QUESTIONS.

1. If man is admitted into heaven hereafter, did God, who knew the end from the beginning, ever design endless wrath for him?
2. If the same man should disbelieve the doctrine of endless wrath, would he be damned therefor, in case that damnation was not designed for him?
3. If damnation was designed for him, could he escape it by believing in it?
4. What effect, then, can man's belief or unbelief have upon his final destiny?
5. If God built a hell for some, and a certain part of mankind go there, did God know beforehand that they would go there? Yes, or No?
6. If yes, will their belief in the doctrine of endless torments for some, save them?
7. If no, may not God learn something from their unbelief and final damnation, which He did not know before, and which will cause him to regret that he ever built a hell for any body?
8. If the devil succeeds in his stratagems against the final holiness and happiness of great numbers of the human family, will Christ see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied? Yes, or No?
9. If yes, did Christ travail (that is labor) to seek and save that which was lost, or to help the devil to subjects?
10. If no, will not the disappointment of the Father be equal to the dissatisfaction of the Son?
11. Is Christ the fulness of that mind which is filled with sin?
12. If sin lives endlessly in any one mind, can God ever be ALL IN ALL?

THE FREEDOM OF CHRIST.

"Verily, verily, I say unto you, whosoever committeth sin, is the servant of sin. And the servant abideth not in the house forever; but the Son abideth ever. If the Son, therefore, shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed."

John viii: 34-36.

The allusion here, is probably to the system of servitude, and the rights and powers of servants among the Jews. The servant did not reside perpetually, or always, in the house of the Jewish master—the year of jubilee, or term of service expired, and set him free. The servant had, therefore, no part or lot in the family inheritance, and could not finally dispose of it. As an overseer duly appointed, he could direct the labor of other servants under him, but could not entirely free them. But the son of a family is a perpetual resident in his father's house—he has a part in the inheritance, and a voice in its disposal, and can set entirely free any servant falling to his lot.

Whether Jesus contrasted himself with Moses, as the servant of God in giving the Law, or with sin personified, as the temporary and unlawful task master over the servants under its authority, the comparison is equally just, true, and honorable to the divinely appointed Redeemer. To the Son, only, do the children of men rightfully belong. All other powers and authorities into whose possession any of the human race may fall for a time, have no part or lot in their proper ownership, and therefore no right to dispose, finally, of a single soul of the race of Adam. Under the providence and wise permission of God, they are servants in authority, but have no final disposal of those in their possession. But Jesus is the appointed and lawful heir of all things. He can make free, indeed—the liberty he bestows is according to the perfect law of the divine government, and all freed by him are perfectly free and perfectly obedient—enjoy perfect liberty to do what they please, because they please to do only what is right. And this freedom he confers on his disciples by making known unto them the truth respecting the right and the good.

The Jews were in bondage to the cumbersome rites and ceremonies of their Law—a bondage the more oppressive, because they rested in the letter of the Law, to the great neglect of its spirit—in the mere performance of its ceremonies, to the neglect of what those ceremonies were intended to effect in the present time, or to foreshadow in the future. And by thus resting in the externals and letter of their law, they confined their minds to a very narrow range of knowledge, and their hearts to an equally limited sphere of affection and sympathy, and were thus the servants of ignorance, including in this term prejudice and superstition.

Ignorance is the parent of sin—not total ignorance, but that partial knowledge of some subjects and partial ignorance of others, which unitedly render the sinner's mind misty, and cause all acts and consequences to appear to him inverted in size, distance and appearances. And the Jewish mind being thus effectually rendered misty by the addition of human traditions and heathen fables to their imperfectly revealing Law, they were peculiarly under the bondage of sin—of error in theory and error in practice; for the latter is often the consequence of the former. It was therefore highly necessary that the Jews should not only hear the words of Jesus, but abide and continue in them (verse 31)—grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour—and then would they know the truth so experimentally and convincingly that it would make them free.

To CORRESPONDENTS.—J. D., of Lockport, (letter mailed at Gasport, Feb. 24th,) is informed that his strictures on the remarks of C. H. in the Luminary, on the temperance test of the U. S. Convention, can not appear in our columns for several reasons—1. He did not pay his postage. 2. He does not give us his name—a requisition which correspondents should never forget. (If they do not wish their names to appear, they can say so, and we will not betray their confidence.) 3. It would be more correct and fair to publish the reply in the same paper where the remarks appeared. 4. We do not think it profitable to revive the subject, as that resolution of the U. S. Convention died as soon as born, and has been duly dissected and buried, and will hardly be raised from the dead again to scare people into the temperance ranks in these Washingtonian days. Let it rest in peace, poor thing; for it was born in an earthquake, and cradled in a storm—from earth it came, and to dust it has returned!

We have several communications on hand which need considerable preparation before the compositors will be able to read them, and our old affliction of pain in the left side will not allow us to take hold of much writing. We hope the writers will have as much patience with our delay as it requires to read their manuscripts—if so, there will be no grumbling for some time yet!

There are several sermons and long articles on hand which go off but slowly, for we can not publish more than one in two weeks. We hope our preachers will spare us as few funeral sermons as possible, and we will try to publish all they send us, in that case—but really, as it now seems, we have entirely too many sent us, and our readers complain of it—they are, generally, far from being acceptable reading matter to the mass of our readers. I believe we have now, only four or five on hand—but two of which, (the short ones,) we shall publish. The rest have been laid over for want of room, so long, that we suppose they are no longer looked for—at least we hope so.

We are very thankful to our many correspondents who keep us supplied with an excellent variety of suitable and acceptable articles. Let them not grow weary in well doing.

SECULAR NEWS.

BARBARIETY.—The following paragraph, from a Philadelphia paper, states facts said to have been elicited on the trial of Tansill before a Court Martial. The Pierpont alluded to was a brother of Rev. John Pierpont, of Boston, a very estimable man, liberally educated, but through misfortune reduced to poverty, which caused melancholy, to cure which he enlisted in the marine corps, and went with it to Florida.

"One morning, at Cape Sable, Rogers appeared accompanied by the boatswain, with his cats and lashing ropes, and Pierpont was brought forward. 'You are no longer Corporal—strip, sir,' said Rogers to the marine. The poor fellow laid bare his back, was 'triced' up, and received a dozen lashes, when, fainting, he fell back insensible. As soon as he recovered, Rogers made him stand up and take a dozen and a half more! Pierpont never did another day's duty. He died; and, with his last breath, attributed his death to the flogging.—Lieut. McLaughlin was his commander at the time, and never called Rogers to an account for the act."

The Mr. Pierpont who was whipped to death in Haida a short time since, was not a brother, but a cousin, of Rev. John Pierpont of Boston. He entered the Navy from a desire to see the world. He was a native of New Haven. Rev. J. Pierpont concludes a letter stating these facts, with the following sentence:

"Well—poor fellow—his term of service has expired. He is discharged. He has no powerful friend at Court, to inquire into the equity of his case, or to bring any wrong-doer to justice. He was nothing but a corporal even before he was flogged, and when flogged, he was not even that. Happily for him, he was never married. He was a lone man in the world; and has left neither wife nor child to remember or even to know that he was flogged out of it."

SINGULAR CASE.—The National Intelligencer of Thursday says that the Supreme Court of the United States was to be occupied that day with the case of Jewel vs. Jewel, from South Carolina, which involves a question of marriage between a Catholic woman and a Jew, who, after living fifteen years together, and bearing eight children, separated, and Jewell married a Jewess, and died intestate, leaving two families. The contest is, which is legitimate? The parties are highly respectable, and the event of the suit momentous. The legal requisites of valid marriage will be discussed.

A NEW MEDICINE.—Dr. Locke, of Tonawanda, near Buffalo, was lately called up at night to visit a patient, said to be dying of spasmodic convulsions. He went and found the man, named Harriott, raging about the room at a terrible rate—beating his head against the wall, and throwing himself into all possible shapes. The Dr. approached and was saluted with a violent kick. By dint of perseverance, he succeeded, however, in ascertaining that his patient was hoaxing him. He immediately ordered him to get up, and, by way of assistance gave him a few cuts with his riding whip; whereupon the man declared he "felt much better," and became quiet. The Doctor was arrested for assault and battery, and fined six cents, which the District Attorney cheerfully paid, in consideration of the new medicine he had introduced—the remedy used not being prescribed in any book of Pharmacy.

The Tallahassee Sentinel says—The little negroes were greatly astonished last Wednesday morning by a fall of snow. It is the first we have known in Florida, and we fear the cold which attended it will injure the orange and other fruit trees.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT.—CAMPHENE EXPLOSION.—The Rochester Daily Advertiser of Saturday, says—"Another explosion of this dangerous article took place in one of the stores on the bridge, on Thursday night, and burnt Mr. James Caldwell in the most dreadful manner. It appears that Mr. Caldwell had closed the store, and was about retiring to bed, when he attempted to fill a lamp which was sitting near another, when the whole of it caught fire and exploded. When the accident first occurred, it was thought he would not live through the night, but yesterday hopes were entertained of his recovery."

THE TRAVELLING PREACHER.

CHAPTER FIRST.

It was one Saturday evening, when we were congregated around the blazing hearth and conning over the transactions of the week, that news came to us that a stranger would discourse in the village church the next day. This was cheering information to many an honest soul; for the good matrons had looked out sadly at the window, as the sun bid adieu to this portion of terra firma, and indulged a heavy, secret sigh that "our good pastor" was absent, and many a silent prayer had been wafted aloft that the "grievous wolves" might not enter in and destroy the flock while the shepherd was away. Many a maiden, too, had now and then a thought of sadness flit athwart her mind, that she would thus be deprived of an opportunity of displaying her charms before the gay young beaux—ah, there was a bitterness in the thought! And the man of business—the hardy tiller of the soil; how wearisome with him would pass away the hours of the morrow!—cooped up in his own kitchen, perhaps, and though he could there hold silent communion with his God, yet to the most of men, time spent in this manner, "like the wounded snake, drags its slow length along!"

When such melancholy reflections reigned supreme, how cheering came the declaration that a stranger would speak to the good people from the word of God on the morrow, and doubly so was it, when told that he was sound in the heart-rejoicing faith of endless despair! This last item fell like a charm upon many an ear, and weighed heavily in the speaker's favor, for all are aware that when one's sentiments are known, it takes a burden from off the congregation; whereas if a stranger speaks, we are under the absolute necessity of keeping pace with him as he advances, taking up and weighing each sentence as it falls from his lips, in order that we may discover whether or not he is the setter forth of heresies. Nay; even now I have in my mind's eye, a pious and venerable deacon of the true church, who was always in his seat on the Sabbath, and who invariably slept during the discourse—for the good of the cause! But one day a wandering preacher called upon our pastor, and was by him introduced into the desk; and throughout the whole discourse the eye of the deacon closed not, but was ever intently upon the speaker; and when at a subsequent time his minister spoke to him of the extraordinary change in his conduct, his reply was—"when our minister is at the helm I know that all is safe, because he is sound in the faith; but when a stranger speaks, he must be watched a little." Here is the secret, and it is a wonder that one should so long remain ignorant of the fact. When the congregation know that their minister is at the helm, they have not a doubt but what their gallant ship will ride out the dangers of the storm—make headway against every adverse breeze and come at anchor in the happy haven, and this destroys all fearful anxiety; quiets the restless nerve and stills the soul with the joyful declaration of the watch—"all's well." But let a stranger step forth and put his hand to the wheel, and seemingly the touch thrills upon every nerve; every eye is upon the look out and every tongue ready to give the alarm, at the least indication of striking upon the shoals of wo or running into the maelstrom of despair.

It is quickly beheld then, that many a fearful bosom was quieted when informed that the travelling preacher was a firm adherent to the true faith, and, indeed, there were not a few in that quiet little village that longed for the appearance of the morrow. And this is not in the least surprising when we take into consideration, that they were to listen to an unknown voice, for all are aware that the word, "stranger," falls upon the ear with a sound differing from most others in language. It immediately excites an inquiry respecting his country—his home—his pursuit—his appearance, and many other things, and I doubt not that many a sleepless eye lay upon the pillow that night, while the mind wondered who the travelling disciple might be. "A good man, no doubt, who had girded on the Gospel armor and gone forth trusting in his God, to do battle with the prince of darkness and release the captives from the prison house. Or it may be that as humanity is only made perfect through suffering, that he is now fleeing from the hand of persecution with a faith as abiding as the afflicted Paul's. We will go and listen to the man of God and invite him to our home! If he is sorrowful, we will soothe his wounded soul and cheer his drooping spirit, but if he is rejoicing in his labors of love, with him we will sing praises to the Father."

Such were the thoughts dwelling in the minds of the pious, and though the night rolled slowly away, yet it passed at last as every night eventually will, and the morning dawned in all the fulness of beauty. Not a cloud was seen floating across the fair face of the heavens above, and at the appointed hour the inhabitants sallied forth. There was the light, thoughtless laugh of childhood—the blooming countenance of youth—the self-satisfied air of life's meridian day, and wrinkled age leaning upon the helping staff, and all, all with steps bent toward the house of worship. Reader, among that throng was him who now has the honor of addressing you, and it is needless for me to speak of the silence which reigned within the sanctuary while awaiting the arrival of the speaker. Some undoubtedly holding communion with Him above—others dwelling with the things of earth; and not a few eagerly watching for the purpose of catching the first glimpse of the approaching preacher.

Expectation was not long upon the tip-toe ere the door opened and the looked for personage appeared; and surely I would give a brief description of him were I competent to the task. We will suppose, reader, that you were requested to give a description of a full grown pumpkin; I opine that you would scarcely know in what section to commence. Precisely thus am I situated respecting this travelling promulgator of the Gospel. I know not where to commence the work, and hence I will take a kind of bird's eye view of him as a whole, by saying that he was not unlike the veritable Deidrich's dutch governor—"five feet, six inches high, and six feet, five inches round." The first thought that struck me, was the recollection of the proverb about the laborer being worthy of his meat. I can not say that this man has been indeed a worthy laborer, but of this much we may be fully confident; that he has been supplied with a superabundance of meat, for surely his bulk is a standing evidence of the fact! A head of no small dimensions was placed firmly between his shoulders, yet the size of it instead of setting out largely the moral and intellectual regions, showed itself more conspicuously in his capacious chin, which shook and jostled at every step he took. His temperament, as you have already judged, was decidedly lymphatic, with a slight tinge of the sanguine intermingled, and the finger of Thought had drawn not one solitary line upon his countenance.

I confess that I was not a little disappointed in thus having all my fancies which I had indulged respecting the stranger, scattered to the four winds, and more so, by the conviction that we should not be very highly edified by aught which fell from such a source, and therefore the time might have been better employed at home; but as it is a mark of impoliteness to leave church prior to the conclusion of the services, I determined to remain and abide the issue, which I had every reason to believe would be a shocking one. The speaker soon arose, but the front of the desk being quite elevated, you could discover but little excepting his capacious head, and the organ of self-esteem being pretty well developed, which of course brought the head backward not a little, his appearance reminded me of the boy who upon attempting to take a peep into a neighbor's orchard, had the misfortune to get hung upon the cap-board by the chin!

In this interesting situation, the speaker, with all due gravity, opened the book, and with a voice which sounded as though it came from the bungalow of an empty barrel, read "for our edification," a chapter from the Acts about Peter's being at Joppa and beholding a vision which consisted as it were, of a sheet knitted at the four corners, and let down from heaven, filled with four footed beasts and creeping things, while a voice said, "arise Peter, slay and eat." By this his prejudices were overcome, so that he went down to a Gentile village and preached the Gospel to the inhabitants thereof.—But the reason which induced our preacher to read this chapter, at once raised a query in my mind. Perhaps it was the first to which he had opened; or it might be that not long since some special attention was bestowed upon the chapter, and hence he could read it with a better grace. But these were far from being satisfactory, and I was about giving up the chase in despair of success, when the thought passed across my mind that he considered the journey of Peter to Cesarea, and his to our place somewhat of a parallel. And surely it was no mean office to take a stand beside the fearless apostle, but still on the other hand it was not a very high recommendation for the inhabitants of our peaceful community, to be compared to "all manner of four footed beasts and creeping things!" This, though, I could bear tolerably well, but a silent prayer arose spontaneously from the very bottom of my heart, that he would not tarry many days among us, if he intended to obey the injunction—"slay and eat;" for were he to do this, he would most assuredly breed a famine in the land!

By the time these reflections were indulged, the choir had performed their part, and the speaker arose to offer up his address to the throne of Grace. And here we were indeed very agreeably disappointed, for his prayer was deep and fervent, and clothed in respectful language. I went forth as from one whose heart leaned with confidence upon the arm of the Almighty for support and protection, through all the changing vicissitudes of life. It would have done honor to the head and heart of a more profound and enlightened man, for surely it was faultless, save in one particular, wherein he conveyed the idea, that had God dealt by us as we deserve, we should long since been chanting a death-wail in the regions of endless despair. Perhaps in this instance it was an idea which fell inadvertently from the lips; yet as we often hear the same sentiment set forth during the season of prayer, let us consider for a moment its import, ere we respond to its correctness and propriety.

In the first place, it contradicts the Scriptures—for they unequivocally declare that God will render to every man "according to his works," which would not be true, did he not deal with us as we deserve. And though we may read of forgiveness, yet we are not thereby to conclude that we escape any just reward for iniquity; but simply that the wayward individual is received into favor after a reformation has been brought about by the punishment which was laid upon him; for we are certified by the prophet, that Jerusalem was forgiven or pardoned after she had received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins. In the second place, it accuses God of acting upon the principles of injustice. For if it would have been just for us to have been cast into endless despair, ere this, we should most assuredly have been there, for "justice and judgment are the habitation" of God's throne—"just and right is he," which would not be true, did he not mete out to every action a due and proportionate reward.

Thus much for this oft-repeated sentiment of prayer, and now as I have spun out this chapter to no inconsiderable length, I will bid the reader adieu until another week, when we will return like "boon companions, void of every care," and contemplate the sermon; and and in the mean time, friendly reader, harbor not a solitary fear respecting the fate of our hero; for though seemingly he hangs there by the chin, yet he is in no distress, for he has got as sturdy a pair of posts under him as ever graced the person of man; and based upon such an understanding, it would be unbecoming in us to suppose that any evil can befall him. SCHOTLER.

HORRORS OF REMORSE.

BY REV. U. CLARK.

"There is no future pang
Can deal that justice on the self-condemned,
He deals on his own soul." BYRON.

The guilty man sits down in the hour of meditation, and thought brings up some dark deed, again and again, big with remorse that preys upon his vitals. He tries to chase it away—it is gone—but oh, there it is again in all its ugliness, haunting the hours of midnight like a frightful demon, and following him like a scourge by day. Were a dagger there, it were ease to the pangs which, like lightning, scathe his soul. Thus behold the picture of Judas.

The world may hurl its infinite anathemas, and lash the victim of guilt with the supposed terrors of ceaseless torments; but what are all these but trifles to him—dreams—when he retires within himself and there feels the venomous reptile gnawing and coiling around, and thrusting the sting deadly with poison into his bosom, eating out his life and peace, and sending cold chills over his trembling frame. Go to him within the damp confines of his prison, and tell him of the law, the human tribunal, and point him to the gallows; and what are even these to that self-remorseful rankling conscience within, which haunts with visions at which humanity shudders, and his affrighted spirit seeks in vain for retreat in forgetfulness—making his moments, months and ages—transforming himself into a fiend lashed by the torments of his own soul, the sport of that misery and despair which his own self-condemnation deals out, and from which the incarcerated victim can not shrink. Oh, "happy is he that dameth not himself in that thing which he alloweth." Paul.

THE UNIVERSAL REIGN OF CHRIST...NO. II.

BY REV. ALSON SCOTT.

In the first number of this series, I spoke of the universal triumphs of the Redeemer, as seen in the Scriptures, the present and the past; and in this I will refer you secondly, to the desires and aspirations of the human heart connected with their Author.

Man, the noblest work of God, is a religious being, possessed of a religious disposition, inspired with desires for peace, and aspirations that reach toward heaven. All, even the most vicious people on earth, have desires, which extend toward their Father and God. The heathen nations are inspired with those same religious feelings, those same desires, which cause them to look forward to a time when their imagined Deity shall reign triumphant over all opposition, and restore man to peace and happiness. We may go back to time immemorial, and these same desires, hopes, and aspirations had a seat in the human bosom. Even from the commencement of time, at least as far as we have any account, mankind have been buoyed above the trials and troubles of earth by those feelings, which, to all appearance, constitute a part of his nature.

The question here arises, for what purpose were these desires and aspirations implanted within the mind of man? Was it that he might be disappointed? Was it to increase his sorrow and weigh down his spirits, when he should learn that they were nought but delusive dreams implanted by the enemy, that he might destroy his peace and happiness? No, they are not delusive dreams planted by the enemy, but on the contrary, they were there fixed by the Author of all light and blessedness. These aspirations of the Christian heart shall end in fruition, and be swallowed up of love. They agree perfectly with the Scriptures and the evidence drawn from the present and the past. All unite in proclaiming the great truth, that Christ's kingdom shall extend its sway until all nations, kindred, people, and tongues shall become obedient and willing subjects. How well calculated are such desires to cheer and enliven the mind of man, when he has the blest assurance that they were placed there by a being who will never suffer eternal disappointment to be consequence thereof!

That Being who is the author of these feelings is one of wisdom, power, and goodness, as established in nature and the Scriptures. This being the case, it is impossible to suppose for a moment, that he would give to his children desires and aspirations never to be realized. God being infinite in all his perfections, we may well expect that he will work all things in such a manner as to produce a glorious result for all his children; and unless it can be shown that the final triumph of the Saviour over all his enemies will be detrimental to the peace and happiness of the world, then it can not be shown that he will always suffer the adversary to trample upon his government, lead his subjects into the labyrinth of sin and misery, and continue them there despite all the efforts made to win them to obedience and consequent happiness. These desires of which I have been speaking, God has implanted within the human bosom, and he will satisfy them; for it is declared that "he openeth his hand and satisfieth the desire of every living thing." The goodness of God dictates the final triumph of the kingdom of Christ, it being one of his own institution, designed and calculated to bring peace to the troubled spirit and to restore man to a state of purity and bliss. Hence it is that he has created man with these desires and aspirations which he possesses. His wisdom will direct in such a manner, that the object designed shall be effected; and his power will accomplish all that his goodness has dictated or his wisdom directed, and thus will be consummated the purpose of Him made known to us through the Scriptures and the constitution of our own minds. Here, it will be seen, are glorious assurances of the final triumph of the Redeemer over all the opposition of the world, and the complete reign of his kingdom, over all the kingdoms of the earth, in which shall reign universal righteousness and peace.

FORGIVENESS.

BY REV. S. J. GIBSON.

There is no doctrine inculcated in Revelation which the Christian is obligated to bind to his heart more zealously, than that of forgiveness. It glows upon almost every page of the inspired writings—forms a chief theme in the instruction of One who spoke as never did any before him, and is urged upon every one who lays the least claim to the Scriptures, as a foundation for his faith. And in truth, "an unforgiving Christian" is a contradiction in itself—the claims which such a one may maintain relative to the teachings of the Gospel, are "vanity and vexation of spirit," and, indeed, the most fleeting of all things of which we can have any possible conception. True, there is a time for every thing, and a season for every purpose—a time when we are called upon by every principle of justice, to condemn a fellow being for his waywardness; for a violation of those moral and social institutions which bind the human family in sweet and friendly union. But even then, instead of adopting these harsh and unfeeling measures, whose end invariably is to send a death-chill to the soul and freeze the warmest affections of the heart; how heavenly, how amiable to let the mild spirit of religion dictate; for then, though condemnation must rest upon the head of the transgressor, yet the watch-fire of hope is kindled anew in the mind—sends up again a bright, beautiful flame, and leads on to the arbor of virtue and home of rest.

Would any one learn the necessity of forgiveness by being taught by a something aside from the monitor within? Then turn an eye upon the inspired page and behold it written:—"For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you; but if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses." With what confidence in view of this, can one look to the throne of God, for compassion and forgiveness, when the mild voice of this virtue, he has neglected to breathe into the ear of those who may have injured him? Such a proceeding, though too often beheld, is nevertheless, presumption—barefaced impiety. The Creator has placed mankind upon earth in such a manner—endowed with such faculties, that they are dependent upon each other, and all are urged and commanded to extend to others what they would wish to receive. Yet one will stand up, in the public sanctuary it may be, and send aloft a fervent appeal for compassion—for forgiveness to descend, bringing deliverance from wayward deeds which may have been watched; and yet, ere the sounds of that appeal have died away upon the distant air, with an iron hand he bears down upon some poverty-stricken soul. There is no evidence of compassion in his heart—no forgiving spirit, yielding to the entreaties and imploring, look of the offender, accompanied with a heavenly blessing, but the stern mandate of "pay me what thou owest," as recorded in the parable, is adhered to with vigorous hand and relentless mind! O vain and impious man! Whosoever thou art, knowest thou not that the spirit which urges thee onward, is one of a sensual nature, and one day will pour its gall of bitterness upon thine own desponding soul? 'Tis even so; and wouldst thou put afar off the evil day? Then suffer thyself no longer to be influenced by an unforgiving disposition, and with confidence look to Heaven for a blessing to descend, and with thee make its blissful abode.

Forgiveness! There's music in the name. A life-giving power is there, and upon man sends forth its beauties; its blessings, and its benedictions. It is the pride of the Christian; the honor of the man, and the safe-guard against many woes! How amiable indeed are one's professions, when the semblance of this virtue beams upon the countenance and smiles upon the wanderer from the home of rectitude. Then let us look well to it. Let us suffer it not to be lost to the sight in the surrounding darkness, but ever follow its heavenly direction; for then, and not till then, shall we be strangers to the many sorrows dwelling with those of a revengeful temper, who neglect no opportunity of laying oppression upon the unfortunate children of humanity. And then the peace which it inspires, will be with us in the morning while going out to our labor and toil, and when the light of day is shut out from the world and the shadows of night hang over the habitations of man, it will desert us not; but as a guardian angel will it hover around the mind, when we sink down to repose, and are dwelling with the sweet slumbers of rest.

INDIVIDUAL AND COMBINED EFFORT.

BY REV. H. BELDING.

Few people rightly view the stations they occupy, and the responsibility that rests upon them.—These remarks apply in an especial manner to the professed Universalist. How many are there who, when asked, are ever ready to avow their belief in the doctrines of impartial grace; and yet seldom attempt the exercise of the least influence in extending a knowledge of this glorious sentiment.—Such, seemingly, are satisfied with being accounted in the faith; not considering that "faith without works is dead."

And what excuse is offered for this listlessness and inaction? Among the many that might be named, I shall mention but one, viz., a want of influence. Says the individual, "I am but one—a single individual—what can my efforts avail? and what will be the force of my example?"

I admit that at first thought, when reflecting upon the consequence of a single individual, we are apt to say it matters little whether that influence be exerted or not; and, consequently, little or no responsibility rests with the individual. But trace this argument, and where will it end? Carried out, in all its bearings, it will absolve all from obligations; each, and all, if such an argument be valid, will find a quietus for conscience—an absolution from all moral, social and religious obligations.

This excuse contemplates man as an individual, and capable of exerting only an individual influence. But in order that we may view the subject aright, we must look at the effect of association. Combined effort is the mainspring of all the great movements among mankind. Without this, how powerless is the arm of man! How weak his voice! How unavailing his mightiest efforts!—But with it, the weak becomes strong, and the strong omnipotent! It is the grand engine that moves and controls the world! Aided by its influence, tyrants forge their chains, and by a like influence, the patriot hurls the despot from his throne! And when we look back over the past, and by the light of history trace some of the great revolutions that have taken place in the world; we wonder, and ask for the sources of that power, that could produce such mighty movements! The story is told in two words—combined effort. And what is combined effort? Individual efforts, all tending to one and the same point; directed to the accomplishment of one and the same object.

Let me illustrate. Take, for instance, a single drop of water. Isolate it from every thing around, and it stands out to view a particle, small, yea, insignificant, and capable of effecting, seemingly, nothing for good or for evil. Let that single drop be commingled with kindred drops, with the hastening stream, as it courses down the mountain's side; or in the more beautiful, though less sublime current, as it passes on through vale and mead; and that same drop, though attended by myriads of kindred drops, still preserves its identity.

Again, think of this same particle as found in the majestic river, as it hastens onward toward the mighty ocean! Shall it be where proud Amazon, in its world of waters, stretches far beyond the utmost bound of unaided vision; and by its broad current, submerges a region fifty leagues in width? Or shall it be where the down-rushing cataract of far-famed Niagara sends up its thundering roar amid the hasting element? In either case the crystal drop is yet a drop, having lost nothing of its original character, though found in so great an association.

Thus we see, that the gushing fountain, the purling rill, the mighty river, the foaming cataract, the bounded sea, and the boundless ocean—all are but drops; each individual drop holding its proper place, performing its due office, and bearing a comparison to the great whole.

And, I will here add, that many of the great improvements of our day are dependent upon the influence of this same drop of water. But for this, what so effectually bestirs the buzzing gin, the thundering loom, the astounding forge! And the steam engine—that annihilator of time and space, but for drops of water would become motionless, yea, powerless!

If, then, such be the influence of single drops of water, when in combination, let no one, not even the weakest say, I can exert no influence. But let each, though he have but a single drop, see that that drop be cast into the current to swell the tide of liberal effort, and consequent reform.

RELIGION.

There is not, perhaps, a word in the English language about the meaning of which there is more difference of opinion, than the word religion. It appears to be the opinion of every one, that religion is necessary for man in this life; that every one ought to have religion; but what this religion consists in, is the matter of dispute. One thinks he must open his mouth and scream "glory to Jesus!" at the top of his voice, with violent gestures, deep groans, and striking the desk or bench with his clenched fists, &c. And this he thinks is religion. Another thinks that after sitting a few minutes on an anxious seat, he must tell an experience; some remarkable dream or vision that he has had, and then be immersed in water, and then he thinks he has experienced religion—though I believe there is not such a phrase as "experience religion" in the Bible. Now how are we to examine what religion is? Let us go to the volume of inspiration, and see if we can not find some definition of this word religion.

In the first chapter of the epistle of James, we have the following, which may assist us in determining what religion is; he says, "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father" (not before men) "is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." And is this religion? If it is, what sense is there in the expression "get religion," which we hear so often reiterated by those who profess to have got religion? Do those who have got religion visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction any more than their neighbors? If not, we have no warrant for saying that they have any more religion than they. Do they keep themselves any more unspotted from the world than their neighbors, whom they accuse of not having any religion? Are they less grasping for this world's goods than their neighbors? Let those answer who have dealings with these new-born souls, who pretend to have got religion. Are they any more scrupulous about the ways and means of gaining wealth than others? If not, we have no reason to think they possess any more of the religion spoken of by the Apostle, than those whom they are pleased to call sinners, while themselves they denominate saints.

But the Apostle says, "If any man among you seem to be religious, and bridle not his tongue, but deceive his own heart, that man's religion is vain." Now who is it among us that seem to be religious? Is it those who live in the daily practice of the religion of the Apostle, or those who get religion by sitting a few minutes on an anxious seat, weeping a little, telling an experience, and then conduct just as they did before, except, perhaps, going to meeting a little more? Is this seeming to be religious? If so, according to the Apostle, that man's religion is vain.

I believe there is not such an expression between the lids of the Bible, as "getting religion"; but the Bible does say "get wisdom, get understanding," and if those who pretend to have got so much religion would get a little more wisdom and understanding, there would be more pure religion and less fanaticism. There is a great deal said by our modern religionists about practical religion. And the idea is always carried, that if we have practical religion we shall be saved in another world by it, and if we have it not, we shall be damned for the want of it. Now, in what part of the Bible shall we find this doctrine? I can not find in the Bible any passage that informs us that we can be saved in a future state, by practical religion. I can find no other way, pointed out in the Bible, of salvation in the immortal, resurrection state, than by grace, free grace. "By grace are ye saved through faith, and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God; not of works lest any man should boast." But religion, pure and undefiled religion, is what every man, every child of Adam needs, and no one ever has too much of it. We need it to teach us how to live in this world. We need it to teach us how to bear the dispensations of Providence with fortitude, with meekness, and with resignation. We need it to point us to heaven our eternal resting place. We need it to teach us our duty to our heavenly Father, and to our fellow men. In fine, we need it to make us better, and consequently happier, in this life. G. Y.

HOPE AND FANCY.

The pleasures derived from hope and fancy, as much surpass those found in the dull realities of life, as the splendor of the glorious orb of day, eclipses the paler beams of the queen of night.—Hope leads us to look forward to the future with bright anticipations; fancy transports us in imagination from the gloom of the present, to the enjoyment of all hope has promised. Hope cheers the heart of the aspirant for literary fame, whether he strives to reach the summit of poetical distinction, or aims to divert and entertain his readers with stories of chivalry and romance; whether it be his task to lay before them historical facts, or to impart instruction in morality, and unfold the truths of the Gospel. All look forward to the time when success shall crown their efforts. Hope cheers the soldier in the field of battle, inspires the hero to deeds of noble daring, gives confidence to the dejected lover, and imparts consolation to the afflicted mourner. In the hour of affliction hope is a source of consolation, without which all would be a dreary void. Go to the bedside of one laboring under the most painful disease, and you will see hope written on his brow, enlivening the dull hours of pain and suffering, and holding up to his eager view the prospect of speedy recovery.

Nor does hope desert the aged and infirm, but is ever near, and though they have ceased to be blinded by the delusive promise of happiness in this life, still will they look forward to the time when age and suffering will be no more, and they enjoy the never-ending joys of a brighter and better world.

Though the mother mourns the death of a darling child, or a child weeps for the loss of its parent; though a brother laments over the grave of a sister, or a sister for a departed brother; or be it the husband who is bereft of the wife of his bosom, or is the heart of the affectionate wife torn with anguish, as she gives a parting look to the lover of her youth and husband of her later life, whose eyes, which once gazed upon her with all the ardor of love, are now forever sealed in death; still hope is there to heal the broken heart. And even though no longer does the future promise happiness in life, yet they still hope for relief in death, and look for joy and peace beyond the grave. B. F. D.

DISCUSSION IN BRADFORD CO., PA.

An esteemed correspondent who writes from Orwell, Pa., under date of January 24th, 1843, thus writes to us concerning an interesting and useful discussion which is in course of publication in the "Bradford Argus," a political paper published in Towanda, Pa.—and which is also being copied into the "Bradford Porter," another political paper of the opposite party, also published in Towanda. We hope that thus many of both the great political families in that region may become enlightened on the subject of God's nature and purposes, and man's duty and destiny in a higher than mere political view. We have no fears for the result. A. B. G.

Orwell, January 26th, 1843.

Rev. A. B. Grosh—

Dear Sir—Last June, in this vicinity, at a camp meeting, Elder D. Holmes, Jr., delivered a discourse in which he gave a false view of Universalism. Dr. R. Barnes being on the ground at the time, publicly said the Elder was either ignorant of the doctrine advocated by Universalists, or dishonest; for which he was called in question by one Mr. Hodge (Methodist clergyman,) alleging that such an expression was calculated to injure the standing of the Elder, and wishing the Doctor and the Elder to have an interview and have the matter settled. Accordingly a meeting was had, and it was agreed that the Elder publish his sermon, the same as delivered on the camp ground, in some one of our secular papers, and that Rev. W. M. DeLong of Binghamton, review and publish in the same paper, and continue the discussion as long as the parties wished, or as long as the paper selected would publish. Therefore arrangements were made with the Editors of the Bradford Argus, at Towanda, to publish six letters from each. In October, I think, the Elder published his sermon, (but those who heard it on the ground, say it is not the same, only in part,) and Rev. W. M. DeLong reviewed it, and Elder Holmes has replied, and another reply has been published from Br. DeLong, and another letter now due from the Elder, will perhaps be published next week. The Editors of the Argus have now opened their paper unconditionally. The object of this short history, is, to let you know the movement here. The Editors of the Bradford Porter also copy the discussion—it excites a great interest in this section of country, and Rev. Mr. DeLong has displayed his talents in a workmanlike manner.

Respectfully yours,

H. G.

SECULAR NEWS.

TERRIBLE EARTHQUAKE IN THE WEST INDIES—TEN THOUSAND LIVES LOST—The brig Frances Jane, Thompson, arrived at Baltimore on the 2d inst. from St. Johns, Porti Rico, brings to the Exchange Reading Room, advices of the effects of a severe shock of an Earthquake, on the 8th of February.

Extracts of a letter received by the owners of the Frances Jane, dated St. Johns, Feb. 14th and 15th, state:—

"We have just received advices from the windward. The effects of the earthquake of the 8th inst., have been awful, indeed. Point Petre, in Guadaloupe, is totally destroyed, and ten thousand persons are supposed to have been killed. At Antigua, also, there has been a great loss of property, but five lives lost. All the mills and sugar works have been more or less injured, and the greater part of the crop will be lost. Nevis, Montserrat, Barbadoes, &c., are said to have suffered much, but to what extent is not yet known. Here, and at St. Thomas, the shock was also severe, and lasted two minutes; but there was no material damage done at either place."

DEATH BY POISON.—The Aurora states that in Clermont, Columbia county, last week, Doctor Robert Clove sent to a druggist's for morphine, and on receiving what he supposed was this, but which proved to be a preparation of nux vomica, gave a dose to his mother, and took another himself. His mother soon died in convulsions, and the Dr. was attacked in the same manner. Not knowing what was the matter, he took another dose, and soon expired. Mrs. Elting of Red Hook, took a dose of the same, but by the application of proper remedies her life was saved.

The steamboat Sandusky, which has been laid up all winter in Buffalo Creek, was burnt to the water's edge a short time since. The loss is nearly $20,000, without any insurance. It is presumed to be the work of incendiaries.

Immense quantities of wild pigeons have made their appearance in England, supposed to have emigrated from this country.

LIBERALITY.—The widow of the late Gen. Findlay, formerly of this city, has presented a large farm near Dayton, for the purpose of supporting a free school.—Such liberality towards the cause of education, was characteristic of her late venerated husband.—Cincinnati Gazette.

The disease called "Black Tongue," has broken out with great virulence in New Madrid county, Mo., within eight miles of Point Pleasant. Sixty-nine persons had sunk under it in two weeks.

We learn by the Boston Daily Advertiser, that a subscription is about to be opened in that city for the purpose of erecting a Naval Monument to the memory of Com. Hull, at Mount Auburn.

SPECIE.—The steamship Acadia brings out about $1,000,000 of specie, £100,000 of which is consigned to Messrs. Brown, Brothers & Co., New York.

Rev. Dr. Bailey, a popular Episcopal clergyman in England, has been convicted of forgery, and sentenced to transportation for life.

A man named Joshua Crars, was found frozen to death near Glasco, Ulster county, a few days since.

A nest of thieves has been discovered and broken up in New Orleans. A large amount of stolen property has been recovered.

DEATHS.

JOHN R. LUDLOW, whose death we briefly noticed last week, (because we waited until the last hour, for some one to furnish a fuller notice, but have not yet received it) was one of the oldest members of the Universalist society in this city. He came from Schenectady, bringing with him testimonials of his high standing in the Presbyterian church; but owing to some dissatisfaction with the pastor of the Presbyterian church in Utica, he did not connect himself with it. After some time he embraced Universalism, and gave his energies and means to its support. He was active in supporting the preached word, and in building our house of worship. But about the time the church was completed, Br. Ludlow met with severe reverses in business, and lost the hard and honestly earned gains of his previous life.

Br. Ludlow was eminent: for his gentlemanly courtesy and dignity, his calm and steady demeanor, his unostentatious readiness to oblige, and his undeviating integrity and correct moral principle.

For the last few months his health failed rapidly. But his faith remained strong, and his mind clear and calm to the last. He had seen sorrow enough to be willing to die; and goodness enough manifested even in this life, to be willing to trust God for his goodness in the world to come.—One of the most painful events of his last days, was the circulation of a report that he had renounced his faith—that faith which had sustained him in all his troubles and trials, that now consoled him in parting with his family, and supported him in the dying hour. The report grieved him, and he took special pains to contradict it, and to direct the preparations for his funeral, which he requested might be attended in the Universalist church, as he felt certain he would die so as to be buried on Sunday. And so it was. Having given all these directions, settled all his earthly affairs, and bade farewell to family and friends, he sweetly fell asleep in Jesus—mourned for by all who knew him; for to know, was to esteem and love him.

He has left a widow, a son and two daughters, whom may God console and bless with his truth and salvation.

A. B. G.

At his residence, in the town of Middleburg, on Friday the 17th ult., MERRIMAN PRESTON, aged 50 years.

The deceased was one of the most respectable and worthy inhabitants of the town in which he resided. His death, and the distressing circumstances of the awful malady which occasioned it, furnish a subject of bitter and enduring grief to his bereaved friends and numerous acquaintances. During the recent 'protracted meetings' in Middleburg, when 'sea and land were compassed,' as it were, to make proselytes, we are informed that the mind of the deceased became much excited. Extraordinary means were used to fan the flame thus enkindled, until the reason of the unfortunate man was deluged and his frail tenement mouldering in the dust.

We revere the Christian religion, and God forbid that we should ever utter a breath to bedim its brightness in the view of mortal man. But we beg to be excused from considering that religion, which discards reason, judgment, common sense, and applies for sustenance and growth to superstition, prejudice and fear. In this view of the subject, we very much doubt that the cause of Christ has ever been materially advanced by protracted meetings or extraordinary efforts to produce excitements. On the other hand has it not been debased? To what extremes have fear and passion prevailed, and led their victims on such frantic occasions?

Oh, that the over zealous, the fanatic, would pause in his course of desolation, and listen to the tale of the backslider, the inmate of the Lunatic Asylum, of the widow and orphan! Communicated.—[Schoharie Republican.]

In Brookfield, Nov. 4th, Mr. H. CHESEBROUGH, aged 78 years. The arrow of the pale king never found a more shining mark or a more willing victim, than in the person of this aged brother. While in enjoyment of a green old age, exempt from care, and surrounded by a most devoted family, the summons which bade him away, though brief, was obeyed with that cheerful resignation which speaks of confidence in the Divine goodness, of happiness, of heaven.

"Thus would I live, untainted by this world,

But tasting all the comforts it can give;

Thus would I die, and with glad wings unfurled

Soar where my God and kindred all shall live."

The stricken wife and children mourn, but not without hope; and may they ever look cheerfully forward to a reunion with the companion and father, that shall be eternal.

Z. COOK.

In Hamilton, Feb. 14th, Mr. ELIJAH BRAINARD, aged 67 years. This was emphatically an instance of the triumph of Universalism over death. While slowly sinking under a most painful disease, he uttered no complaints, he felt no fears; but on the eve of his departure, when looking back upon a life well spent, said, "I have been prepared to live, and that is sufficient preparation to die." May his eternal existence, be as peaceful as his last hour. Z. COOK.

EUGENIA GRANDET. A Tale of the Nineteenth Century. Translated from the French of H. De Balzac, by Edward S. Gould, Esq.

This splendid production of the great French Author. H. de Balzac, has been most admirably rendered by E. S. Gould, Esq., whom our readers know as the talented translator of "Incidents of Travel," by Alexandre Dumas, which appeared in the last volume of the New World. It will shortly be issued in a Double Extra New World, for which it has been expressly translated.

This novel is commended to the American public by the fact of its being the only one extant, in our language, which treats of what a painter would call "still life" in the Provinces of France. Scott, James, and others have illuminated their pages with the feats of French chivalry, and presented to us the knights and high-born dames of that noble country as they lived and flourished in past ages; but French provincial life in the nineteenth century is hitherto untrodden ground for the novelist.

The characters of Old Grandet, (known as the Miser of Saumur), his daughter Eugenia, and Charles her lover, are exquisitely drawn; Eugenia, in particular, is one of the most delightful creations that ever figured in the pages of romance, and in our judgment is scarcely inferior to (though, indeed, totally different from) Jeanie Deans herself. It is at least safe to say that if no one but Scott could have drawn the latter character, no living writer but Balzac could have drawn the former; and, besides, as a beau-ideal (or rather we should say a belle-ideale) of a lady's love, Eugenia is incomparably more sweet and fascinating than the Scottish maiden.

OH MUST WE DIE?

Must all the breathing forms we view
Be mingled soon, with clay?
And will it prove in vain to sue
For life another day?

Must we leave this world of beauties rare,
For a narrow, loathsome cell?
And while our bodies moulder there,
Shall there our spirits dwell?

Oh must we die, can nothing save?
The answer is, we must—
But the soul returns to God who gave,
When the body turns to dust.

And then he hath this promise given,
Who rules the earth and sky,
That all shall meet redeemed in heaven,
Though all must surely die.

A SKETCH.

BY MISS C. W. BARBER.

It is a touching sight to see the young and beautiful fading gradually away under the blighting breath of consumption. I knew two sisters. They were the only daughters of a widowed mother, and daily ministered to her comfort and support. But the cheek of the youngest and fairest blossom became tinged with the hectic flush—her eye was lit up with an unearthly brightness and when "the forest cast its leaf," they deposited her in her narrow house.

The household ring had been rudely broken, and the widow clung closely to her remaining child; but all without avail. She melted away like the morning star, and followed her sister to the realm of shade. I stood beside her coffin at the close of a summer day. Near by her pale, sweet face, there lay a cluster of white rose-buds, and a wreath of flowers was locked in her folded hands. I looked for the lonely widow. She was there with her sable robes, but her tears had ceased to flow. She had learned to bow with resignation beneath the chastening rod, and could say with the Psalmist, "though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, thy rod and thy staff shall comfort me."

The white haired servant of God lifted up his hands and said a prayer of supplication, and then the mourning train followed her to the village graveyard. I stood and saw the sexton pile the green turf above her resting place, and thought of that glorious hour, when the Archangel's trump shall sound, and these perishing habiliments shall be exchanged for garments of immortality.

YOUTHFUL FALLACIES—CLEVERNESS.

In the scene of human life presented to our observation, it appears obvious that there is a constant struggle going forward between two great divisions of society—the aged and the youthful. Each of these parties acts upon opposite principles. The old have found, by experience, that no good can be obtained, no permanent comfort secured, without the exercise of a great deal of cool judgment and prudence. They abound in recollections of innumerable instances in their past lives, in which they lost anticipated advantages by precipitancy, and gained them by a cautious and patient line of conduct. They remember that, at every step in their career, they were impeded by the hurrying advance of others, and withheld by those who placed their sole enjoyment in gratifications by the way. In fine, they can describe that it was only by the due control of their passions, that they were enabled to succeed in their endeavors to attain a competency, or respectable independence.

The young, on the other hand, know almost nothing from experience. They start in the race of life with the most transcendent ideas of their own importance and abilities. Nobody that ever lived was half so clever as they are; and all the rest of the rising generation are fools in comparison with them. They will soon show the world what can be done by their cleverness in business; and they have no doubt but the whole town will very speedily be brought to admire their talents, and hasten to support them in their projects. And as for their foundering in their schemes, that is quite impossible; they will defy the cunningest shaver to cheat them; and they know perfectly well the vicious temptations which they ought to shun. Just let them alone, and give them a fair field, and they will show what can be done. All mankind have been wrong from the beginning of the world, and it is they who will put them right.

Such is the nature of those vague notions which more or less affect the conduct of most young men entering upon a scene of active exertion, in which they are left to pursue the courses which they choose to follow. It may be remarked, that at no period of life are people more adverse from advice than when they are thus let loose from the restraints of boyhood. To the admonitions of guardians, friends or fathers, they listen with apathy; and turn away without being convinced. To the anxiously proffered advice of an aged parent, they most likely reply, "Well, father, that is all very true, you say; but the world is now greatly changed since your young days, and the same measures will not succeed. There are ways of doing things now-a-days that you have no proper idea of; and just give me a trial, and I will soon astonish you with my skill and management." Of course, the old man withdraws his fatherly cares from the ingenious youth—perhaps only thinking of him afterwards as in a certain sense lost, or only brought to a painful knowledge of his existence by the calls privately made upon him for pecuniary subsidies. To what degree of loftiness the pretensions of the young man may have aspired, it is not long before he begins to suspect that the world is neither so silly nor so easily prevailed upon to second his views, as he imagined. Presuming upon his innate knowledge of mankind in all their various classes, he affects an excess of liberality in his dealings. He enters into acquaintanceship with any body, provided they have but a genteel look; implicitly gives credit when sought for; does not heed lending a few dollars when craved with a confidential air; and even becomes security for several of his dearest friends.

It is generally seen that he also reckons with an amazing degree of confidence on the effects of his personal appearance. Everything about him is to attract universal admiration. The elegant contour of his hair; his handsomely made coat; the peculiarly genteel color of his gloves; the graceful droop in the chain of his watch, which hangs around the neck in the most approved fashion—are all, in his estimation, to be at once productive of envy among his competitors and the cause of the deepest admiration and love among all the young ladies who have the happiness or misery to behold him.

The wise and accomplished young man further prides himself on his speculation in business. He tries to carry on trade by a sort of slight of hand, or by being up to every thing. Yet somehow, he finds all will not do. His friends turn out unsubstantial visions: his elegant appearance fails entirely in gaining him either credit or respect: his means vanish in schemes which have proved to be unutterably ridiculous: and he at length makes the notable discovery, that other people are just as wise and as clever as himself. Thus, every succeeding year of his life the young man thinks less and less of his own abilities, or power of swaying the world to his wishes. He learns by dreary experience, that after all, dullness with prudence gets on much better than activity and heedlessness. Above all, he finds there is no probability of attaining any great and profitable end without ministering to the prejudices or prepossessions of others—without submitting, perhaps, to many supposed contumelies and neglects—without manfully breasting every succeeding wave of adversity that threatens to swallow him up. So common is the fallacy of self-sufficient cleverness among the youthful, and the corresponding disregard of advice from the aged, that it would almost appear as if our own race were, in this manner, by a provision of nature, doomed to be retarded in its advancement towards perfection. If each generation were to start with the full advantage of the experience of the one which preceded it, it is impossible to conceive the height of prosperity and happiness to which mankind would have already arrived. But it seems to be nearly as difficult to endow with the wisdom of three-score the youth of five and twenty, as it is to train the muscles of a child of six years old to the energy and endurance of a full-grown man. As the body acquires strength in a regular gradation, so the mind also attains improvement by degrees. Nevertheless, we do not despond over the case of those who naturally repel admonition from their predecessors. There is at least one form in which good counsel presents itself without any circumstance which predisposes men to despise it, and that is the writings which the industry and learning of ages have now largely accumulated, and which the art of printing is daily extending. It is from the reiterated efforts of the press that we are principally to look for melioration in the teachers and in the behavior of the people. In proportion as the young indulge in judicious reading, they will learn to reflect soundly—to see the absurdity of closing their understandings against the deductions drawn from familiar examples of ruin produced by self-conceit and impassioned heedlessness. They will thus, to a certain degree, acquire that which will stand them in the stead of experience of those who have gone before them. In the same measure, by being made extensively acquainted with the abilities of others—the cleverness of their predecessors as well as of their neighbors—they will profitably be led to think much less of their own acquisitions, and to put considerably less value on their own capabilities of action.

Occasionally we see young men who are less headstrong at the outset, than those we have pointed out. A few seem to step at once, as it were, into the sagacity of the aged, and it is always seen that they prosper in proportion as their conduct is regulated by the admonitions of prudence. The success of these entrants on the stage of human life is found to have depended principally on the due regulation of their passions—for in this mainly lies the secret of advancement in society. They engage in their occupation with coolness and deliberation, warily lying in wait for opportunities of well-doing, and taking advantage of those false steps which precipitate others from the eminence they have partially gained. While the greater proportion of the young and thoughtless are dropping aside out of the ranks, and disappearing, and the aged are naturally falling away from among them, they are steadily pursuing their way, shutting their eyes and their ears against the various allurements that beset them—against the pretended friendships of the vicious or the simply contemptible—against, perhaps the turbulence of their own appetites and passions—and so, by the time they have reached a mature manhood, they are already in the possession of those comforts and that honorable station that are the reward of virtue.

"Oh! that some power the gift would give us,
To see ourselves as others see us."

We have a clergyman in our town at present, by the name of John Gray. Who he is, or what he is, none of us know; but time will prove if he tarries with us long enough. He has been here some six or seven months, and came here from the East. He is now holding a protracted meeting in the Dutch Reformed church, where he, assisted by his deacons and members of his church, and a Reverend from Whitesborough, hold forth in the true Littlejohn, Knapp, and Swan style. Under the cloak of his religion, and in the name of Jesus, he pours out the vials of his indignation on all those that disbelieve in him and his purity. Raising his hands to his head with much self-complacency, he boasts of his great intellect, his expansive powers of mind, and his manners and good breeding; and then he denounces Universalists as not having one straight idea in their heads, and being wanting in common decency. To prove his intelligence he asserted that "Universalists denied the Lord Saviour, Jesus Christ." This falsehood of his, was corrected before the same congregation, after he had pronounced the benediction, much to the indignation of himself, who said they need not preach to his congregation but might get one of their own.

It is supposed that at his own instigation, some of his followers handed him some questions in writing to give him a better opportunity to let his mouth speak out of the abundance of his heart.—Among the questions was this: "Do you believe in the existence of a devil?" This he proved by Scripture to his own satisfaction, and he demonstrated that there are devils on earth in his own person, by his fiendish countenance and his diabolical looks, equally satisfactory to the audience. For of all performances that have been witnessed in the pulpit, and of all that has been done in the name of religion, he put on the climax. When he uttered a furious malediction on the Universalist, or played an antic so as to excite the smiles of his audience, he would stop, turn his head one side and point his finger at the gallery, and exclaim, "grin, ye ungodly sinners, and make mock, it is your natures. You Universalists may as well be honest, and come out and deny the Bible first as last, and burn it; for that you will certainly come to in the end." After exhausting his vocabulary of epithets on them, he starts another strain.

"I have more respect for an infidel than a Universalist; for an infidel is a person of some mind, and has at least one straight idea in his head at a time. I have been one, and know it requires some intellect: but you Universalists" (sneeringly, and then stops, and gives a mysterious shake of his finger.) And again, "While I read these passages, I want those persons who think they know so much, to listen and pay particular attention, I know by their talk, they do not read the Bible any." "Just look along the gallery there, and see the effects of their doctrine, it is what we might expect of them; no peace there, it is all confusion, just like their creed. I tell you what it is" (that wonderful shake of the finger with the head turned on one side,) "just strip the sheep skin off these men and you will see the wolf then."

So thought a great many—only try the experiment on the man himself! The above is sufficient to show what manner of spirit he is of; and what an amazing polite fellow he is, of which he so much boasts in the pulpit. It is not often we have such insane fanatical ravings in the pulpit. Common decency forbids it. Who would think that any clergyman could be found so grossly ignorant, as to assert that the Universalists deny the "Lord Saviour, Jesus Christ." If he knew better, the case is worse for him; a clergyman that will willfully lie in his pulpit, is certainly no better than he should be. E. T. M.

DEDICATION IN NEWPORT.

Br. Grosh—After waiting a number of weeks with the expectation of seeing in the columns of the Magazine and Advocate, from the pen of another, some notice of the condition and prospects of our Zion in this place, I have come to the conclusion that the Brother from whom an article upon this subject was expected, has either forgotten us, or can not find time to devote in our behalf. Therefore, rather than the doings of our friends in Newport be unmentioned, I am constrained to present for publication a few brief particulars.

It is but little more than one year since I commenced preaching in this village—at first, but one quarter, now one half the time. Previous to this no meeting of our order had been held here except occasionally. Our congregation small at first, has been steadily augmenting, and may now number about 200. On the first day of the current year we organized a Society on Christian principles, of 40 members—more are expected to unite soon. I may say the blessings of the Lord are indeed upon us. With one exception the events of Providence have thus far been propitious. The removal by death of our esteemed and efficient Br. Keeler, on whom we so much relied for building up the cause in this place, at the very commencement of our efforts, seemed really at the time like the frowning of Providence; but it has since seemed, (and with humble gratitude to the all wise Disposer of events, we remark it,) that even this afflictive dispensation has been sanctified to our good. It was truly a severe blow—a disheartening event; but our friends have felt chastened thereby, and I trust they have been more fully led to cast their cares and interests upon the arm of the Almighty, and to depend less upon the arm of mortals.

Among the permanent members of our congregation we count some three or four respectable individuals who, I believe, prefer the name of Unitarian; but if they are not pleased with hearing the prominent doctrine of Universalism preached, they are entitled to much credit for their forbearance in manifesting no disapprobation. So far as I know, a unity of feeling and interest, if not of opinion, exists; and we anticipate no disunion. We have now a neat convenient and comely church, finished and furnished in a chaste and beautiful style at a cost of about $3300. Our Unitarian friends contributed liberally for its erection, and should a division take place, which probably never may, they would be entitled, I suppose, to one quarter of the house.

For the gratification of our friends, and in accordance with the common custom, I notice the dedication of our house which took place on the 25th ult. The dedicatory exercises were performed as follows:—

1. Introductory remarks by way of congratulation to the proprietors of the house, by Br. M. B. Smith. 2. Anthem by the Choir. 3. Reading of select Scriptures and invocation, by Br. A. C. Barry. 4. Hymn. 5. Dedicatory prayer by Br. M. B. Smith. 6. Hymn. 7. Sermon by Br. M. B. Smith from Job xxi: 15. 8. Address by Br. P. Hathaway. 9. Voluntary by the choir. 10. Benediction.

In the afternoon a sermon was preached by Br. Buckingham (Unitarian,) and in the evening one by Br. G. W. Anderson; after which a social conference was had, in which many participated. On the next day, for our meeting was held two days, we had a sermon from Br. Barry, and one from Br. Hathaway, and another from Br. Buckingham. Br. Hicks was also present and took part in the services. The house was well filled throughout and for some part of the time much crowded, and if the people were not generally pleased, joyous, grateful, and happy, there is no safety in judging from appearances. #### INTEMPERANCE.

In looking about us and viewing the various aspects and conditions of society, we can not fail to perceive the fearful bias towards dissipation, prevailing so extensively in our land, and which is settling down like a canker, a plague-spot, upon our hopes and our high places.

But we have the happy assurance that the eyes of the multitude are beginning to open to this subject; and the consequence is, that a successful and exterminating war is now raging with great violence, and constantly enlisting many bold and vigorous defenders in its ranks, who portray in vivid colors their former road to desolation and ruin, and continually bear testimony to the truth of the maxim, that "vice may be seated in a dazzling pavilion, decorated in all the shining apparel of this lower world; but the dagger of death is hid beneath her robes."

And beside all these laudable efforts for the suppression of the use of "the black waters of death and Acheron," there is another species of a much wider influence, and deadly as wide, which causes the heart to writhe with astonishment at the recital. I mean that religious mania which now infests our country to so great an extent. While the cup of inebriation destroys its thousands; religious dissipation and madness, destroys its ten thousands; and a species of warfare is carried on in the bosom of families, often by those very persons who are battling manfully against the use of intoxicating drinks. Such conduct ought to be condemned by every philanthropist.

I do not wish to deprecate any laudable undertaking, or to speak disrespectfully of that religion taught by St. James, which is pure and undefiled, and full of good fruit; but against that founded on the fear of hell, and the fabled demon, which is considered so essential to the salvation of souls. It is this that spreads discord and desolation over all the earth, and causes quarrels and dissensions to exist in the domestic circle. It is this that drives reason from her throne, and often dispels every ray of hope that gleams upon the desponding heart. Go ask the father what destroyed the reason of his son; he will respond from the deep recesses of his heart, the blighting effects of human creeds and inventions of men. Inquire of the fond mother, where now is the friend of her youth, the companion of her old age; she will point you for an answer, to yonder lunatic asylum, where he was driven by the soul-destroying doctrine of Calvinism. Go ask the brother for the sister—the daughter for the mother; and they will tell the same heart-rending story, which is enough to make humanity shudder and weep at the baleful effects of human folly. Is not this enough to cause the philanthropist to arise in his strength, and put forth every laudable effort to stop these almost fiendish human forms, in their wild and destructive career?

May every one soon be made sensible that the cause of humanity is the cause of truth, the cause of man, the cause of God; and that it is incumbent upon all to exercise those faculties bestowed upon them by their Creator, in the propagation and advancement of this, the noblest of all causes, the cause of humanity and truth. We will close in the language of the Poet—

"Truth crushed to earth will rise again,
The eternal years of God are hers;
While error wounded, writhes in pain,
And dies amid her worshippers."

JUSTIFICATION.

"And not as it was by one that sinned, so is the gift; for the judgment was by one to condemnation, but the free gift is of many offences unto justification." Rom. v: 16.

"The free gift is of many offences," etc. As this reads, it might be supposed, with a hasty perusal, that the free gift proceeded from the many offences. But the sentiment of the apostle is quite at variance with this. This gift is spoken of in the fifteenth verse as "the gift by grace," and could not therefore come of offences. Some men say that if they believed in a free gift unto all, which would result in the justification of all, they would continue to indulge in the worst possible sins, all the days of their lives. This would be acting on the rule that justification proceeds from many offences. But the apostle anticipates such a plea, and promptly shows that he advocates no doctrine like it, and that those who fancy that they could act upon such a rule are not yet justified. "What shall we say then? Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound? God forbid. How shall we that are dead to sin live any longer therein?" Of course, those who think that the certainty of grace for them would prompt them to live in sin, as though grace proceeded out of their sins, only deceive themselves,—

They are not yet dead to sin—are not justified; and their boast is proof of it. The apostle, then, did not teach that the free gift comes of sin. *He taught that the gift acted upon the offences—not the offences upon the gift. This is his meaning—"the free gift is unto justification of many offences." We shall see in what sense, soon.

The apostle is not to be understood here as justifying man in his offences, or as furnishing any evidence of the justification of sin as such. Some men have the doctrine that they are justified by the gift of Christ's righteousness, attributed to them, in the midst of their worst sins. Many persons have the hardihood, even, to declare that the same actions which would be sinful in them without this imputed gift, are by it constituted innocent. Thus—if, without the imputed righteousness of Christ, they hate their brother man, they are then sinful; but if they possess this imputation, and by any means hate their brother, in that case, their hatred is justified. This is contending for a justification of the actual existence of sin. But it is not the meaning of Paul. He never teaches that offences themselves can be justified. His doctrine is that it is the office of the free gift to produce justification, by the removal of the offence—by freeing man from sin.

The apostle confirms this position before he leaves our subject. He shows us, in the course of his argument, what he means by the justification of offences.—For the same Greek root, if I mistake not, which is translated justification, in the passage at the head of this article, is rendered freed, in the 7th verse of the next chapter. "He that is dead is freed from sin." Here then, in these two passages, the justification of many offences, and freedom from sin, have the same meaning.

Having described the super-abounding of divine grace, he proceeds to show that this grace is no invitation to continuance in sin. "How shall we that are dead to sin, live any longer therein?" This kind of death he describes as follows. "Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but also alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. vi: 11. It was an aversion to the many offences which have crept into the world, and an earnest devotion to the principles of righteousness. Rom vi: 12, 13. In this sense, then, "he that is dead is freed (justified) from sin"—that is, he is in a state of justification. This is the justification which the free gift is designed effect. Rom. v: 12-21. The whole argument of the apostle, then, seems to be this. "The first offence resulted in condemnation. Since that time offences have greatly multiplied. But the gift is much more extensive than the offence. For the judgment was condemnation for the first offence; but it is the office of the grace of God, and the gift by grace to effect justification as extensively as the many succeeding offences have abounded. The gift by grace is so much more than the offence, that it will free (justify) mankind from all the many offences which have followed the first one, give them an aversion to vice, and a love of holiness, in which justification, they will ultimately reign in life by one Jesus Christ. #### REVIEW,

Of Rev. Mr. Laird's Sermon against Universalism, preached in the Dutch Reformed Church, in Fort Plain, on Friday evening, December 16th, 1842.

"He that is first in his own cause seemeth just; but his neighbor cometh and searcheth him." Prov. xviii: 17.

The time has been; when our faith was attempted to be opposed by argument, and by proofs drawn from the sacred Scriptures—when men were contented to take it as it really was, to state its evidences truly, and to give them at least a passing examination. But that time has gone by. The most ingenious, and unnatural and unchristian means are now resorted to in order to put the system of Universalism down, or to check its rapid advancement among men. It is called delusive and soul-destroying, and vile and abominable; and the very liberal and charitable Editor of the N. Y. Evangelist, styles it, "the double-distilled deception of hell." And not contented with waging so dishonorable a warfare against the system itself, they attack and defame the character of its believers and advocates. It is no uncommon thing for us to be called the offscouring of the earth—the refuse of society, a low and vicious set of characters, without a single redeeming quality among us all. But do you think that such arguments ever converted a Universalist? or hindered the progress of the doctrine of the Restitution? I will tell you what they have done, or helped to do—to further those very principles they were used to destroy, and to cast disgrace upon those by whom they were used.

In all the attacks made upon our system within the last few years, it has been altogether misrepresented.—It is defined according to the conception or the impression of the individual who wishes to deal it a few hard blows; so he sets himself to work, and builds up a man of straw, and calls it Universalism and straightway tears it in pieces. But after all this labor has been performed, the poor man has accomplished nothing—that which his soul abhors so much, exists still—it remains untouched and unharmed.

Our opposers labor under one very great disadvantage—they have no correct knowledge of our doctrine—the means of information are within their reach, but they make no use of them. We have books and periodicals devoted to the advocacy, illustration and defence of our principles, and yet read them they will not; and why, they best can tell. But to decide upon the merits of a system ere that system has been examined, is absurd and foolish; and to condemn a large and respectable body of Christians on hear-say testimony, is extremely wicked.

It may be thought, indeed, that there is no harm in preferring vile and unfounded charges against Universalists—that they were made to be mocked and trampled upon with impunity, and hence have no claims upon human sympathy, or the charities of Christians. And still it would seem as though this could not be; but why we are scorned, and buffeted, and denounced, and called infidels and blasphemers, and haters of God, is more than we can tell. Perhaps it is because we differ from the great mass of Christians in sentiment. But they differ as much from us, as we do from them: and the greater the difference, the more room there is for the exercise of charity.

In the recent attack made upon Universalism in this place, we expected, as we had a right from what we had heard of the man, a greater degree of fairness than was exhibited. Indeed, his professions of love and regard in the commencement of his labors on that occasion, led us to entertain the hope that he would deal charitably with our sentiments and with ourselves. But disappointment is the lot of mortals, and we were doomed to be disappointed. The profession and practice of our good brother were sadly at odds. He did not exercise that kindness towards us which he said he would. And not content with misrepresenting our doctrine in its very positions, he attacked the characters of its believers, and gave his hearers to understand that they were as corrupt as sin could make them. If this was prompted by charity and good will, then we confess we have been greatly at fault, and have need to learn our Christian lesson over again.—But to the work before us.

The Rev. gentleman entered upon his subject by saying, that there were two systems claiming to be gospel—the one the opposite of the other—both, therefore, could not be true: or, in other words, both could not be the Gospel. He then proceeded to lay before us the plan of his discourse, which was to inquire. 1st. What is the Gospel? 2. What is the system of Universalism? 3. What are the proofs of its falsity? This plan struck us at the time as being a very singular one; and upon examination since, we have not had occasion to alter our mind. The first inquiry alone was sufficient; for if he could have proved that the Gospel and Universalism were opposites—that they bore not the least resemblance to each other—that the last formed no part or portion of the first, then his work would have been accomplished. But there is policy to be used in war, and there is a way to darken and mistify.

The Gospel was defined to be a system that taught deliverance from sin and its consequences, or from the punishment of sin. Was there any proof offered in support of this definition? Not a particle—it was taken for granted, and who, among so ignorant a set of people as those in Fort Plain, would dare deny it!

Next Universalism was defined to be a system that denied deliverance from sin and from punishment of sin—in this consisted its peculiarity. This statement is false in two particulars. 1. It does teach deliverance from sin, and in this respect goes far beyond all other systems of the day; for it teaches the deliverance of the whole human race from all corruption and depravity. 2. The peculiarity of Universalism does not consist in its denial of deliverance from merited punishment. It is not a negative system. It affirms as well as denies. And its peculiarity consists in its teaching the final holiness and happiness of all mankind. This distinguishes it from all other doctrines, and makes it what it is. Our brother, therefore, does not touch the question at issue between us. To have come to the point he should have inquired, does the Gospel teach the ultimate salvation of the whole world from sin and death? This was the question for him to have discussed. To discuss any other, is to leave the distinguishing doctrine of Universalism untouched. It would be like attacking election and reprobation in order to prove the doctrine of endless misery false. After I had succeeded in showing that the first were not taught in the word of God, I would still have to prove that the last was not true.

Our system does, indeed, teach that there is no escape from deserved punishment—that God could not withhold it and still be just; and in this particular it does but follow the Scriptures. They are positive in affirming that though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished—that he that doeth wrong, shall receive for the wrong that he hath done; and that though God forgives iniquity and transgression, and sin; yet he will by no means clear the guilty. But this, we remark again, is not the point that distinguishes our doctrine from that of endless misery. While this doctrine teaches the salvation of a part, only, of the human family, and the eternal punishment of the remainder, the other teaches the complete deliverance of every intelligent creature from all sin, and the perfect holiness and happiness of all mankind in heaven. Here you have the peculiarities of the two systems as compared with each other; and to prove that either was not Gospel, you would only need to show that the Bible condemned it, and plainly supported its opposite. Your work would then be accomplished—it would be done, and well done.

The preacher after marking out his very singular plan, and offering the foregoing definitions, proceeded to show that Universalism was not the Gospel, by asserting that it did not teach deliverance from sin. But it does teach this very deliverance, and therefore is a part of the Gospel according to his own definition.

In the next place he inferred it was not the Gospel, because it did not teach deliverance from punishment.—And this inference was drawn from an unsupported assertion of his own. He defined the Gospel to be a message that taught deliverance from the punishment of sin; but no proof was brought forward in support of this definition. Then what is his inference good for? And what bearing would it have had upon the true question, even were the definition a correct one? After he had succeeded in proving that Universalism, so far as it denied deliverance from punishment, was not the Gospel, the great question would still have remained untouched. Is the doctrine of universal salvation true? To have had his definition avail him aught, he should have extended it further; for if the doctrine of endless misery be true, it forms a part of the Gospel, and should have been included in the definition. After having proved, by plain and positive testimony that this doctrine did form a part of the Gospel, then he might have drawn the inference, that Universalism had no foundation in the word of God—nay, the conclusion would have been unavoidable, that it was false and baseless. But nothing of this kind was attempted—when it is, we will enter upon our defence.

The next position taken by the speaker was, that if Universalism is the Gospel, then Jesus Christ was less competent or less honest, than are the advocates of this system. "Either," said he, "Christ did not know anything of it, or knowing it, did not preach it." But in what manner was this attempted to be sustained? 1. By saying that eternal punishment was a popular doctrine when Christ came, and that he did not oppose it. We admit that this doctrine was somewhat popular among the Pharisees, and it was very popular, indeed, among the heathen; but we do not admit that it was left untouched in the labor of the Saviour. In all his teachings he struck directly at the root of this doctrine. He urged the duty of forgiving enemies on the ground that God would forgive his. He declared that he had come to seek and save that which was lost; that the Father had given all things into his hands, and all that had been given to him should come to him, and those that came to him he would in no wise cast out. In this general manner, and through the medium of the truths of his own divine system, did he oppose the erroneous doctrines of men without calling them by name.

2. The position was attempted to be sustained by showing what kind of a preacher the Saviour was, from two or three disconnected passages of Scripture. The first passage introduced was from Matt. xxii: 33, "How can ye escape the damnation of hell?" The meaning of this language was left for the hearer to determine; though it was quite evident that the speaker would have us believe that it meant endless misery. But had he read on he would have found his quotation in no wise suited to his purpose. (See 34, 35 and 36th verses.) We may see from this, that the damnation was something which would soon overtake the Scribes and Pharisees, and in this world.

Another passage quoted is found in John viii: 21. "I go my way, and ye shall seek me, and shall die in your sins; whither I go ye can not come." But it must be recollected that this same language, in part, was addressed unto the disciples. "Ye shall seek me; and as I said unto the Jews, Whither I go, ye can not come, so now I say unto you," xiii: 33. This he explains by saying, "Whither I go, thou canst not follow me now; but thou shalt follow me afterward." 36th v.

The third and last passage introduced was from Luke, but as it does not contain the language of Christ, we need not notice it here.

When these quotations were concluded, the question was asked with an air of triumph, "What would you think of a Universalist preacher who should preach like that?" And our very charitable brother made an attempt at being witty, by concluding that there was too much brimstone about such preaching for Universalists, and that if Christ was on earth now, and should make use of such language again, he would be turned out of the denomination. But he made merry at his own cost; for he utterly failed in showing that the Saviour preached the doctrine of endless misery. His reliance was upon words, without regard to the scope or connection of the passage in which they occurred, and they have failed him, as they will fail every man who makes the same use of them.

Another position taken by the preacher, was, that if Universalism be true, there are some perplexing cases in the Bible. "The disciples of our Lord, (said he,) preached about a judgment to come; but it would be strange to hear a Universalist preacher preach about the same thing." The dear man I suppose did not know that a judgment might be "to come," in the days of the apostles, and yet long since have been executed. And yet it is so, notwithstanding. In order to have had the phrase, "judgment to come," answer his purpose, he should have shown that the apostles used it in reference to the immortal world. But this he did not attempt to do; and therefore his first perplexing case stands not in the way of Universalism.

Another case introduced was that of Annanias and Sapphira. "These," said the preacher, "were struck down dead, and went right to heaven." By this he would represent our doctrine as teaching what it does not teach, that individuals, no matter how sinful, die and go immediately among the angels, and lay their unwashed hands upon the holy things of the upper world. This is false in two particulars. 1st. Universalism does not teach that men go immediately to heaven after death. 2nd. It does not teach that any enter there unpurified, polluted and wicked. It leaves all when this mortal existence is ended, in the hands of a just and kind Father; and only contends that through whatever course of discipline they may be called to pass, they will finally be changed into the image of Christ, and become the inheritors of bliss immortal and divine. All else is a matter of individual sentiment or opinion, with which the doctrine in question has nothing to do. It leaves the whole subject where the apostle Paul left it. It was enough for him to know, that when all things were subdued unto the Son, then the Son also himself would become subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all. He did not concern himself with the exact period when, nor how, this was to be brought about; but was satisfied with knowing that in God's own time the work would be accomplished, and a world saved.

We have been thus particular in defining our doctrine, because it is oftener misapprehended and misrepresented upon this point, than upon any other. And with the facts before you as we have given them, you can judge how much perplexity there is in the case under consideration. Annanias and Sapphira committed a great sin, and forfeited their lives in the very commission as a punishment for that sin. But bear in mind, that after the judgment of God has fallen upon them and cut them off from life for their crime, our doctrine does not represent them as going immediately into heaven; but goes forward to a time however distant, when they and all mankind shall be purified of sin and guilt, and raised to an equality with the angels. Thus the most sublime prophecies will be fulfilled—Christ see of the travail of his soul, and be satisfied, and God be all in all. But let us see what comes next.

"The present system of Universalism," says Mr. Laird, "was originated by Hosea Ballou and others, and is about twenty five years old." Well done, for our good brother! This very same Hosea Ballou, who he says studied grammar after he had entered the ministry, has preached the doctrine for more than forty years!! and preached it precisely as now.

There is something very curious in the manner in which our opposers deal with this doctrine. Sometimes they tell us that it was preached by the serpent in the garden of Eden; and again we are informed that it is altogether a heresy of the present century. But we believe Mr. Laird is the first one who has discovered that it is only about twenty five years old! The fact is that the system of Universalism, so far as its distinguishing features are concerned, has always been the same; and to those who will attend here next Sabbath evening we will prove that it is as old as Christianity itself, and was generally received by the early fathers.

Another reason given why Universalism could not be the Gospel, was, that the Gospel caused the expression of great solicitude, which the other did not. But how did the speaker know that it did not? Why, a man who had been in the Universalist ministry for twelve years, had said, that during that time he never knew any one to cry out under his preaching, "What must I do to be saved?" Very likely; but is any one at liberty to infer that this is so in all cases? By no means. By the faithful preaching of Universalism, thousands have been aroused, by the blessing of God, to inquire the way to eternal life, and to seek with anxiety for deliverance from their gloomy doubts and fears, and the pardon of their sins.

The witness by whom it was attempted to be proved that our system made no one solicitous in regard to the welfare of the soul, is Rev. M. H. Smith. In order to show you that his testimony is not to be relied upon, I will state a few facts concerning him. Previous to entering our ministry, he had been united with the Christian denomination. While with us he was convicted of wilful and deliberate falsehood, and confessed himself guilty of the same. In addition to this, he renounced Universalism, no less than three times, but returned back soon after each renunciation, and plead that he did not know what he was doing at the time—that he was not conscious of the step he had taken, and could not and would not preach the doctrine of endless misery. This declaration was repeated to a congregation of two thousand people, only about two weeks previous to his last renunciation! But the Universalist denomination refusing to receive him again into fellowship, or to countenance him in any way; he went over to our opposers, and has been employed by them to slander and denounce those by whom he was cherished even in his unworthiness, and who sought to convert him from the error of his ways. This M. H. Smith has recently put forth a work which contains specimens of the blackest ingratitude, the deepest malignity, and the foulest slander.—But let us hear the testimony of his brother. (See Magazine and Advocate Vol. 13, p. 357.)

We have thought it necessary to introduce thus much concerning the Rev. Mr. Smith in order to undeceive the people respecting him, and to show that his testimony against Universalism is not to be relied upon in the least. The only conclusion we can arrive at is, that he is either insane, or desperately wicked. A. C. B.

ONE MORE APPEAL,

To those indebted to the late firm of Grosh and Hutchinson, whose accounts have been assigned to D. Skinner.

These accounts were all due some time since—some of them years ago. The debtors have been called on again and again, most of them both publicly and privately, and in most cases in vain, and the debts still remain unpaid! They are once more respectfully informed that the money must be had. By my endorsements for the above named firm I have now got to pay nearly $2000 at the Bank, where it was due several months since.—The Bank requires immediate payment—I know not how many days before legal proceedings will be commenced against me. This, together with the fact that I am largely in debt on my own account, should satisfy all the above named debtors, of my imperious necessities at this time, and prompt them to a speedy settlement of their accounts. I have waited on many of them till patience is exhausted—I can wait no longer. The Bank and my other creditors are imperious in their claims; and I have no alternative but to force payments by law where they are not made voluntarily. Some of the demands are already in the hands of the lawyers, and others will be shortly. It is a sad alternative I allow, and one which I would gladly avoid; but I have no other. Let not, then, those who have to pay smart money complain of me. The fault is not mine. D. SKINNER.

There is also a large amount still due me on old subscriptions for the Magazine and Advocate while I was its publisher, besides the dues that have occurred since. I should feel greatly obliged, in my present necessities, if those old delinquents would pay up, or if Agents would collect and forward all or any part of their dues.

THE TRAVELLING PREACHER.

CHAPTER SECOND.

Reader, one more week has gone. How solemn the thought! How sadly falls upon the ear—gone! Yea, fled with its joys and its sorrows! There were the ringing shouts of glad and merry voices—the din of the busy mart—the sigh of the afflicted son of poverty, all, all locked up in the deep cell of the past, and memory alone tells of their existence! To many, the time wasted sweet and joyous smiles; to others, deep and heart-rending sorrows, but it has now fled forever! Reflect one moment, that one more week has taken its departure—is joined to that long catalogue of time which has fled afar, never more to return to the inhabitants of earth, and all of us are one more week nearer “that bourne from whence no traveller is permitted to return”—one more week nearer the thick, dark shadows of the slumbering tomb! Ah! do we realize this continued, onward flight of time? Do we consider, that long life consists not so much in the number and length of days, as in the right improvement of our powers, and hence it devolves upon us to be not prodigal of the valued moments which are ever silently falling, and hurrying us forward toward the end of the journey of human life?

Forgive, worthy reader—for worthy I doubt not you are—forgive these melancholy reflections. They are only the off-spring of the mind of one who has seen no little affliction, and one who at times is almost glad that various periods of life have fled and the rest for the afflicted nearer at hand. But let this pass, and while the prayer will ever be mine that prosperity may at all periods be your companion, like true friends we will consider ourselves in the village church again. And there, precisely as we left him, stands (or rather seems to hang by the chin) the travelling preacher. He has taken his text, and as he is going to ramble somewhat—pour forth a kind of heterogeneous mass, we will not endeavor to follow him minutely, but only take up and consider some of his most important sentences.

I have invariably discovered that these ranting preachers, who endeavor more or less to work upon the passions of the people, are invariably accompanied as a kind of aid, by a death skeleton and a certain gent who shall be nameless, but whose garments savor somewhat of sulphur. It was so with this man. They were there—not actually so, but in imagination, the only place in which they ever exist, and the speaker was careful to have one at each elbow to do his bidding, and from these three occupants of the desk, one real and two imaginary beings, we may expect something valuable, and here it is—“My friends, I often hear people tell about being co-workers with God! Now, though men may be co-workers together, in the cause of Christ, yet God enters into no co-partnership with man! No! he is able to do his own business—no mistake!”

There is a sentiment, though clothed in rather roughly constructed garments, yet it is nevertheless plain and comprehensive truth. But, alas! how often is it lost sight of by those who take upon themselves the office of teachers. Nay; we can scarcely enter a church door but we are forthwith called upon to help God accomplish something. But go forth, vain mortal, in imagination, where stars are wheeling their endless revolutions around their centres, and where system rolls on system in the mighty deep—dwell with those works numberless, which adorn the “milky-way,” which were moulded in the hand of the mighty Architect, and sent forth upon their never-ending circles, and while you behold the utmost harmony reigning throughout the whole, and obedience to the institutions of the Lawgiver; then say, if he who accomplished these magnificent works, and who is clothed with infinity, will be defeated in his purpose by the will of man, the being of an hour, that perishes like the gourd that shaded the prophet’s head? Indeed, we rest assured that what God wills, will surely be accomplished. And though he may employ mankind as instruments by which to execute many designs; yet it is in this manner alone that man nurges forward the purposes of the Creator; and the idea that man has entered into, or can enter into a co-partnership with Him, is not only vainly absurd, but foolish in the extreme. But I opine, that there are many men of intellect more refined than that of this travelling promulgator of the Gospel, who would disagree with him in this sentiment, especially if we judge from that which we often hear while listening to their ministrations.—But as it is by far the most wise course for us to pursue, to receive truth however roughly clothed, in preference to error, though arrayed in the most splendid attire, we will acquiesce in this sentiment of the preacher, and rest assured that the Creator is able to accomplish his own purposes.

But hark!—and hear the man again, as he speaks of conversion:—“My hearers, I frequently hear of the number which this man has converted, and that man converted, but I have invariably found that where a preacher converts a person, he is always made worse than before; but I tell you when God converts a man, he makes a better man of him—that’s truth!”

Truly, truly it is; and you might have safely added, as you did before—“no mistake.” Let us take a view of the community and we shall immediately behold how correctly the speaker discourses. We may look upon the whirlwind of fanaticism as it sweep over the children of men, and we shall behold it bearing upon its wings the darkness of a midnight gloom. Tears may fall thick and fast, and many heavy sighs rend the bosom—many fervent prayers may go up before the throne of God for protection; and many desires may be expressed and linger in the mind for the blessings of religion; but soon the excitement is past, and what do we behold? A thousand little animosities have been engendered—neighbor is at enmity with neighbor—friend is embittered towards friend—the social intercourse of society is destroyed, and when we candidly reflect upon it, we must agree with the quaint preacher, that when the minister converts a person, he is worse than before.—But when God converts one, the conviction comes, not in the wrath and fury of the desolating whirlwind, but in the soft whisperings of “the still, small voice,” and enters the soul—purifies the affections—ennobles the sentiments, and places him upon the exalted stand of virtue and morality; and we would to God, that there could be less of these human conversions, and more that are heavenly and divine. We will now attend to the preacher again and hear him speak of a change of heart: “Hearers; you have heard much about a change of heart, and now what is it? Simply a change of the affections—their being taken from the vanities and vices of earth, and placed upon the religion of Jesus.”

Here is an evidence of no little sober thought, and well would it be for the community, were it to claim more attention than it does; for it is indeed worthy of it. Reader, make the inquiry of those who are so clamorous respecting “change of heart,” “new birth,” etc.—ask them in what it consists, and how few, alas! there are, who know aught about it beyond its very name. It is an incomprehensible something no one knows what, that comes down from above like the electric bolt, and in the twinkling of an eye, changes the crime-hardened and vicious man into a saint, with a mind spotless and pure. And for this reason, many wait long, long years for the appearance of this wonderful period, when they will be bereft of their hard heart of total depravity, and in its stead, receive one spiritually embalméd. Vain are the allurements of the world! When will that period arrive in the which men will learn that a change of heart is no more or less than a change of purpose for the better? That thereby is severed the tie, which the affections have bound around the vanities of human life—the mind led away from vice, and carried upward and aloft, and left in the contemplation of the beauties of pure and undefiled religion.

Perhaps by this time it may be supposed, that the opinion formed upon the first view of the stranger was erroneous; but this is a wrong conclusion, for thus far, I have sifted his discourse and given only that which seemed worthy of consideration. But now we will select a specimen of the rest of the sermon, in which the speaker gave us a criterion by which to judge the Christian.

“I will tell you, my friends, who’s a Christian—it is the man that hates sin; and the more he hates it, the better Christian he is—the legitimate end of sin is to be hated by the Christian.”

The utterance of these words brought to remembrance the reading of some celebrated philosopher, wherein the sage discourses mightily upon the use of spiders and flies, and the object for which they were created. And for the life of me, I can not at present recollect his name, which is a circumstance the more sincerely regretted, since his reasoning, and that of the preacher, are so perfectly parallel. But while I have suffered his name to be lost, his reasoning is indelibly stamped upon my memory, and was on this wise:—“For what were spiders created? This I am aware is an important question; but still how easily answered—to catch flies! Does the reader doubt? Let him turn his eye to the window, and there behold the little industrious creature weaving its web for that very purpose. The position is established beyond contradiction! But what were flies created for? This is another important question; yet as easily answered as the other—for spiders to catch! Does any one doubt? Let him turn his eye to the window again, and behold them answering the same purpose. The position is established beyond contradiction!”

How perfectly in harmony with the above sage reflections are the words of the preacher—nay, I am almost persuaded that he obtained his idea of the Christian and sin from the same source. For what was the Christian made? To hate sin. No one can doubt this, for it is a matter of every day’s observation. But what was sin made for? For the Christian to hate! This is a position upon as firm a basis as the other.

Profound logician! Self-taught, but deep thinking man! The purpose for which sin was created and permitted to exist, is a question which has ever engaged the studied attention of Wisdom’s most celebrated sons! Many a brain by laboring upon this great subject, has been so much racked and turned from its proper channel, that it ever after was deaf to the voice of reason; yet here is a man who has lived all his days in comparative seclusion, whose mighty powers enabled him with the utmost ease to grasp the giant by the beard, and with a single stroke lay him dead at his feet! Pity that he had not lived in days of yore, for then the many hours which have been squandered in idle speculations upon the object for which sin was created, might have been employed for the moral improvement of mankind! But the subject is now forever at rest, and the world is relieved of a burden heavy and wearisome to be borne!

Shortly after the words relative to the Christian and sin, fell from the speaker’s lips, I observed that his eye brightened up a little; his sanguine temperament asserted its control over the lymphatic, which all along had held the predominance, and he sent forth a strain of eloquence which beggars all description. Suffice it to say, that he shouted, and he stamped—now rattling the dry bones of the death skeleton, and now sending off his sooty elbow companion on a kind of a cruise among the gaping congregation—now he would dive deep into the lower world, and bring up smoking emblems of the horrid despair of infernus, and now he would soar aloft, and in his flight open the celestial gates, and exhibit the beauties and joys of the heavenly kingdom; and then, grasping the Gospel in his hand, he urged the listening throng to let wisdom guide them in making a choice! At the end of this gifted effusion, we heard the solemn spoken “Amen,” his chin slipped from off the top of the desk, and he was gone.

All was silent! I tried my lungs—they would go! I turned around and gazed upon the congregation—no body was hurt! I looked out at the window—the weather was fair! The choir arose and performed a set piece, after which we left the house, fully persuaded that indeed the foolish thing of this world were chosen to confound the wisdom of the wise. —SCHUELER.

FUNERAL SERMON.

The substance of a discourse delivered at the funeral of Mrs. Harriet Marsh, wife of Sanger Marsh, and daughter of Judge Horton, Nunda, January 26th, 1843.

BY REV. A. KELSEY.

[Published by request.]

"For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." Romans viii: 38, 39.

This is the apostle's faith, touching the perpetuity of God's love to his creatures, as it exists, and was manifest in Christ Jesus our Lord. And a valuable faith it certainly is. It is one to which the believer can subscribe with grateful feelings, in the time of trouble, and "rejoice with joy unspeakable, and full of glory." This faith, Paul found equal to his wants, under all the persecutions and trials to which he was subject. And it is enough for the sorrow-stricken in every age of the world, if received in sincerity and truth. It contains the greatest blessing which the mourner and the mourning circle can enjoy on earth, because it reaches all their wants. It will give what is most needed, a firm trust in the goodness of God.

The importance of such a faith as the apostle has set forth in the text, is clearly seen, when we consider the fact, that we are prone to distrust the goodness and love of our heavenly Father, in the times of affliction and distress. And at such times we particularly stand in need of the assurance, that God loves us, and that his goodness shines gloriously, though behind this intervening cloud.

Without this blessed assurance, in the hour of affliction, we must mourn the loss of friends, and mourn too without hope—without that consoling hope, which the deep feelings of the soul demand. But with the consolation of this assurance, which God has given in his word, in the Gospel of his grace, we can say, "blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted."

At this time, respected hearers, we behold a circle of friends gathered around the remains of one deeply beloved, and highly respected. Here, we are called to sympathise with a widowed brother, who is bereft of one who possessed his affections and his confidence—one who has been permitted for a short time to share with him the joys and sorrows of life. They have been surrounded with the tokens of God's love and goodness, and together enjoyed the blessings of life, and the goodness of our God. But now she is gone, never to return. No more on earth can they be united, to share in the blessings of time. The companion has parted with the object of his affections by the hand of death. And while we sympathise with him in his great loss, his sorrowing heart is calling for religious consolation at our hands. And he certainly stands in need of the same, at this trying time; and most gladly would we find it in the Gospel, and offer it for his use.

We do sincerely believe, that the needed consolation may be found in the text. We know of no other fountain, but that of redeeming love, which can yield the comfort which is needed, to soothe the anxious heart. And that love is centred where Paul assures us it is, "in Jesus Christ our Lord"—in "the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world."

Now Paul was a believer in the grace of God, and the Gospel of his Son; and he understood the plan of redemption, and the power by which men were to be delivered from the bondage of sin. And he also understood the true foundation which God had laid for religious hope. He had tasted the waters of salvation, "salvation by grace," and could describe the joy. This he has done in the text. He was fully persuaded, that there was not any thing in the broad universe of God, that could separate them from that love which was in Christ Jesus. Death could not do it, angels could not; nor principalities, nor powers; things present nor to come. No—"nor any other creature," says Paul, "shall be able to separate us from the love of God."

That this sublime and glorious declaration was true, when applied to Paul and his brethren, no one can for a moment doubt. But that the same declaration is true, and applicable to us all, in this age of the world; some probably are disposed to deny. But it will not probably be denied, that this declaration is true of all believers. Indeed, it is admitted by all, that it is proper to say of believers, nothing "shall be able to separate them from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

But we shall be permitted to inquire, on the present occasion, whether it is right to limit this doctrine of the apostle, to the believers of this day, or even to believers in every age.

Now it is believed, and conceded by all denominations, that, "God is of one mind and none can turn him." That "he is the same yesterday, to-day and forever," and that with him, "there is no variableness neither the shadow of turning." No one pretends that God is a changeable being.

But with this truth in view, we must come to the conclusion, that it was not the works or faith, of Paul, or his brethren, that caused God to love them. It was nothing which they had done, that caused the love of God to be manifested in Jesus Christ. God had never met with any change of mind, or feelings, in consequence of any act of the creature. Indeed, he never changes from hatred to love, or from love to hatred. It is manifest then, that God loved the apostle and his brethren, before they loved God, or became Christians. If he never changes, he must have loved them while they were sinners. And this is true.

"But God, who is rich in mercy, (says Paul to the Ephesians,) for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ." Here you perceive, that God's great love, was manifested towards Paul, and his brethren, while they were dead in sins; therefore, this love did not depend, in the least, upon their faith, or their righteousness. This agrees with other portions of the New Testament. 1 John iv: 10. "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins." Here again, "God first loved them, and then sent his Son." Again, at the 19th verse. "We love him because he first loved us." Again, Rom. v: 8. "But God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us."

We are warranted, then, by the Scriptures, in believing, that God loved sinners, while in a state of sin and death. He loved Paul and his brethren while sinners, and "not for any works of righteousness which they had done." His love to them, was in no sense caused by their works. It was uncaused, and unchangeable. The creature did not cause the love of the unchangeable Jehovah, and therefore can not extinguish it. If God can not be changed by any circumstances, he must forever love all those whom he has once loved. This is beautifully and clearly demonstrated by the life and death of Jesus Christ. During the ministry of love and kindness which he performed, he endured all the insults that sinners in their malice could invent; and his love was not extinguished. In spite of all their hatred, he prayed, "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do." And he was the image of God.

Having now discovered, that God loved some sinners, "while dead in sins," and that his love is strictly unchangeable, one question more claims our consideration. Is God partial in his love to sinners? Does God love some sinners, and hate others?

Very few in the present day are willing to admit, that God was ever partial in his love to sinners. It is now generally believed, that God was, and is impartial. And if he is not partial, then he loved all sinners alike. And this is true. He commended his love to sinners, by the death of Jesus Christ, and of course, to all sinners for whom he died. And Christ "gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time." God commended his love to all sinners, then. This is further confirmed by those Scriptures which speak of the design of the mission of Christ. That "he was sent to be the Saviour of the world," "to reconcile all to God," and "take away the sin of the world."

The conclusion then is inevitable, that "the love of God, which was in Christ Jesus our Lord," for Paul, or Saul rather, and for his brethren, is there for the whole world. This is certainly a fair and scriptural conclusion. We think therefore, that Paul was influenced by no exclusive feelings, or partial sentiment, when he penned the text. That love of God which the apostle speaks of in the text, was not confined to him and his brethren. God loved all sinners before they could do any thing to create that love, and commended that love to them, by the mission of Christ, while all were ungodly. Is it not clear then, that sin can not turn it away, or extinguish it?

We can not suppose that God will change. And he certainly must change, if he ever ceases to love those, toward whom he commended his love, in Jesus Christ. He loved all sinners, and sent his Son to save them from sin, and that same love must be directed to that object, until the work is done. We may safely conclude then, that every child of earth, is privileged to believe what Paul recorded in the text. The faith of the Gospel, will inspire all that believe, with the same confidence and hope.

Now Paul's hope of the future, was based on that love of God which was manifested in Jesus Christ. His hope, therefore, was in God, and not in himself. Paul never hoped for the glorious resurrection state, with any reference to his own works as the cause of that blessing. He never thought of being saved in heaven, by the plea, "Lord, I have prophesied in thy name, and in thy name done many wonderful works." No. His language was "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God," "every mouth shall be stopped, and all the world become guilty before God."

We can not say then, even of a Christian in faith, that they have secured the love of God by their works; or, that they can earn the bliss of heaven. The Scriptures would not sustain us in the declaration. We can say that faith and obedience, will bring us into the enjoyment of that hope, which is "like an anchor to the soul," in the present life,—that confidence in God, which his unchangeable goodness is calculated to inspire.

God loved all sinners, and what that love was designed to do for one, it was designed to do for all. Therefore, I am fully persuaded that the doctrine of the text is of universal application. The infinite and unchangeable perfections of God prove this.—The universality and impartiality of his love, is positive evidence that the text is true to all. And the fact, that Paul appropriated the same to himself and brethren, is no evidence to the contrary.

Because God loved them, we are not therefore to conclude that he loved no more!

And since God loves all, we must conclude that he loves impartially. And that cause which could not separate one sinner "from the love of God," certainly can not separate others from that love, "which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." One love embraced all sinners, and that love was manifest in Christ for all, and was designed to bring the same blessing to all, in the times of God's appointment. Hence says the apostle, "Having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself; that in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in him." And again, "that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father."

Here is certainly a universal design. The apostle leaves no chance for a limitation. He uses the terms, "all things," "every knee," and "every tongue," and then to put his language beyond the possibility of mistake, he says, "of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth," thus referring to all the places where the ancients supposed men might exist. Paul thus embraced all the worlds, and the inhabitants of those worlds, about which the ancients had any notions, and therefore must be understood as meaning all intelligent beings. And as God "willed and purposed in himself," to accomplish this, "in the fulness of times," we think his love is in Christ for all, and equal to their salvation.

We have confidence, therefore, to use the language of our text with reference to all. We are justified in doing so, by the language preceding the text. "What shall we then say to these things? If God be for us, who can be against us? He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?"

Now we may just as well deny, that God "delivered up his Son," for any but believers, as to deny the application of the text to any others. For if God delivered up his Son, Jesus Christ, for all mankind, as the Scriptures abundantly testify, then he certainly commended his love to all in Christ Jesus; and if his love is unchangeable in reference to one, it must be so to all. And if nothing can separate one individual from that love which is in Christ, and which was uncaused by the works of the creature, then there is nothing which can separate the rest from the same. Therefore "I am fully persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God," or one single soul whom he has once loved.

Here is the foundation of all religious confidence, and the only foundation on which it can rest. Take away this foundation, and the temple of Christianity is levelled with the dust, and religious consolation out of the question, so far as reasoning minds are concerned. But with this truth, the heart of the mourner may be made to rejoice, and "the tongue of the dumb to sing." With this we can recommend the Gospel to the sorrow-stricken mourner as a source of never-ending consolation. And if we receive this truth, that nothing can "separate us from the love of God," "into good and honest hearts," we can draw forth "the waters of life," and salvation, to refresh us in the time of trouble.

And its effects will be glorious and sublime.—Paul and his brethren received this truth, and felt its saving power. They came to the knowledge of that love of God which was in Christ Jesus, and it was enough for all their wants. And just as fast as others come to the saving knowledge, it will be attended with the same happy consequences. Now Paul did not strengthen the love of God, by believing in it; neither did he render that love immutable, by coming into the enjoyment of the same. It was immutable, and directed to him, while he was "dead in sins," and unbelief. And we do not expect to cause God to love us, or to strengthen that love and render it unchangeable. He loves us, and that love is unchangeable already. God needs no change in his mind in order to love us; and having loved us, he needs not our assistance to prevent him from hating us. He will not change.

"God is love," and wherever any being shall become acquainted with him, he will be a God of love. And we have authority for believing, that "all shall know the Lord from the least unto the greatest." He is "good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works." And in the text we are assured, that nothing can "separate us from that love, which is in Christ Jesus."

Then certainly we ought not to distrust his love under any circumstances in life. God's love is not gone nor changed, when afflictions are sent upon us. If we could see as God sees, we should discover that none of these things are inconsistent with his love. And when death snatches from our embrace the object of our affections, and causes us to mourn, then we should let the assurance of the text, that, "death can not separate us from the love of God," dwell in our hearts. Oh no. Death has not separated the object of your affections from the love of God. Nothing shall be able to separate one object which God has loved, "from that love which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." The love is not in the creature, nor is it the creature's love which is spoken of; but it is "the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

Beloved friends, it is our happy privilege through the kindness of God, and the revelation of his grace, to believe this truth, and say with one of old "Return unto thy rest, O my soul; for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee." And truly, what greater blessing can we ask, than to be permitted to believe, in the midst of afflictions, that we are the objects of the love of God, in common with our entire race; and that, "neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from that love?" Is it not enough?

This is our privilege. By this faith in the great, universal, and ever-enduring love of God, we can look forward to the time predicted by the prophet, when the object of the same shall be accomplished toward our dying race. Isaiah xxv:—"And in this mountain, (the Gospel covenant,) shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, and he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations. He will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces; and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth: for the Lord hath spoken it."

Here we have the glorious assurance, that "death" the cause of sorrow, "shall be swallowed up in victory," and then, "tears shall be wiped from off all faces," and thus, "the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord," be enjoyed beyond the reign of death. This agrees with Paul's doctrine, "as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." Again 1 Cor. xv: 51. "Behold I shew you a mystery; We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed." This was probably said to counteract the skepticism referred to in the 12th verse. "Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?" Those who denied the resurrection of the dead, must have cherished the gloomy opinion, that "death is an eternal sleep." But Paul says "we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed," vs. 52. "In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump," etc. vs. 54. "So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory." The saying referred to we have already quoted from Isaiah. "He will swallow up death in victory, and wipe away tears from off all faces."

Therefore, we are not only assured that "death can not separate us from the love of God;" but we are instructed to hope, that "death will be swallowed up in victory, and tears be wiped from off all faces." This is a glorious theme to present to the mourner's thoughts, while the dark clouds of affliction hover over, and surround his pathway, and steal away his joys. For by this truth, he is permitted to look beyond the few fleeting joys and sorrows of life, to a future state of immortality, and feel the assurance, that unailing love is spread before us, in the world to come. With such a faith we can reflect, that death can not separate us from the love of God, but is one of the means, which goodness had ordained to bring his creatures to the enjoyment of himself. This is the door through which we must all pass on our journey to immortality. The resurrection will usher us into that state, but death must precede it.

And in conclusion I remark, that God has kindly permitted us, "through his great love wherewith he has loved us," to come into possession of this glorious hope, by faith and obedience. Faith in the Gospel, and obedience to its spirit, will enable us to enjoy the hope of heaven, while travelling through time, but faith nor obedience can give us that which is hoped for. This will bring us into the enjoyment of the unchangeable love of God, but we can not make that love. But if we receive the Gospel faith, and let that faith "work by love and purify our hearts," we shall be able to say with the apostle, "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." Or with the text—"For I am persuaded that neither death nor life, things present nor to come, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."—Then, though our friends are taken from us, we can hope to go to them, and in a world where sickness, sorrow and death can never come, join our ransomed race, and enjoy that love of God which is stronger than death,—from which nothing could separate one creature of his care. And in that state, where all death will be swallowed up in victory, and all tears be wiped from the faces of God's children, we shall take up the song of the Poet, and "sing with the spirit and the understanding,"

"So live forever, glorious King,

Born to redeem, and strong to save!

Then ask the monster, where's thy sting?

And where's thy victory, boasting grave?"

EVIL OVERCOME.

BY REV. S. J. GIBSON.

"Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good."
PAUL.

Throughout the whole economy of God relative to mankind, evil is overcome by the employment of means, bearing the impress of benevolence.—Though the wayward individual is, and often has been, the subject of the correcting rod, and experienced the displeasure of his creator, yet at an after period, when he becomes delivered from his iniquity, he looks back upon that affliction and is enabled to discover, that although at the time of its endurance it was grievous to be borne, yet at an after hour, truly did it yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness; and when he beholds this truth in all its loveliness, gratitude rises up in his heart to Him on the throne, for the unspeakable blessing of having his evil disposition destroyed, by the use of means, swayed by the dictates of love.

In truth, evil with man is one thing; but evil with the Deity is another and quite a different thing. The one has an end in view highly deleterious to the object toward which it is exerted; but the end for which the other is employed, one which it invariably accomplishes, is productive of beneficence; so that evil in the hands of the Creator, being only a means by which a good end is produced, does not in the least militate against the loveliness of his attributes, or convey to the understandings of men a belief that the Lord is not good unto all, or that his tender mercies are not over all his works.

But to overcome evil with good, is an injunction of Heaven, urgently set forth by the Saviour and Apostles:—"Ye have heard that it hath been said, thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy; but I say unto you, love your enemies; bless them that curse you; do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you, that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven, for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth his rain on the just and on the unjust:—"Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." Thus are we urged, to deal with those by whom we are surrounded, and this forms the basis of the practical part of Christianity, and the man who acts in this manner becomes thus far worthy of the name of Christian and an ornament to the cause of religion. And while all will thus freely acknowledge, how many there are who, by the doctrines they are proclaiming and defending, strongly declare the contrary, and even charge the God of heaven with returning evil for evil, instead of overcoming evil with good as he has commanded man.

The truth of the above will fully appear by lifting in imagination, the veil which hides time from eternity, and contemplating the scene before us.—There, upon yonder lake arises the voice of suffering, of anguish, and of woe! There, a wail of distress is heard, reverberating in the deep caverns of the sulphureous pit! There, not one gleam of hope shall ever dawn upon the human mind!—But there shall be despondency—there shall be sorrow, and there shall be woe, throughout the wasteless eternity of God! And who are those experiencing this dreadful and heartrending doom? None other than beings once endowed with the image of the Creator. But why are they subject to such bitter distress? Because in their shortsightedness they lifted up an evil hand against their Maker. And has God overcome that evil with good?

We wish that men, who honestly and sincerely believe the doctrine of endless woe endured by a portion of his fellow beings, to consider this matter with a candid mind. The Supreme Being has commanded mankind to overcome evil with good—it is one of the main principles of the Gospel—set forth by the Saviour and inspired men, and in consequence He would not act in an opposite manner, from that in which He has commanded mankind. We see not how this conclusion can be reasonably avoided; and yet it is set at naught by the popular doctrine of endless misery. Admit that those miserable beings have intended evil—that they have neglected the requirements and commandments of Heaven, yet while you are looking down upon their sufferings, behold this end in the economy of God, can you say from the candid convictions of your heart, that God has overcome that evil with good? Answer this question with the aid of your conscience, and we beseech of you, charge not the character of you Father above, with that which is so directly opposed to the spirit and instruction of the Gospel, and with that which would be the height of wickedness in man!

INCIDENT IN A RAIL ROAD CAR.

Whoever has performed a journey in rail road cars, must be well aware of the variety of character and condition, of those who make up this little world of mortals thus collected together. The attentive observer thus situated, will, at least, see a world in miniature, so far as people, character, and condition, are concerned. He will find himself, at times, mixed in with grave senators, politicians, priests, physicians, lawyers, merchants, farmers, fidlers, fanatics, and blacklegs, etc., etc. All of these, of course, belonging to the masculine gender. Of the fair sex, there is not generally quite so many; but in proportion to numbers, probably as great a variety of character and condition.

Thus situated, it would be very strange, indeed, if incidents did not sometimes happen worthy of a place in a traveller's journal. Such have happened—one of which, I am now about to relate.

On an excursion last Spring to Boston, I took my way on the northern route—entering a rail road car at the Cayuga bridge. It is not my intention to give a detailed account of my progress on the way—the stops I made—the pleasure I received from a call on Br. Montgomery, at Auburn, and Br. Grosh, at Utica; but I shall proceed to make way for the incident with as much brevity as possible.

Between Utica and Albany, I fell in contact with a modern revivalist. I am said to be, naturally of a taciturn disposition—but whether it arises from diffidence, the want of talents to speak great things, or wit to chatter nonsense, I know not—probably, a deficiency in all of these useful qualifications. Be this as it may—I had long been a silent observer of the motions of the mixed multitude in which I was placed—particularly so, of the uneasy and fidgety movements of a man, who seemed to act, and look, as though he wanted to be biting a ten penny nail. I do not know but my white hairs, and sober visage, had some attraction to draw this apparently unhappy mortal towards my humble self—something at least brought him into my vicinity—for he seated himself on the end of a slip opposite, and close to the one I was sitting upon—and after a little wig-gling, and twisting, and several haws and hems, he popped the following question. [But, as the conversation that followed, would probably be better understood by giving it, as it in reality took place—the form of a dialogue, I shall proceed with my relation in that way—assuming for myself the initials, J. K., and for my conversationalist those that will best designate his character, viz., R. V.]

R. V. Pray, sir, what part of the country are you from?

J. K. From Pa., sir. [I believe that I started a little, and stretched up an inch or two higher on my seat.]

R. V. What is the state of religion in your parts, sir?

J. K. O, Sir—about as it is in other places—we have our ups and downs, on that subject. But in the vicinity where I reside, the people are pursuing "the even tenor of their way." They neither set the mountains on fire, nor cause rivers to run the contrary way from the course nature had appointed. There is, occasionally, a little fire on our borders; but as it is always attended with more smoke than blaze, it has never scathed any true believer in the Gospel.

R. V. [Starting as if surprised.] Pray, Sir, what are your religious professions?

J. K. A singular question, sir, and one which you have no right to put—but never mind, I will answer it. I profess, sir, to be a Christian. I believe in ONE GOD—the Creator and supporter of all beings. I believe in the LORD JESUS CHRIST—the Son of God, who, by his death, and resurrection, "brought life and immortality to light—conquered death and hell, and him that had the power of death, which is the devil." And now, sir, let me participate in your boldness, and ask you a few questions. Do you believe, sir, in the resurrection of Jesus?

R. V. I do, Sir, most fully.

J. K. Nay, Sir, I am inclined to believe that you do not; but we shall see. What become of Jesus after his last appearance to his disciples?

R. V. This is a very strange question? You are trifling with me, sir!

J. K. Nay, Sir—not so—I was never more serious in my life; and as I answered all your questions, I shall insist that you answer mine.

R. V. Well, Sir—Jesus went to his Father in heaven.

J. K. But pray, sir—in what way did he go?

R. V. He was taken up in a cloud in presence of many witnesses.

J. K. Right, Sir. I rejoice that we thus far agree, apparently so, at least. And now will you please to inform me if you believe the sayings of Jesus, as recorded in the New Testament, were intended by him to be truths?

R. V. You are a very strange man, Sir! and from your manner in putting this question, I strongly suspect that you do not believe all the words of Jesus to be truth. But, Sir, He was the representative of God, and Truth—and could not utter a falsehood.

J. K. So I believe, Sir—notwithstanding your suspensions. But, let us see. You admit that Jesus was taken up to heaven in a cloud. I agree to the same truth. Now, Sir, let me ask you, if Jesus did not say, before he was thus lifted up into heaven—"And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me?"—If, after admitting that Jesus was the representative of TRUTH, itself—you dare not now make him a liar; perhaps, then, you can inform me what Jesus will do with all men, when he gets them all into heaven, according to his promise?

R. V. You are an infidel, sir—and I will not hold discourse with you!

Upon this—whether he thought that he had waked up the wrong passenger, or not—he steered off to the most distant part of the car, where he encompassed himself in the figure of a dummy—"looking daggers," however. There he remained, until the cars halted at a house for refreshment—after which, I saw no more of this man—but learned from some of the listeners to our conversation, that he was a getter up of revival meetings. But his name I did not distinctly understand.

I do not know, Br. Grosh, that this little incident is worth presenting to the public. If it is, I acknowledge you ought to have had it long ago. But a crowd of business was before me on my return from the east, and I had no time to con over my journal, and prepare incidents for publication—which I might find noted therein. So long was I thus engaged, that I forgot all about my journal, till accident brought it to mind.

SECULAR NEWS.

The City Council of Cincinnati, very generously appropriated the sum of $2625 in aid of those who suffered by the late disastrous fire in that city. The donation is as proper as it is liberal.

A jaw bone of an animal is being exhibited in New Orleans. It is 16 feet 8 inches long, greatest breadth at the swallow, 6 feet 10 inches; has 49 perfect ivory teeth, and weighs 769 pounds.

BREACH OF PROMISE.—The Ithaca Chronicle says that a suit brought by Mary Conrad against Josiah B. Williams for breach of promise of marriage, was recently tried at that village and resulted in the verdict for the plaintiff of $8,000 damages.

The steamboat Amazon, which left St. Louis a short time since for New Orleans on her passage struck three times against snags. The first and second times serious inconvenience was occasioned, but the third time she sunk almost immediately in about ten feet of water.—She lies about 21 miles above the mouth of the Ohio, and will prove a total loss. No insurance.

A NEW TRICK.—In New York, the tenants who do not wish the landlords to rent the houses which they occupy on the first of May next—the period when houses are rented in that city—have put on at the end of the bill offering them to rent, the words, "Small pox here," which have a talismanic effect in restraining people from visiting them.

The Essex Banner says, Mr. Nathaniel Brown, of Kingston, New Hampshire, formerly travelling agent of the Exeter Mutual Insurance office, cut his wife's throat in a shocking manner, that her life was despaired of. It is said he was partially deranged, caused by over excitement on the Miller doctrine.

VESSELS OF WAR LOST.—It appears that in the great gale in the Gulf of Mexico, in September last, three vessels of war were lost, as they were in the Gulf at the time, and have not since been heard from. They were the English brig of war Victor, the French brig of war Dunois, and the Texan schooner of war San Antonio. Nearly or quite three hundred men perished with these vessels. The Dunois was from Havana for France, the Victor from Vera Cruz for the West Indies, and the San Antonio from Galveston to New Orleans.

LINES

Addressed to a lady after her marriage.

BY MISS CELIA M. TIBBITS.

Lady, I gazed upon thy fair young brow,
And sought the story of thy coming years,
To trace thy pathway through life's changing scenes,
And tell thy destiny of hopes and fears.

I gazed within the depths of thy clear eye,
And wished for once the gift might e'en be mine;
To pierce the darkness of the future's veil,
And know what destiny is marked for thine.

'Tis a vain thought—Earth has no magic wand
To ope the portals of thy coming life;
To lay before me all its varying scenes,
Its rainbow gladness and its dark'ning strife.

Yet will I pray for thee, that rolling years
May touch but lightly that transparent brow,
That care pass o'er thee with a gentle hand,
Nor cloud the sunshine wreathing o'er thee now.

And he, the loved one of thy youthful days,
He that looks on thee with his soul-lit eyes,
May he ne'er cause a cloud to darkly wreath,
O'er the fair concave of thy sunlit skies.

Joy—joy go with thee, loved and gentle one,
Through all the tumult of this life's dull care;
And may I meet thee in that better land,
Where smiles ne'er mark the heart's untold despair.

THE UNIVERSAL REIGN OF CHRIST...NO. III.

BY REV. ALSON SCOTT.

Having established, as I think, thus far, the doctrine of the triumphs of the Saviour, I will in the third and last place show this is the case from the nature of that reign, and its superiority over all other systems of government.

Christ rules not by might. His is a reign of love. No glittering crown adorns his brow. No pageant train attend to guard his body. No soldiers protect his realms with sword and bayonet. No thunders of wrath come from the capitol, denouncing the wayward as heretics, unworthy the care and protection of the Governor. No blood-shot eyes of malice are to be seen looking revenge upon any of the subjects. But, on the contrary, all the crown that ever adorned his temples was that of thorns, placed there by his enemies, and all the shield that protected him was that of love. This was the only principle upon which he acted. His is a government of peace—his subjects are made willing by persuasion and evidence of his goodness. They are controlled by the principles of good will. Not a rebuke is heard in the harsh tones of rage, not a punishment inflicted but such as are calculated to win the vile from their ways and lead them in the way everlasting.

Permit me here to ask, Where is to be found the person who sees, in reality, such things, that can resist? Where is that person but will at all times yield to the dictates of wisdom and love, when he is satisfied in regard thereto? He can not be found. Just convince a man that God is good, and cause him to realize the fact—enable him to realize that His children are all equally dear to him, that he sent his Son to redeem all from the thralldom of sin—and he can not resist; he will instinctively yield to the mandate and obey the rule. Thus it is with the Gospel of Christ. That is "good news of great joys which shall be to all people." And, not only so, but it is perfectly calculated to lead in paths of virtue and obedience. It points aloft to God as the ruler of all things, as ruling in love. It points to the effects of virtue and vice, and thus enables man to shun that which leadeth down to the chambers of death. Not so with other governments and principles. In them all we discover a partial rule. Some are favored, while others, for the same acts, are condemned to ignominy and shame. Tyranny and oppression are to be seen in all other systems or creeds. Look carefully and candidly, kind reader, at these things, and see the effects produced by the Gospel of Christ or his government, and that of the adversary, and you will not, you can not mistake. You will tell me that there is nothing else that will produce it all. Opposite principles have a tendency to clothe the mind in darkness, doubt and fear; destroying all confidence, hope, or assurance. Hence, then, the truth of the idea that Christ shall triumph over the enemy, destroy all rule, authority, and power, and bring all to bow at his shrine and "acknowledge him Lord to the glory of God the Father." "Then shall be heard great voices in heaven, saying, the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever." The new covenant will be fully written upon every heart, and "all know the Lord from the least to the greatest of them."

Ye drooping souls, dry up your tears, fear no longer, for your Redeemer still lives and will continue his reign until "sin shall be finished, an end made of transgression, a reconciliation effected for iniquity, and an everlasting righteousness brought in." Then shall the "kingdom be delivered up to God, even the Father, and he become all in all."

O, glorious hope! O, joyful consolation! We will fear no longer, believing that the "Lord God Omnipotent reigneth," and that he will remain a rock, a sure defence against all the wiles of the enemy, and finally deliver us with the whole creation, "from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God."

May such reflection, kind reader, inspire in your bosoms a confidence in God, that shall deliver from all doubts and fears, and enable you to exclaim in the language of the Poet,

"Rejoice, for the earth is resuming her splendor;
The flowers of Eden are blooming anew;
The tyrant of darkness, his throne shall surrender,
And freedom revisit the Gentile and Jew."

LOVE.

BY REV. U. CLARK.

Its origin is heaven, and wherever seen here, it makes earth heavenly. It is the spirit, the life of the soul, and kindles there angelic peace and joy. It sweetens all the obligations and relations which we sustain, and softens down the cares to which we are subjected. It supplants evil passions, and sustains the virtuous path. It speaks kindly, and in words and tones that vibrate through every nerve, and send home a divine thrill to hearts mutually plighted. Every look, every tone, every word, movement and smile—all are heavenly, beautiful, radiant!—thrilling through the soul with music meet for angels.

Hatred, how ugly thou art here! How sadly does man estrange from his nature in hating! and how cold is much of the world's friendship! And yet I would not say that earth is dreary and frigid—it is friendly—a world that we all love, and which we desire not to leave, unless the summons is imperative. There are attachments that bind us—scenes, and friends, and associations that live in memory with pure delights, and shed a fragrance and sunshine around our pathway, that make earth a fairy border along which we rejoice to linger, ere we are borne beyond the seas to fairer climes from which no wanderer returns to bring us tidings.

Let the fretful, and murmuring, and complaining, learn that these unhappy dispositions are the fruitful causes of their outcries against their earthly lot. Let them govern themselves aright, be reconciled to the wisdom of God, and cherish in their hearts kind, holy and friendly feelings, and they will no longer term this a cold and friendless world.

MILLERISM.

As this legitimate child of Partialism and Skepticism is making considerable stir and talk almost every where, we give the following, even at the risk of furnishing things old to the reader, as well as new. It is from the pen of Br. S. C. Loveland, of Reading, Vt., one of our soundest and most intelligent preachers. We copy it from the Universalist Watchman, of February 25th.

THE 2300 DAYS.

It is undoubtedly well known that the doctrine of the second advent of Christ, according to Mr. Miller's plan, is based, or professed to be based, on the 2300 days, named in Dan. viii: 14. Whatever other number in this book and in the Revelation, may contribute to make out this new and peculiar theory, and to strengthen the advocates of it in their faith, it is evident that the 2300 days constitute the main pillar. We are very much disposed to think that the calling of these days so many years, as the peculiar language of prophecy, is an assumption without proof. But we labor not at this time to controvert this position. We are now disposed to notice this scheme on the supposition that the advocates of the second advent, during the present year, are correct in interpreting these days as years. The whole length of the vision then is 2300 years. This position being once taken, the question then is, when do these years commence? The method for solving this question appears to be substantially as follows: That the 8th and 9th chapters of Daniel have an immediate and direct connection with each other. The 70 weeks of the 9th chapter, being considered 490 years, are cut out of the 2300 years, and therefore both must have a coeval date or commencement. All this being assumed or considered valid, the next step is to find the beginning of the 490 years. Starting from the crucifixion of Christ, in anterior time, after deducting 33 for the age of Christ, 457 remains for the period before Christ, where both the 490 and 2300 years commence. If then we subtract 457 from 2300, 1843 remains as true as mathematics. Thus we have the plan; now for the strength of its foundation.

In the first place then, let the reader notice that the 9th chapter begins a new subject, and has nothing to do in explaining the 8th. This separates the 70 weeks from the 2300 days, and makes them distinct and independent subjects. There is certainly nothing in the 9th chapter, that professes to explain the 8th. We are sometimes told that the angel explained to Daniel, in the closing part of the 8th chapter, the vision of the same chapter, except the time, which it is said was explained in the 9th chapter. But this last idea is entirely gratuitous. The angel explained to Daniel, all that he meant to explain of the vision, while he was about it. The time was undoubtedly thought sufficiently definite without explanation. But it is said the angel in the 23d verse of the 9th chapter, said to Daniel, "understand the matter, and consider the vision;" and there being no vision contained in the 9th chapter, what follows must explain the 8th, namely the 2300 days or years. But pray, what is a vision? It is something seen, or something to be seen. If the 70 weeks mentioned in the following verse, were not a vision that Daniel should understand, we know not what more appropriate name we could give them than to call them a falsehood. But they were true as shown to Daniel, and therefore were a vision to him.

It has before been observed that some translate the passage in Dan. ix: 24, "Seventy weeks are cut off;" &c., instead of the present rendering, "Seventy weeks are determined." They tell us that the very idea of the seventy weeks being cut off implies that they must be cut off from the 2300 days, understood to be 2300 years. But this does not necessarily follow. The idea of their being cut off means merely, that such an extent of duration is mentioned or determined for the described purpose. The common translation undoubtedly gives the true sense of the corresponding Hebrew in that text, although the definition, to cut off, is given in some lexicons, and may be perhaps more strictly literal.

One thing more concerning the commencement of the 2300 days. It is understood that the commencement of the days, whatever they are, can not take an earlier rise than the appearance of "the little horn," mentioned in the 9th verse of the 8th chapter. The little horn is applied by the second advent men to the Roman power. Now for the date of the rise of the little horn. All agree that "the rough goat," explained to mean "the king of Grecia," was Alexander the Great, or the power of Grecia in his day. When the great horn of the rough goat was broken, there came up in the room of it four notable ones, and from one of these arose "the little horn." The little horn must therefore follow the great horn of the rough goat, which is universally applied to Alexander the Great. Chronologers fix the death of Alexander at from 319 to 324 before Christ. The little horn following Alexander must still receive a later date; but according to Mr. Miller's plan, it must be dated at 457 years before Christ, or his whole theory is scattered in the wind. It will not help the matter to say the little horn refers to the commencement of the Roman power, and not to its manifestation after Alexander; for this was 700 years or more before Christ.

Thus we find the ground on which rests the second advent doctrine of the present day. It is not only precarious, but evidently inconsistent, and entirely without foundation in the sacred pages. Notwithstanding, it is believed and preached with an assurance, which could only become matters that rest upon the clearest and strongest testimony.—While multitudes are falsely flattering themselves, that they shall escape the grave by a sudden and aerial flight to the abodes of everlasting peace and rest, others are alarmed with the immediate burning of all terrestrial things, which they consider but a prelude to more enduring torments and to "fiercer pains." #### HISTORY vs. MILLERISM.

Br. J. Baker, one of the Corresponding Editors of the Universalist Watchman, gives an account of a Millerite named Green, to whose lectures he replied at intermissions. On the last day Br. Baker was called away to attend a funeral, whereupon Green boldly came out and denied Br. Baker's historical dates, and dared their publication. Br. B. publishes some of them in the Watchman of the 4th ult., but no one has yet refuted them.

Christ was born four years before the common era—commenced preaching at 30 years of age, and preached at the most but three years and a half; hence he was crucified A. D. 29. See Adam Clarke's chronology at the end of his commentary on Acts.

Now, if the 2300 days mentioned in Daniel viii: 14, means years, as Miller asserts, and we subtract the 70 weeks (490 years) as he does, it leaves 1810, to which add the year of the Christian era, in which Christ was crucified, and we have 1839; or if we add Christ's age, 33 years, and subtract the four years, our era is too short, we still have 1839 the year of the world should have been burned!

He calls the taking away of the daily sacrifice, Dan. xii: 11, the suppression of heathenism, and 1335 days the number thence to the end of the world; and to make it 1843, he says heathenism was abolished in the Roman empire, A. D. 508. This is false. Constantine suppressed heathen rites A. D. 323, a mistake of almost two hundred years, since the world should have ended! See Goodrich's Church History, page 68.

In order to make popery the beast who was to endure 42 months—1260 days, and end in it 1798, he says popery began A. D. 508. This is false. The pope was first acknowledged universal bishop A. D. 606, (do. page 81,) but did not go in his full power till A. D. 1078. See Clarke on Rev. xiii: 15. Making only the trifling error in Mr. Green of 570 years!

He calls the beasts, Rev. ix, Mahometans with power five months, and the four angels loosed for an hour, a day, a month and a year, Turkish horsemen, and the whole amounts, according to his mode of reckoning, to 446 years. The smoke issuing from the mouths of the horses is fire arms. Now the Saracens began their wars about A. D. 568, which added to 446, would bring us down to A. D. 1014, just 400 years before guns were invented!

Many similar perversions of truth I could mention, but these will suffice till we see if he dares to come into the field, as an honest controversialist, and reply. J. BAKER.

REVIEW.

Of Rev. Mr. Laird's Sermon against Universalism, preached in the Dutch Reformed Church, in Fort Plain, on Friday evening, December 16th, 1842.

[Concluded from last week.]

"The Gospel, (said Mr. Laird,) excited great rage wherever preached; but do wicked men rage about the preaching of Universalism? Stephen was stoned for declaring the Gospel, but who ever heard of a Universalist preacher being persecuted for preaching his doctrine?" This is not the precise language used, but is the same in substance. And we have introduced it here, not because it is worthy of serious notice, but to show what weakness great men can sometimes betray. If we have read aright, it was the common people who received the Gospel with gladness. The humble and despised publican and sinner never persecuted those who came to them with glad tidings; but it was the proud and haughty Jew, and the heathen philosopher, with whose system the Gospel came in contact, who raged, and persecuted, and slew. And so it has been in regard to Universalism. The common people have always received it with gladness, because adapted to their wants and circumstances; while the self-styled religionist and the proud Pharisee have denounced it as an abomination and a curse to mankind. And as to persecution, we have had enough of it from the same source. John Murray was stoned in Boston—George Rogers was assailed with brick-bats in Pittsburg—the hired house in which the Pennsylvania Convention of Universalists first met in Columbia, was also stoned on the first evening of its session, in 1832—and your humble speaker was threatened a stoning in Genesee county, for declaring that we all have one Father, one hope, and one final destiny. And up to this day, the most unnatural warfare has been waged against us. We are represented as devils and not men—and every vile and odious epithet is heaped upon our characters. It may truly be said of us, as an apostle said of himself and brethren, "We therefore both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God who is the Saviour of all men, specially of them that believe."

Another reason adduced to show why Universalism could not be Gospel, was, that it did not produce any great change of character. But perhaps there are better judges in reference to this matter than the Rev. speaker. We know that it has softened the hardest hearts, and subdued the most stubborn wills. And according to his own showing, it is decidedly the best system for producing genuine conversions. The man, he says, who is converted through fear of hell or endless misery, will surely be lost. Then why preach it? Why hold it forth in order to induce men to repent? If our Br. is right, it certainly is a dangerous doctrine to preach—it does no good, and it may work much evil. We thank him for the blow he has given his own system—a few more such, rightly dealt, would put an end to its existence.

"But," says our friend, "why do not Universalists have revivals?" If he means by these what Dr. Beecher once termed "moral tornadoes," we thank God that He has saved us from them. But if he means a growth in grace and moral goodness, an increase of that religion mentioned by St. James, and an advancement in divine life, we do pretend to have some such revivals; and it is our object to have them continue, not only for days, and weeks, but for years, and on to the very termination of this mortal being.

"But Universalism does not lead men to pray," said the speaker—the Gospel did, and therefore the conclusion was, that Universalism can not be the Gospel. In support of the fact that our doctrine does not lead men to pray, we have presented the testimony of M. H. Smith, who says that Universalists are a prayerless people. I know not that Mr. Smith ever prayed, but this I do know, that his statement is as false as perjury. It is true we never make prayers at the corners of the streets—we never enter into our closets and pray to our Father in secret, and then go out and tell the world that we have been praying; this is a matter between us and God, and to him we are willing to answer, but not to man.

The obligation laid on the church to spread the Gospel over the world, was next adduced as proof that our system could not be true. The conclusion was, that our doctrine was too dangerous a one to be suffered to prevail extensively. And a case was brought up by way of illustration. An individual saw a very fine gray horse worth $100, or $150, and it was just the horse that he wanted; and he says to himself, "I can take this horse, and receive my punishment as I go along; so I will have him." This was on the supposition that the same arrangements exist in human governments, as exist in the divine economy according to the system he was opposing; which, by the by, is a perfect absurdity.

Our brother reminds us of the boy in the fable who shot up arrows at the moon—he shot them up, and they fell down in his own face. He believes that in the government of God the penalty of the law may be evaded altogether—that the sinner may neither receive his punishment as he goes along, nor in any other way. And why should it not be so in human government? Here is an individual who sees a very fine gray horse worth $100, or $150, and it is just such a horse as he wants, and he says, "Now, I can take this horse, and escape the penalty of the law, and get rid of punishment, and so he shall be mine."

But we leave this to notice one of the most vile, and odious, and false charges, that was ever preferred against the believers in universal salvation. "They do not aim, (said the speaker,) at moral purity—liars, and blasphemers, and adulterers, and drunkards, all come around the communion table; and no means are used to purify their churches of such characters." This slanderous charge needs no denial from me. There is not an individual here to night, who believes it. Mr. Laird himself does not believe it; but he had said that between Universalists and believers in endless misery there must be war—war to the knife; and here is a specimen of the unholy crusade that should be waged.

We are aware that Universalists are no better than they should be; but we challenge a comparison between them and any other sect, without any fears as to the result. If they are as bad as our charitable friend says they are, why are not our jails, and penitentiaries, and prisons filled with them? Perhaps some of you think this is the case. Let me then set you right. Four or five years ago the penitentiaries in this state were visited for the purpose of ascertaining how many Universalists could be found in them, and there was not one; nor has there ever been one Universalist hung for crime committed while he was a Universalist, so far as can be ascertained. But the fact was revealed by that search, that all who had any fixed belief, were believers in the doctrine of endless misery, and among these were no less than five preachers of the same!

We do not speak of this, because it is pleasant to deal with the faults and failings of others; but to show that there is as little perfection among other sects, as in our own. And we are truly of the opinion, that if moral delinquency on the part of believers, is to be admitted as proof of the falsity of their doctrine, the system of endless woe, above all others, can not stand. From the Fifth General Council, down through a period of more than 600 years, it reigned predominant and triumphant in the Christian church. Universalism, if there was any, was unknown. Of course, then, it was a very pure age? "Let the history of its blood and abominations answer."

But "What will the world gain by the preaching of Universalism?" Let me add another question to this. What will the world lose by the preaching of Universalism? According to Mr. Laird's own showing, the doctrine of endless misery is worse than useless. The individual who repents under its influence, he says, will surely be damned. The very preaching of it, therefore, may sink many souls to preening ruin. But this can not be said of our doctrine. If it produces any conversions, they will be genuine; for Mr. Laird says that no individual can be truly converted through fear. The world, consequently, can lose nothing by the preaching of Universalism; on the contrary, it may gain much. We thank our brother again, for the testimony he has borne in favor of our doctrine; and if he will only keep on, he will do more to weaken the confidence of his own people in the doctrine of endless misery, than has ever yet been done. We therefore bid him God speed, and pray that his hands may be strengthened in the good work.

But we had nearly forgotten the anecdote of the Quaker. "A Universalist clergyman in Vermont, (said Mr. Laird,) went out into a certain neighborhood on an evening to lecture. After delivering his message, he inquired if he should leave another appointment. No one answering, an aged Quaker finally arose and made reply as follows: 'If thee has told us the truth, there is no use of thy coming—if thee has lied to us, we do not want thee to come.'"

Now we wish to reverse the order of things a trifle, and relate the anecdote after another fashion. We will suppose that Mr. Laird went out into a certain neighborhood to deliver an evening lecture. He preached his doctrine faithfully, and threatened sinners with endless misery if they did not repent; but told them, in conclusion, that if they repented through fear of hell, they would surely be lost. At the close of his service he inquired if he should leave another appointment.—No one answering, an aged Quaker arose and made reply as follows: "If thee has told us the truth, there is no use of thy coming—if thee has lied to us, we do not want thee to come." If this should be thought too severe, it must be recollected that it is an illustration put into our hands by the speaker himself!

We have now gone over the ground occupied in the discourse under review; and not one single argument have we found that has even the most remote bearing against our system. The question that ought to have been discussed, was avoided in the very commencement, and from beginning to close, the distinguishing doctrine of Universalists was unnoticed, or made to appear very different from what it is. And but for the reckless attack made upon the moral and religious characters of its believers, Mr. Laird would not have received this notice at our hands. The great doctrine of the Restoration has passed through the fire he kindled for it, unharmed, and has received additional testimony from him that it is the Gospel. As for ourselves, we have no doubt upon this point. We believe that there is no other doctrine adapted to the tempted and sorrowing condition of man. Its power to bring men from darkness into light, has been tested; and when friends and fortune have fled away, a belief in this doctrine has proved it to be mighty to console.

DONATION CARDS.

Br. Thayer lately proposed that a new paper be started, called "The Gospel Porringer and Universal Contribution Box," in which to notice donations to preachers; and that Br. Drew be the Editor, and my humble self the Corresponding Editor. Thank you, Br. Thayer, I owe you one. But, really, I think there are other Editors who are more deserving the honor than myself, both as to length of cards, and frequency of issues. I, therefore, respectfully decline the honor.

Br. Whittemore endorses the hit, and thinks that the practice referred to has a tendency to lower the dignity of our periodicals. How convenient to have our neighbors' undignified actions in a bag in front, and our own in one on the back!

Br. D. D. Smith, of Richmond, Va., also endorses the hit, and volunteers to procure subscribers. His own paper, the Warrior, has a card in it almost every week, cards of thanks for, and notices of the reception of paper, quills, ink, clothing, rocking chairs, pies, tarts, cakes, candies, preserves, wax candles, custards, cheese, the use of six horses when he wishes to ride, &c., &c., &c.!

We suggest some opposition in this matter, and therefore nominate the Christian Warrior, of Richmond, Va., for the honor of the new title, and D. D. Smith as principal Editor, instead of Br. Drew. Who seconds my motion?

STATISTICS.

It is with much pleasure that I notice the efforts now being made by several of our Editors to collect the statistics of our denomination in their respective States, in order that they may report to me in time, fully and correctly, for the next Register. I hope they will continue their efforts, until we shall be able to furnish a full and fair statement of the condition of our cause in the United States. The next Register, I hope will show a very great advance toward this desirable consummation; and that for 1845 will, I hope, complete it. Will not other Editors move in this good work, and urge their correspondents to take hold of it now, and send in returns as fast as they can. I want the materials on hand early in May—certainly before the first of June, that I may get up my proof sheets to send out for final corrections in good time. In order to get the work itself ready to send to remote sections early enough, I must have the work ready for delivery about the first of September. The West will want a larger supply than usual next year. Let them look around in time, and see how many are wanted, so as to send their orders before the 1st of June next.

ANOTHER WOLF FOR A SHEPHERD.—The Bradford (Pa.) Potter contains an account of a most melancholy event which occurred in that neighborhood—Wysox. A Rev. Mr. Lefavor, (supposed to be a married man,) converted a Mr. Woodburn, his wife and daughter, and seduced the latter. When the poor girl's situation was discovered, the sick father clasped hands on his heart, and expired—the mother fell into convulsions and became insane at the double calamity, and the daughter is said to be a maniac! The Reverend seducer is in Towanda jail on a charge of giving drugs to his victim to procure abortion. Who, of all those that preach there is pleasure in sin, and that God does not judge in the earth, will be willing to take this man's place? And who, of all those that prate about the licentious tendency of Universalism; and the salutary and restraining effects of the purifying doctrine of an endless hell, will bring a more convincing proof than this is of the contrary part? When will men open their eyes to see such facts as these, and to heed their solemn and painful teachings? How long will our Partialist brethren continue to encourage revival doctrines, practices and preachers, with such repeated—constantly occurring testimonies before their eyes, that they tend to the production of vice and immorality in their preachers, to insanity and suicide, to the seduction and ruin of their own families? How long!

A. B. G.

"THE WESTERN LUMINARY," a neat, small folio newspaper of our denomination, published weekly in Rochester, at one dollar per annum in advance, we are informed in the last two numbers, has passed from the hands of Br. James M. Cook, into those of about twenty ministering brethren in that section, who will hereafter publish it at the same place and price as heretofore.

We think the change a very judicious and just one, inasmuch as, if there must be any loss by the experiment, it is easier and better that twenty should bear it than one; and we think, also, that though the company may not be able to superintend its publication as well as one, on the score of economy, yet they will be more likely to secure for it a greater support than one could do. But while we congratulate Br. Cook on his release from an embarrassing and losing situation, we confess our regret that he should still complain that we would not cry peace and safety and promise encouragement for him, when, by his own showing, he had trouble, and losses, and darkness all around him! In despite of his sneers at our misfortunes, and pettishness at any remarks we could make however kindly meant, we felt nothing but regret and sympathy for him in his situation, and at his unpromising prospects, and do sincerely rejoice at his emancipation from them. We regret, also, to perceive a most unjust insinuation in his remarks about this paper and its Editor—one evidently intended to injure it deeply—viz., that it is disorganizing! Br. Cook, be at least just to us.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.—In a late article on this subject, we stated that Maine was about taking measures to have it abolished. We should have placed it with Connecticut and Vermont, where this punishment is, in effect, already done away with—that is, it is left to the Governor to order his execution within one year; if not done in that time, the prisoner awaits his release by natural death.

Br. Chapin, of Charlestown, Mass., has lately published his three sermons on the subject in the Trumpet. They are eminently argumentative, and I think, conclusive in favor of the abolition of death as a punishment of the law.

By this dispensation of Providence, a young husband has been called to drink the bitter cup of affliction, in a sorrowful manner. The holy marriage vow which he made at the sacred altar, has soon been performed. That union was soon dissolved by the angel of death, and he is left with a little infant, to mourn his early bereavement. Sister Marsh was a consistent believer in "the Great Salvation;" for she adorned the doctrine which she professed, "with a well ordered life." She was highly esteemed for her virtues, by those who were the best acquainted with her, and will long be remembered by the circle in which she moved. May all those afflicted, find consolation in the truth, that death has not separated her "from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." The consolation of the Gospel was offered to the mourners, and a large concourse of friends, on the 26th, at the Universalist church, by the writer. ALANSON KELSEY.

In Perrinton, Feb. 4th, Mrs. BARBARA GOODELL, second wife of A. Goodell, Esq., aged 44 years.

Sister G. was sick only one week, during which time she was exercised with considerable pain. Her disease was epidemic. She was taken, as it were, in a moment, in the midst of health and activity, from the bosom of her family—from the cares and trials of earth, to her resting place in heaven. She was aware, seemingly from the commencement of her sickness, of her sudden departure. Still she uttered not a murmur. She seemed willing to depart and be with Christ. It had been only about a year since she experienced the joys of a living faith in the Gospel. Her mind had always been subject to the fears and prejudices of an early education. But when the light of eternal truth shone upon her heart, these fears were driven away, and the Gospel to her became the power of God unto salvation. She was perfectly happy in the belief that God will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth. Not a doubt disturbed her mind. The kingdom of God to her soul, was righteousness, joy and peace. She united herself with the church, and in connection with some others, received the ordinance of baptism. When I received her baptismal vow in the name of Jesus, it was a happy day to my soul, and I shall long remember that solemn hour when I went down with her into the water. May those who witnessed the solemn ordinance remember that day. She delighted in the service of her divine Master, and was willing to labor in his vineyard. Not a moment was she idle. She had become very actively engaged in the interests of the church and society to which she belonged. Here her presence will be missed—here her loss will be deeply felt.—When we draw around the communion table of our Lord, and there partake of the dying emblems of his broken body and blood which was shed for us, her seat will be vacant. And though vacated on earth, it will be filled in heaven.—There her communion will be with a higher order of beings—Jesus will be held in everlasting remembrance. She conversed freely concerning her affairs, and how she desired to have them conducted. She seemed to express great anxiety for the welfare of her two little children, who are left to mourn her loss. Several opposers visited her during her sickness, but she satisfied them that she had strong confidence in the salvation of all from sin and death. Br. Goodell asked her a few moments before she expired, when her bodily pain was quite severe, if she felt any better? to which she replied with much emphasis, No, nor I never shall till the breath leaves my body, then I shall be well. O how strong—how precious is such a faith in the hour of death. This faith was hers—it cheered her in health—comforted her in sickness, and in the hour of dissolution pointed her struggling spirit away to heaven and immortal happiness. She had been a faithful companion and a tender mother. Her loss in her family will be deeply felt. May the Lord bless and comfort her surviving companion in the decline of life. May he watch over, guide and protect those dear little children, who have been deprived, while so young, of the fond care of a mother. May the society and church copy her examples, and live as she lived, in the faithful discharge of their duty. May God comfort all that have been called to mourn by this dispensation of his providence. The funeral was attended on Sunday the 6th ult., and a sermon delivered by the writer to a large and sympathizing congregation, from 2d Sam. xiv: 14, and Eph. i 8-10.—W. Luminary. J. M. C.

TRUSTING TO APPEARANCES.

BY EZEKIEL JONES, ESQ.

"There are a great many folks in this world who are amazingly taken by outside looks," said my Aunt Sally, the other evening. Now Aunt Sally is an old maid, past redemption—one of the oldest kind, for, good soul, she's hard upon sixty. She always did say, though, that she needn't have been a spinster all her days, if she'd a took up with any thing that come along—and I do believe her. Like most old folks, she seems sometimes to run of a notion, that every body else must be thinking ever in their minds just what she's dreaming about—in a kind of magnetic communication as the Mesmerites say—though Aunt Sally knows nothing about Mesmerism; and I think it would be better for some younger people, if they didn't. But she appears to fancy, when she's been chewing the cud of memory over, all to herself, and then breaks out in a new spot with some wise saw, that all of us know what she means by it. So, says she the other night, as I told you, "There are a great many people in this world, who are amazingly taken by outside looks." Then she hitched her chair nearer to the jamb, gave the skirts of her gown a tuck, held her hand over the fire to warm her fingers, and looked all around, first to father, then to mother, then to Fanny, and then to me, as if she waited for one of us to speak. Nobody said a word, and she pursed her lips up, trotted her left leg on her right knee, and looked right into the fire. I saw the old lady kind of wanted somebody to speak, so I took my eyes off of Chitty on Evidence a minute, and said:

"That's a fact, Aunt Sally, appearances are deceitful; but what's to be done about it?"

"Why, Zekiel," said she, "didn't you see that in the Philadelphia Post?"

"What in the Post?" said I.

Aunt Sally got the newspaper and pointed to a paragraph which set out how a poor old drunken creature set down on a railroad, and went to sleep, and how the whole train went over him, crushing him all to pieces, and how his jug was broken in his hand; and furthermore, that he had left a destitute widow, and that his children, if they weren't exactly helpless from infancy, had grown up helpless from bad examples. Well, I read it out loud, as Aunt Sally asked me, and though it did seem a painful narrative enough, I couldn't see any thing in it that had any thing to do with Aunt Sally. So says I, "Well Aunt Sally, I don't see now what you are coming at." Father looked as though he did, but as mother and Fanny, and I, and all seemed curious, Aunt Sally put herself in her story telling posture, and begun:

"I could have told that man what would be his end, forty years ago."

"Why, Aunt," says I, "they didn't have railroads then, nor dream of them."

"Never you mind, Ezekiel Jones. People who are are too fond of the bottle didn't have to wait till railroads came into fashion, to find that sudden death laid in ambush for them, I can tell you. The drunkard's grave always gaped for him, ever since the world was made, and many is the fine young man, who has begun to slide into it, before ever he knew which way his feet was slipping; or before ever he found out that he didn't stand as fast as the everlasting hills. But I'm fairly sot down for a story, and being that you want to hear it, and that Fanny is here too, I mean to tell it." And father he folded up the newspaper he was reading, I shut up my book, and mother she made haste to count her stitches in the knitting work, where she was drawing in to fit my calves, Fanny crossed her feet with one sly peep at her own handsome ankles, and we all put on our listening caps for—

AUNT SALLY'S STORY.

"I'm going to talk about things that I don't often mention; for when a body's nose and chin begins to look as if they were forever going to kiss each other, and the grey hairs will straggle out from under the cap, and the hands are shrivelled and skinny, and the lips puckered and thin, it seems kind of strange to young folks that old folks, and old maids in particular, should talk as if they had ever known or felt any thing like what we used to call love when I was a girl, and what you still know by the same name, for want of a better. But I can tell you, Fanny Arbuckle, that my cheeks were once as full and red as yours, (didn't Fan blush and simper,) and that my lips pouted as handsome and red for a kiss, (she couldn't help smiling half spiteful,) and that I showed as pretty a set of teeth when I laughed, (Lord, how Fanny's eyes snapped!) There wasn't a delicater waist in the State, and I had as good a pair of feet to stand upon, as them that are now peeping out from under your new alpaca lustre."

I rather guess Fanny's feet were drawn in about the quickest. Father he went off into a horse laugh, and mother looked pleased enough. Aunt Sally stooped over and looked at Fanny's gown, as if she had just thought of minding it.

"There," says she, "it's a good deal like what we used to call Prince's cloth, when I was a girl, but it's got more of a gloss. But that ain't telling my story."

"There was hardly a young man in these parts that didn't shine up to me at some time or other, and that your father knows, Zekiel. He was a kind brother then, as he has been ever since, and though I say it to his face, it's no disgrace, between two such old rheumatics as we are now. He took an amazing deal of pains to find out all about the young men who took a shine to me, and he come pretty near the mark generally, though he wasn't always right, as that account in the Philadelfy Post has shown, after so many years."

Now, if this had been said almost any other time, father would have gone into an argument with his sister, but he didn't feel like it now. I could see that his eyes glistened in the firelight, as his memory dwelt on the old times that Aunt Sally had been raking up; and I now began to put that and that together, and to catch a notion of what the horrid accident had to do with the glances between my father and aunt. After a minute, she went on:

"Forty years ago this winter—it may be more, for perhaps I can't rightly remember, there was a great sleighing party contrived up by the young men. It was in that party that I had my first regular invite. I'd been before, a good many times to be sure. Sometimes I'd been taken along as one of the children, and sometimes your father had put me under the buffalo skin in his sleigh, when he kind of wanted to coax some shy girl to ride out with him, and knew she wouldn't go, if the ride looked altogether too much on purpose. Sometimes, too, the girls in the set older than me, would agree to ride out with some spark, and then up and ask me to go too, for a spite to their beaux. Didn't the fellows used to wish me further! But I didn't care for that so I had the ride. This, though, was my first sleigh ride, where a young man had harnessed up his horses on purpose to treat me to a jaunt, and to get a chance to throw out hints about how pleasant a short journey was together, and how we might like a longer one, and all that sort of nonsense that the young men were just as good at forty years ago, as they are now."

"I can truly and honestly say that I never had a pleasanter frolic in my life. The bells jingled, and the snow flew, and the laugh rung clear, and Josh Bemis looked as if there never was a handsomer man. I felt proud of my beau, and as proud of his horse, as if it had been my own, and as proud of his driving, as if I had held the reins, and as cheerful and happy as ever an artless, untroubled and innocent young girl could on a harmless frolic. To be sure, though my ears were too well covered from the cold to feel the frost, Josh did make them tingle a little. Oh, you may smile, Fanny Arbuckle, but when you are as old as I am, you will own, like me, that there is nothing in after life ever puts a woman into such a happy flutter, as when she hears, for the first time, what is said for her own private ear, and nobody's else. It is such a delightful secret that there never was a woman yet, who could keep it longer than till she met somebody to tell it to."

"Well, when we got to the stopping place, the older girls who had been courted till the business had lost all its freshness, and the beaux, who had been paying attentions till they did it just as much of course as a doctor's horse stops before the house of an ailing family, they begun to throw out their jokes and hints, and twits. Perhaps they thought it teased us; but I know that though I kind of half dreaded the gauntlet that I knew I had to run from my young acquaintances, I should have been dreadfully disappointed and provoked if nobody had said any thing; and I guess Josh felt pretty much the same. We hadn't been in the house over a minute before one of the girls got the whole story out of my blushes in a corner, and then she turned to the rest, and such a tease as they put me into! I had forty minds in a minute—first that I never would speak to Josh again—then that I would run right out and walk home alone ten miles through the snow—and then that I certainly would pout so at Josh that he would never trouble me more. Just that minute I heard a great haw! haw! haw! in the bar-room, where the fellows had all gone to order in refreshments. Then I knew that they were plaguing Josh too, and when he came in with the rest, he was trying to look as if he had heard nothing in particular, and didn't care for anybody. But he couldn't help looking as if somebody had caught him running away with a sheep upon his back—and of course, as all the rest were against us, we were obliged to help each other face them out. We couldn't help it—and on the whole, I guess we didn't want to. Being Josh and I were the youngest couple, and rather the most awkward, our sleigh was brought to the door last, and when Josh handed me in, he put his face into my mood, and—"

Fanny looked at the speaker at this passage—

"He didn't bite me, nor I him, Fanny Arbuckle, I can tell you. Well, that ride passed off nicely. Your father, Zekiel, tried to plague me a little after we got home, but I fixed him out in short order with the kitchen tongs. I knew just as well as could be, that it was a match of your father's coaxing on, and that he was tickler than I, if that was possible, for young Joshua Bemis, Esq., was thought a match for anybody, if 'an old vagrant and inebriate, named Bemis,' that's what the paper says, did get killed the other day, on a railroad. Ah, well!" continued Aunt Sally, with a sigh, after a moment's pause, "We are all born, but not buried," as the saying is.

"I shall leave you to guess of whom I dreamed, Fanny, that night. Time passed on, and I grew every day more discreet and woman-like, and better worth respect and love; for there is nothing fixes character, for good or ill, like the first serious, thoughtful and sincere attachment. But it was broken off. What separated us? Now I am going to tell him."

Father looked up from the fire with a great deal of earnestness at Aunt Sally—and Fanny and I were not a little interested too. Who knows that we shan't be separated too, thought I. I stole a look at her face, her eye met mine, and it didn't need any words to tell me that our thoughts were on pretty much the same thing. Aunt Sally continued, addressing my father:

"Do you remember that we were out of milk early of a morning in the Spring after that sleigh ride?"

Father shook his head.

"Why," said Aunt Sally, "I'm sure I should think you would. Father was going to Boston, and took an early breakfast—there was none left over night, and the cows hadn't been milked."

The old gentleman made no answer.

"Well, then, what a fool I am!" Aunt Sally said. "I do believe I am getting old. To think that I should think that you would remember such a little thing over forty years as well as I do, whose whole life has turned upon it! Well, to make a long story short, mother told me to take a pitcher and run into some of the neighbors. I tried and tried, at two or three places, and then run into the tavern, that was, where Mr. Guttridge's house is now. I was in the kitchen, and I heard a laugh in the bar-room. I should have known that laugh if I had heard it among a thousand, and I never heard it before, when it didn't make my heart jump in answer. But what could Joshua be doing there before daylight? In a minute more, I heard the stick rattle in the tumbler, and then Josh's voice again. I couldn't help listening—and such coarse jokes as those of which I was the subject! Why, I liked to have dropped going home, more than once, milk, pitcher and all. It wasn't the mere words that were said, I wouldn't have you to think, for though they were bad enough, he meant no harm, it wasn't altogether the place neither in which they were spoken; but the hour—and what went into the month before the words came out—a morning dram!"

Aunt Sally wiped her eyes, and we all felt serious, I can tell you, but father he looked like a man who had just found out a riddle that had puzzled him all his life.

"I said nothing to nobody—how could I? But when Josh Bemis came over in the evening, how could I be as happy to see him as I was the evening before? And when you scolded me for not being cheerful, brother, I could not answer. The rest you know. I was led to watch Joshua, and I found that the morning dram was not a mere accidental thing, but a habit; and though there were a great many who used to do the same thing, I never could feel that they were safe. Well, one chill brought on another, till at last Joshua began to leave longer spells between his visits; and when he did come, that unlucky morning had supplied me with a key to too much of what you fancied was mere good humor; and then again I found that a cloud over his face, that he said came from fatigue, came from something else. I tried to joke him out of his habit of moderate drinking; but he took it only as a joke, and only laughed at me. I dared once to reason seriously with him, and he asked me if I thought him a drunkard, and that was the last time I spoke to him on that subject. And now I can look back and tell the living truth, when I say that the hour in which I ascertained that he was coaxed away by an artful rival was one of real relief. She courted, and she won him."

"People pitied me. You almost quarrelled with me I told you then not to trust to appearances, and you thought it was only envy. And so it did seem. He was rich, he was prosperous, he was honored, he went from step to step in public life, he has been in the General Court, and he has been to Congress. His children were loves and pets, his house and homestead were a sight to behold for their pleasantness, and I know you did think me almost a fool that I had not been the sharer in all this."

"But, flourish as the tree might, I knew what worm was at its root; and when, in his jovial manners, his pleasant parties, his dinners, his drives, his popularity, other folks saw only bright happiness, I could see that all these appearances were the plainest marks of decay—just as you mind trees turn all sorts of beautiful colors, when their leaves are e'en just ready to drop. And just when the world thought him best off, his one vice began to strip him. Leaf after leaf fell, till the tree was left all bare, and it is only a few old creatures like me who can recollect who that 'vagrant' was, and what that 'inebriate' once possessed. Now he is dead—and is his widow, with her long life of earthly hope—of glad prosperity—of contemptuous pride—followed by humiliation, trouble, embarrassment and squalid poverty—her children the plagues of her life—her husband torment in her eyes—her name forgotten—her heart and home desolate, and all crowned by that piece in the paper—is she who trusted to appearances, better off now than than the poor lonely old maid who did not?"

Aunt Sally hid her face in her hands. Father got up and walked right across the fire-place to her. "Not lonely," said he as he took her hands in his—and the brother and sister got up and kissed each other, as if they were both children, and Sally had been telling over some girlish trouble, which could be all wiped out with the lips. I guess there wasn't an eye there, though that didn't swim in tears; and as to Fanny, I do believe that she'll be afraid of me hereafter, if I only look at the outside of a cask of spirits of turpentine."

[NOTE.—It is hardly necessary to say that Fanny is Mr. Jones' affianced.]

A REVERIE.

BY REV. W. N. BARBER.

"Lo! I dreamed a dream which was not all a dream."

The quietness of a Sabbath evening was around me. The rich rays of the parting sun were lingering on the hill-tops, and lighting them until their crests seemed tinged with gold; and the notes of the melancholy whippoorwill were heard sweetly echoing in the adjoining grove. The herds were wending their way slowly home, and now and then a solitary villager in his holiday suit strolled quietly out to enjoy the peaceful beauty of the scene.—Anon, the dusty shadows of twilight crept over the hills, and these in their turn faded away in the sable hues of evening. The stars came out one by one, and seemed intent upon their watch of love, and Luna rolled her round bright visage slowly up the sky.

I seated myself in an arm chair, and began to watch the moon-beams which streamed in through the window and fell upon the floor. I was alike wearied in body and mind. I had that day stood a minister at God's sacred altar, and endeavored faithfully to break the bread of life.

A sadness came over my meditations. It was such an hour as this, thought I, that the Saviour knelt in the garden of Gethsemane with his locks wet with the dews of night, and brow marked with the sweat that was, as it were, great drops of blood, and prayed that the bitter cup of death might pass away. It was such an hour as this, that his mangled body was laid in the tomb. Oh! it is a holy hour: would that the gay and thoughtless—those who imagine that they are sipping the nectar of delight from the poisonous cups of iniquity, would pause as often as this misty hour pervades the earth, and muse upon the Saviour's advent and teachings! They would turn back into the dusty paths of life with enlightened minds; for they would have found that "there is no peace to the wicked."

While occupied by these reflections, I fell into a kind of waking reverie. I thought I discovered in the moon-beams, the dim and shadowy outlines of a human form. Gradually they deepened and became distinct in the misty light. It was the form of an old and venerable man. His hair, which was white, as if it had been bleached with the frosts of many winters, hung in graceful curls around his neck and shoulders, and in his hand he carried an antique Bible of homely but curious binding. There was a benevolent expression upon his countenance, and a smile wreathed his lip. He advanced and drawing a chair close beside me, flung his arm carelessly over the arm of my chair.

"You are absorbed in thought," said he; "what do you think of life, and the duties and responsibilities it brings with it?"

"Oh," I replied, "its paths are rugged, its duties and responsibilities numerous, and I sometimes feel as if I should faint by the way."

"And yet," said he, "you are young—almost without experience in its paths. There are no wrinkles on your brow; there are none of Time's silvery threads among your locks; your limbs are unpaisied, and your steps are firm and vigorous. Look at me! I am nearly six thousand years old, and yet my years are not spent. Would you not like to hear something of my eventful history? It will while away this evening hour, and perhaps not be without its lesson."

I nodded a reply, that such would contribute to my pleasure; and he began,

"You see in me a personification of your much-loved faith. I was born amid the shades of Eden, and dictated the first promise that was made to the first pair of your race: 'And I will put enmity between thee and the woman; between thy seed and her seed. It shall bruise thy head and thou shalt bruise his heel.' I walked hand in hand with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, those good old patriarchs who tended their flocks and gathered in their fleeces. Not a seer of ancient time appeared who was not my friend. In later times I accompanied the footsteps of an humble band who trod the land of Judea. They were my zealous and untiring friends: For my sake they were persecuted and buffeted, scourged and imprisoned, and many of them suffered martyrdom. They were led by a meek and lonely Nazarene, and in this volume which I carry in my hand, you see a history of those bloody times.

"I was with Clement of Alexandria, and with Origen, who, in after times, suffered in my defence. It was for my sake that some suffered in cruel stocks and bore many other aggravated persecutions. I was also with Marcellus, and Titus, and Theodore, and the Gregories, and a whole host of worthies who toiled, shone and suffered in the early ages of the church. Taking the lamp of truth in my hand, I visited various portions of Europe, Asia and Africa, and though destined to battle my way amid the corruptions of Judaism and the abominations of Heathenism, yet success seemed to attend my efforts for some four hundred years after the birth of the Saviour. In the eastern church, near the Holy Land, I gained almost complete jurisdiction over the minds of thousands.

"But when the night of dark ages set in, I was driven into obscure cells and cloisters, and but few traces of my footsteps could be seen. In those dark and bloody times, I found no aliment on which to feed; blood and superstition reigned around me, and darkness which might almost be felt brooded over Christendom. The spirit of the age was one with which I could not sympathise: there was no gentleness—no purity—none of that hallowed spirit which was breathed by the angel on the plains of Bethlehem—peace on earth and good will towards men. But when that moonless, starless midnight of error passed away, and the rays of Christianity were once more dawning, I emerged like the morning star from obscurity. For a few ages my friends were weak and feeble; but their ranks were gradually enlarged, and wherever the light of the reformation streamed, they were fearless in my defence. Winstanley, Coppin, More, Tillotson, Hartley, Burnet, Whiston and Cheyne were among my most ardent defenders. Germany, that land of scholars, became my home, and I met with approving smiles from her wisest and most enlightened children. I visited Holland, and Switzerland, that land of rocks and mountains; and in Geneva, that city where the unhappy Servetus met with an unjust and ignominious death, I planted my foot, and the flowers of truth sprung up and blossomed. I stepped among the purple hills of France; and even the lonely cabins of Ireland have been cheered and lightened by my presence. England opened wide her arms to enclasp me, and side by side I crossed the stormy Atlantic with the devoted Murray, just as the notes of political liberty were beginning to echo amid the hills and dales of America, and assisted him in planting a little church on the shores of the Delaware. I was his constant attendant; and though he was despised and forsaken, I enabled him to withstand the wiles of the adversary. A portion of my mild spirit has been infused into the bosoms of his worthy successors, who have carried my principles into most of the enlightened places on the American continent. In short, I have had my friends in all ages of the world. I have 'been persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed,'—I have also suffered aggravated wrongs, but I am yet vigorous in my strength: and wherever I have travelled, the blessings of religion, freedom, virtue and intelligence have trod closely in my footsteps and been co-extensive."

Here, the old gentleman paused as if waiting for a reply. "Your life has been truly an adventurous one," I said; "and you have been through evil as well as good report. May I ask your name?"

"My name," said he, "is TRUTH, or UNIVERSALISM."

"But," I added, "in those periods when darkness has enshrouded you, have you not been almost disheartened and inclined to flee forever from the haunts of men?"

"No," he replied, "never have I for one moment doubted but what I should conquer every opposing power. And, my friend, I trust you will never be disheartened in so good a cause. You will meet with thorny trials on your way; but flee to this volume—it will serve as a chart and compass to guide you, on life's tempestuous sea—make this the man of your counsel—let it serve as a lamp to your feet and a light in your path, and there is no danger but what you will surmount every obstacle, overcome every difficulty, out-ride every storm, and at last sink sweetly into the grave, cheered by the light of God's countenance."

He paused; and I, after meditating a few moments upon the truths he had imparted, turned to thank him; but lo, he had vanished!

The moon had taken a higher station in the heavens, but her beams still lingered upon the floor, and a more innumerable host of stars had taken their watch-places above. All else was the same. Guilford Centre, Vermont, 1843.

TRUST IN GOD.

BY REV. N. C. HODGDON.

It has been truly remarked by some writer, "He that feeds his birds, will not starve his babes." God is the Father of all, and we are his beloved children. As the Saviour said in his sermon on the mount, we are much better than the fowls of the air—and yet our heavenly Father feedeth them. And hence, why is it that man has not more confidence in God? The reason is obvious. He has not correct views of God, and his holy law, and his righteous government. The character of God has been erroneously given to the children of men.—He has not been represented as a kind Father, but rather as a tyrant. And how can it be expected that men will learn to be content, and to trust in a Being whom they can not love? Let the true character of God be set forth in all its native loveliness, and let the people be instructed that "He is too wise to err, and too good to be unkind," and the time will then arrive, when mankind universally will trust in God, and be perfectly resigned to all the dispensations of a wise Providence. We can not expect it before.

There are many who complain and murmur at the dealings of God with them. But they are like the man who sits beside the sunny brook, and is parched with thirst, because he will not drink. He is invited to a banquet, but he goes not, and therefore hungers. God has provided various ways to guide his children in the right path; but as there are many blind guides to lead them on, they are often found in the by and forbidden paths with their teachers; and under such circumstances we must look for wretchedness and misery.

Let the reader, then, follow on in the straight and narrow course marked out by reason, and the light of nature. Take the Bible in one hand, and go forth to thy duty. Reason will give you direction—faith will point the way—and hope, bright jewel of the soul, will unbar the skies, and bid you go forth and see all the beauties of heaven, and tune each passion, and raise your thoughts and affections from the low and grovelling things of earth, up to heaven. And now if you do this, you can not but be happy and blessed of God and man.

Christ is our example—and we should learn his history, and follow on in his footsteps, and heed all his kind admonitions, and walk worthy of the avocation whereunto we have been called. Let us all keep in remembrance that this life is not without its cares and trials. We must look for, and expect "briars where berries grow."

If we will but pray to God for more Christian confidence, we then shall not lack for want of faith, nor doubt his infinite goodness, but trust in him as a Father, full of love. May we think of these things, and act accordingly.

THE POWER OF THE MIND.

BY MRS. LUCY HORTON.

Sometimes I have such a desire for reading, that I almost wish I could devote all my time to reading and meditation. And then again I think, if the desire and pleasure of reading, should be taken away, of what use would be all my leisure hours? Should we have all the books in the universe, and all the time of our lives for the perusal of them, yet should we be devoid of a desire to read, and, while reading, should be devoid of understanding, pleasure and satisfaction, of what use would be all our time, and all our books? Should we be blessed with the company of all our friends, yet should we be devoid of friendship and love, what pleasure should we derive from their company? Should we be continually surrounded with our children, and instead of possessing the passion of love, should possess the passion of hatred for them, how disagreeable would be their presence! Instead of clasping them to our bosoms with love and affection, we should feel to spurn them from our presence with the spirit of hatred and malice! The sound of their prattling tongues would no more be music to our ears and we should no more be delighted with their little artful manoeuvres—all their words and actions, would be disgusting to us. But while they are near and dear to us, by the ties of that love which is stronger than death, how willing are we to attend to their wants and necessities—all their faults will not weary our affections from them, and wherever they are, at home, or abroad, on the land or on the sea, they ever have our desires for their welfare. When they are sick and in distress, we feel a pain for every groan, and would gladly restore them to a perfect state of health and happiness. * From whence proceeds this pure affection, and these holy desires for our children? Do they not proceed from that Power, which had so much love for mankind, as to feed them when they were hungry, and to relieve them when they were in distress? And if such was the Father's WILL, (which Jesus came to perform,) then surely the Father's WILL will be done, and all will be restored to peace and happiness.

In this state of existence we have fervent love for our children; and according to the writings of Jesus and the apostles, all our heavenly powers will come forth in the resurrection, like gold which has been seven times purified; and also "like a grain of mustard seed," which branches forth, and not only provides shelter for the birds of the air, but produces millions of the same kind of seeds as that which was sown in the ground. How tranquil is the thought, that in the celestial world our love will branch forth to the whole world of mankind, and will be far greater, and more pure, than is possible for us to experience in this life, even for our dearest connections!

In this state of existence we can hear, distinctly, perhaps, half a dozen different sounds; and according to scriptural reasoning, in the celestial state we shall hear, much more distinctly, millions of angelic sounds which will be without jars, or discord, and which will charm our souls with seraphic rapture and adoration!

In this state of existence a small portion of our nature is heavenly; but in that world to which we go, the evil part of our nature will be changed and purified, and then how glorified will be our existence! Then we shall be like Jesus our head.—Oh then our heavenly powers will branch forth throughout the glorious regions, even like the sun which shines all over creation! There no dark clouds will intervene. No thunder-bolts will intercept our joy! The atmosphere will be pure and heavenly! All will be peace and harmony.

"And not a wave of trouble roll, Across our peaceful breast."

O "when shall I wake and find me there?"

MOMENTS OF SADNESS.

BY MISS CELIA M. TIBBITS.

O, I am weary of earth's changing scenes;
Would I might soar from all its cares away,
To seek some undefined expected good
That oft has lowered in my dreaming's way.

O, for the breathings of a kindred soul,
To soothe the anguish of this throbbing breast;
To know the tumult of a bursting heart,
To pierce the mantle of its deep unrest.

And yet not so—'t would not assuage my woes,
Though kindred spirits answered sigh for sigh;
The storm would still sweep o'er its arid wastes,
And tempests darken in its midnight sky.

Is there no peace? Earth! earth, hast thou no balm
To bid the anguish'd heart's wild throbbings cease?
Hast thou no voice in all thy zephyr tones
To hush the tempest of the spirit's grief?

Mid all the fountains are there no bright streams
To lave the tablets of the troubled heart,
To bear away the visions of the past
From every secret, every hidden part?

No, there is none—no fount to bathe the soul,
No soothing spirit whispers in the breeze;
But notes of anguish echo in the blast,
And murmur sadness in the sighing leaves.

HUMBLE HOMES.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

There is no sweeter picture on earth, than the home of a poor, but frugal pair, in whose hearts dwell a love of orderly and virtuous life. The clean, unpainted floor, white as labor and water can make it; the bright fire burning upon a neatly swept hearth; the braided rug, the polished candlestick upon the mantel, the snowy curtain, and the well-dusted and orderly arranged chairs—all these things betoken comfort, peace and industry.

But these are not all. There are other indications, that speak as clearly and intelligibly to the thoughtful and observant mind. The potted plant upon the window sill, carefully watered, and pruned every day of its withered leaves; perhaps it is a sweet-scented geranium, perhaps a modest daisy; or likelier, perhaps, a beautiful damask rose, blossoming day after day to repay the gentle care it has received from the fostering hand; has not this an indication? Is there not a voice speaking from its green leaves, that tells of gentle sympathies, delicate taste and earnest and true appreciation of the beautiful and the pure?

There are books, too, upon the table. A pocket-bible—a book on theology or ethics—a history, perhaps, of the Life of Washington, or Franklin—these betoken an humble piety, a spirit of meditation, and a quiet but determined pride of country. Let a time of trial come, and the fruits of those indications will be clearly displayed. It was such spirits as these that crossed the deep waters to find "freedom to worship God;" and that in later years, fought the haughty oppressor and drove him from the land.

Pictures, too, make up another feature of this humble abode. True, they are not the work of immortal artists. They may be but rude wood-cuts—heads of the Presidents in bright colors, or Scripture scenes setting at defiance the unities of time and place; nevertheless, they have their influence, they teach their lessons, they are indices of commendable taste.

In homes of this humble class, we have witnessed much true content. There is none of that vain striving for show and extravagancies that destroys the comfort of so many wealthier homes. There is only the frugality that aims at a providence for increased dependents and the helplessness of age. It is not long since we spent an evening at such a fire-side, and the impression made upon our mind was not one to be soon forgotten. We contrasted the happy contentment and cordial hospitality which we there witnessed, with the anxious contentions and embarrassing ceremony of the abodes of fashion; and it required no unusual philosophy to decide which station furnished the truest sources of earthly happiness.

SALVATION FROM SIN.

BY REV. O. WILCOX.

"And thou shalt call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins." Matt. 1: 21.

This language is said to have been spoken by the heavenly messenger, and was used in relation to the introduction of the Redeemer in our world, and the work he was to accomplish. And because he was to accomplish the work of saving his people, he was to receive the name JESUS. Hence according to the definition given by the angel, Jesus means Saviour; and no farther than we preach salvation, do we preach Jesus.

It should be noticed here in particular, that the angel did not say, that he should receive this name, because he should make it possible for his people to be saved, if they would make a good use of their agency. Neither did he say he should save them on conditions; or, that he should save some of them; nor yet, that he would save them if he could, but if he could not, it should be considered their own fault. But the declaration was, "he SHALL save them from their sins." This shows, also, that his people were sinners, and agrees with the declaration of the Saviour, that he came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance. Of course, if there are any that are not sinners, they do not need salvation from sin; and this was the salvation that Jesus came to accomplish. And since, any one that says that any of Jesus' people shall remain in sin eternally, calls the angel a liar.

It is believed that few, if any, will take this ground in order to avoid the truth. But they will say, they are not all Jesus'; and in this way think to avoid the salvation of all from sin: It is necessary therefore to meet them here, first with reason, and secondly with Scripture. And first, we have shown that sinners are his, and that his work is to save them and make saints of them; and as sin is the transgression of the law of our Master or Owner, those, only, can sin by transgressing the command of the Saviour, that belong to him. If any part of mankind do not belong to the Saviour, he has no right to require their services, and they do not sin in not rendering service to one that does not own them; and therefore he has no right to expect or require their obedience. But as the Saviour is not unjust in his demands, in requiring the service of more than are his; and as he does not require the love and obedience of all, it proves that all are his by purchase; and when he has saved them from their sins, they will be his by practice.

Secondly, the Scriptures confirm us in this conclusion; and we now appeal to them for testimony. And first, the Psalmist says, ii: 7, 8, "I will declare the decree—the Lord hath said unto me, Thou art my son; this day have I begotten thee—ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." Here, then, we learn that the heathen and the uttermost parts of the earth are Christ's, and he shall save them from their sins. This comes pretty near Universalism, and should cause those who are making such ado about the heathen's being lost, a little more modest in their contradiction of the Psalmist and the angel. Again, Jesus in his prayer to the Father, says, "as thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him." Here again we learn that all are his, and the giving of them eternal life is the same as saving them from their sins. But enough of this; if this is believed, it will give the believer that peace which the world can neither give nor take away; and that this may be the happy lot of many that have long been in doubt as to their own salvation and that of their fellow beings, is our sincere prayer.

THE BETTER LAND.

BY MISS CELIA M. TIBBITS.

There is an undefinable mystery about a future state of existence, which renders it a subject of deep and absorbing interest. Thousands have pondered, thousands have conjectured, and thousand millions have passed away to experience its untried realities; yet to us its mysteries are unravelled, its dim portals unopened and unexplored. We have gazed upon the fixed marble features of the dead, and felt that they were changed; that the spirit which animated and gave interest, the reflecting living principle was gone; and then arose the inquiry, with painful, almost overwhelming force, where? To the ancients it was a glorious land; a land of flowers, of low-toned, silvery streams and laurel shades; where ages rolled over the loved ones, and brought no such fear of parting as throws its gloomy shadow over us in the moment of joy; no dark presentiment of impending evil when all around is gayety and mirth. There, a tone of music ever rung through the emerald forests, whose bright leaves wore no tint of death, and the soft transparent sky was never shaded by the angry scowl of gathering storms, or the deepening gloom of night. It was a land of sunlight, of soft dreamy shadows, and rich triumphant music; whose swell brought back no faint, sad yearnings for the departed—no dim remembrance of brighter, happier days. And there were gathered the departed ones; the warriors who made earth tremble, who had left a name that could never die; the bards who had swept their lyres while nations heard entranced; they of giant intellect, who had revolutionized nations; the learned, the mighty and the renowned met by its silvery waters, and wandered amid the twilight shadows of its amaranth bowers. It was a heaven of undying glories, inhabited by intellects as resplendently bright as its own gorgeous, unparalleled scenery. But they of humble birth; they above whose graves Fame reared no stately monument; the weary and toil-worn slave whose strength of soul had been poured out like water in the service of others; the child who passed away like a withered rose-bud; the mother who wept over it with no prospect of a re-union, these were not there. They slept amid earth's green valleys, with the bright flowers waving over them; unknown, and soon forgotten. There was no place for them in that better land; no home for the friendless and the forlorn; no song of freedom to welcome earth's weary and o'erburdened children, to a brighter and happier home.

How gladly, with what emotions of transport, do we turn from the contemplation of such prospects to our own broad views of the spirit's home. Not only do we expect to meet the great and illustrious of earth, the mighty conquerors of other days; the seers, the prophets and poets of olden times;

But they, the loved ones of our youthful days, They that looked on us with their soul-lit eyes, They upon whom our hearts deep love was poured All, in their beauty shall before us rise.

It is the home to which we may look in the moment of bereavement, and feel assured that no loved face will there be wanting to complete the fullness of our joy; that no untoward circumstance will separate from us the cherished ones; no cry of anguish sound wildly forth, proclaiming alike the wretchedness and depravity of man. It will be the home of the friendless, a father's house, a haven of eternal rest.

THE STAR IN THE EAST.

Brightly gleamest thou, blest harbinger of approaching day! Thy name itself betokens thee an ever welcome messenger, for LOVE is sought and cherished by the good and great of all ages and climes. Untiring, too, art thou in thy ministrings of kindness, for thy power remains as great, and thou shinest as brightly now, as when earth was ushered from chaotic darkness, and man in his primeval purity, first looked upon a world, pronounced by its Creator to be "very good."

To the debauchee, the vile gamester and unrepenting pirate, thou appearest with the mild beams of pity and compassion to warn them of approaching ruin and bitter remorse—to tell them that though midnight's depths enshroud them, yet there is an eye that sleeps not—an eye that penetrates the thick darkness and bears aloft their thoughts to Him whose arms are outstretched in mercy to guide them to reformation's fountain, where are purer enjoyments and nobler attractions.

To the actor in life's busy scenes, thou sayest "up, for the day is dawning." To those who are languishing on a bed of pain, weary of watching with disease's grim form, thou appearest in brightness to tell them that the long, long night is nearly ended. Ay, to the suffering thou hast a better lesson; thou didst of old guide the wise man o'er Bethlehem's plains, to where "a child was born;" a child, the infant Redeemer, he who left his Father's bright realms to tell them their afflictions were for good, and but for a season; that the long night-watch of suffering would end, and a day of unclouded serenity dawn to go no more out forever. Thrice welcome then, glad Star, when thou art the means of bringing us good tidings like these; tidings that a day is coming when brother will love brother, and the delusive, dishonoring errors of humanity be blotted out forever.

But modern magi say thou art inhabited; (strange that appearances should so much belie the reality;) that a little speck of brightness like thee, affords food and enjoyment for millions of animals, as various in kind and wants as those of our earth; and that intellectual beings too exist there, subject to similar desires with ourselves. Is it so? Wilt tell us, thou Venus, or permit some of thy numerous inhabitants themselves to commune us? Do ye have the same exertions to make to learn a little, that we do? do ye have the same dull round of eating, drinking and sleeping? or art thou all intellectual, having none of these gross desires? Has the fiery alcohol entered your bright borders and preyed upon your people until they were obliged to arouse, one and all, to annihilate his power? or have they ever drank at the clear fountain of crystal waters, in its purity an emblem of our best Teacher? How is it with Mesmerism, Millerism and the ten thousand other isms which visit us, and may be true, or may not? Ye are nearer the sun than we; how does that luminary appear to you? can you see mountains, rivers, and trees on his fiery face? and Mercury, do ye ever visit him? Did a Nero ever deluge your land with blood? a Koschusko or Washington become your champions for liberty? a Howard ever enter your prison walls and relieve their unhappy inmates from miseries untold? Did the Son of God leave his celestial abode to teach their duties to each other, to blot out their transgressions, to point them to a better world where the weary find rest? or are you now the abode of happy immortal beings who have never warred; never entered sin's dark domains or tasted misery's bitter dregs.

"Wert thou never ransomed—never lost?
Then gladly would I soar to thee,
Were this imprisoned spirit free."

In Monroeton, Pa., on March 8th. by Rev. S. J. Gibson, Mr. ANTHONY MULLAN, to Miss HARRIET L. MASON, all of that place.

Same place, by the same, on Feb. 16th, Mr. BARAK CUSHING, to Mrs. JULIA WEST, all of Boston.

DEATHS.

At her residence in Novi, Oakland county, Mich., of a brief but most painful illness, Mrs. LUCY, wife of Samuel Hungerford, Esq., and sister of the Rev. Pitt Morse, of Jefferson county, N. Y., aged 38 years, 10 months and 5 days.

In the death of Mrs. Hungerford, the community have sustained a severe loss. Having been one of the earliest settlers in the town in which she resided, frequent opportunities were presented in the course of years, for extending assistance to those who had sought residence in the then lonely wilderness, destitute of the immediate means of comfort; and an opportunity of relieving the needy, or comforting the afflicted, (when within her power,) she never neglected. It is believed by those who knew her best that few persons within her sphere of action, have extended relief and administered comfort to a greater number of fellow beings. From its commencement to the time of her death, (some four years,) she was a member of the Universalist Church in the town in which she lived—and an enlightened and in all respects a most exemplary Christian. She left a husband, one son and a daughter, together with numerous relatives, to mourn her untimely departure from the scene of her usefulness; with whom a very large circle of neighbors most heartily sympathize—and it is believed that she had no enemy.

"The bright gem is dropped in eternity's ocean;
Too soon called to yield life's ephemeral breath;
That heart, once the home of each generous emotion,
Lies listless and cold on the bosom of death.
Yet, if aught can give peace to the friends that survive her

Or soothe those who mourn her too early doom;—
'Tis her virtues remembered; long, long to outlive her.
And shed their bright halo around the dark tomb."

The funeral was attended, at the Methodist Chapel in Northville, on the Sabbath following her death, by a vast concourse of people, and the consolations of the gospel tendered to the surviving friends, by the writer; from Jer. viii: 22.

A. H. CURTIS.

At Felts Mills, Jefferson county, Feb. 21, of dropsy of the brain, ROYAL, son of Orlen and Caroline Wheelock, in the 15th year of his age. That this youth had lived long enough to fill a large place in the affections not only of his fond and doting parents, brothers and sisters, but of the community in which he lived, was abundantly manifested by the visible signs of deep sympathy manifested by a crowded congregation at the funeral. The parents though deeply afflicted, feel more deeply than ever the preciousness of their faith in the doctrine of impartial grace. They feel that they have comforts of which the world knows not—comforts which neither infidelity nor partialism have power to confer. Funeral services by the writer.

In Trenton, Oneida county, on the 10th inst., of consumption, NORMAN HOVEY, aged 21 years. In this dispensation of Providence, the parents have been deprived of a dutiful son, the children of an affectionate brother, and can find consolation in their afflictions alone in that Gospel which brings life and immortality to light. He endured great sufferings during the protracted illness of about three years, without murmuring; and calmly and patiently waited for his final earthly change. Amiable in life, resigned in death, he fell in the morning of his days, and rests in peace. His funeral was attended at the Unitarian church, by a large concourse of people, and an able discourse delivered by the Rev. E. Buckingham, from these words, "As the flower of the field so he flourisheth." A. H. L.

THE WISDOM OF GOD.

Whether we contemplate the diminutive atom of matter, or consider the great luminary of heaven, or scrutinize the universe, as by chemical analysis; or still, in every department of nature do we see the impress of Divinity, and the grand display of his infinite wisdom. Innumerable objects, stamped with unbounded intelligence, every where rise to view, and emphatically declare to the beholder the existence of their eternal Author. The philosopher is electrified with sublime emotions, at every step of his researches, by the continuous manifestations of divine wisdom; and with calm serenity, and reverential awe, turns his mind towards the moral Governor of the universe.

Among the endless proofs of the wisdom of God, afforded in the immensity of Creation, we have innumerable, and wonderful evidences, portrayed in the provision made for the wants of the vegetable and animal kingdoms. Every animal and plant, is amply supplied with the means for its propagation and continuance, and provided with a soil and climate admirably adapted to its peculiar nature. In order that vegetables might become generally diffused throughout the earth, and thereby contribute to the support of the animal kingdom, and more effectually to guard them against extermination, we find each wisely provided with the adequate means for its dissemination, which is effected either by seeds or widely extended roots; the former, if heavy and immovable, are generally palatable to birds and beasts, and being swallowed, are conveyed whither they roam. Others are provided with small hooks, which attach themselves to every moving body, that comes in contact with them, and are by this means distributed in the surrounding country. Others, again, are winged and feathered, and are thus easily wafted by the breeze to the remotest parts of the earth. The multitude of insects that prey upon vegetables, and in some cases to an alarming extent, is generally considered, by illiterate persons, as a curse pronounced upon man for his original iniquity, when in fact, it is a beautiful display of divine wisdom, as a means for preserving the various species of vegetables, and that unceasing and universal variety, that characterizes nature in all her operations. For as all plants are at war, as it were, with each other, each endeavoring to exterminate the other, were it not for the fact, that every plant has its proper insect, to curb its luxuriance, and to prevent it from multiplying to the exclusion of the others, the result would be, that plants would not be found growing indiscriminately together, giving beauty and variety to the earth's surface, but would exist in extensive groups. That plant which is most prolific, and best adapted to the soil and climate, would invariably gain the ascendancy, to the inevitable destruction of the other contiguous plants; and hence the unavoidable consequences would be, that many species of vegetables would become extinct, and sickening monotony would take the place of enlivening variety. In the arctic regions, where vegetation can flourish only a few months in the year, we discover that kind Providence has provided, by a wise arrangement in his laws, a copious supply of carbonic acid, by means of which vegetation is quickly matured, and thus adequate sustenance is afforded to the animal kingdom in those cold boreal climates. In the equatorial regions, on the other hand, where vegetation is extensive, and a corresponding quantity of carbonic acid is decomposed and expended in the nutrition of plants, we discover that the deficiency is supplied, by the superabundance of carbonic acid, from the polar regions, and that the same current of air which moves by the revolution of the earth, from the equator to the poles, brings to the arctic regions, in its passage from the equator, the superfluous oxygen generated there; and, in its return, carries back the carbonic acid gas, not needed in the process of vegetation, and thus, by infinite Wisdom, the balance of the atmospheric ingredients is preserved, and health secured to the vegetable and animal kingdoms. Wild vegetables possess the remarkable quality, of undergoing a radical change, both in their external appearance, and the properties of their fruits, when submitted to the culture of man, and thereby contribute largely to his wants. And to preserve them from annihilation when deprived of human culture, they are wisely endowed with the mysterious faculty of degenerating into their original condition, which requires not human attendance to preserve them from extinction. Animals also possess this wonderful capacity, (though in a more limited degree,) of adapting their nature and configuration to concomitant circumstances; and in consequence thereof, contribute greatly to their own peculiar wants, and to that of man. The overgrown sturdy dray horse, with his widely expanded chest, and cumbersome body, is undoubtedly the progeny of the fleet, wild courser of the forest; and owes his present nature and configuration, to circumstances, attending the life of his immediate ancestors. The various species of dogs, says a celebrated author, "were all originally descended from common parents, and the various wants, arising from the circumstances under which each individual was placed, has produced the material change that we now observe." The sheep of the temperate zones, which supplies man so abundantly with clothing, with his soft, fleecy wool, unquestionably was once a species of tropical goat.

We are also filled with admiration, on considering the instinct and tendencies of certain vegetables. For instance, on examining the roots of a tree not requiring much moisture for its support, which perchance has grown near a brook, we invariably find, that they turn in their course, and extend in an opposite direction; whilst, on the other hand, on examining the roots of a tree requiring much aqueous nutriment, as that of the willow or elm, to our great astonishment, we discover that they turn towards the stream of water, that they may more abundantly absorb moisture, and thus more effectually sustain the luxuriant growth of the tree.

Dr. Good makes mention of a shrub that accidentally grew upon a decaying wall, which at first mounted upward with amazing rapidity, until it became imminently in danger of perishing for want of proper nourishment; when, suddenly, as if possessing intelligence, it was arrested in its upward progress, and expended its nutriment in sending its roots downward till they reached the ground, when it again commenced its usual upward growth. The perfect insolubility in cold water, of vegetable matter, in the progress of decay, appears, on close scrutiny, to be a most wise arrangement of nature. For if it possessed even the solubility ascribed to humic acid, it would be dissolved by rain water, and hence our fertile meadows would be deprived of their humus by long irrigations, and even slight rains would impoverish the ground; but under the present arrangement, it can only be dissolved when united to oxygen, and consequently can only be taken up by water, in the form of carbonic acid. The distribution of white colors in the arctic, and those of green and black in the tropical regions of the globe, is beautifully adapted to secure the end proposed, by the Eternal Mind. For were the reverse order to take place, the most fatal and destructive consequences would ensue. The solar heat in the polar districts, would be rapidly absorbed, and insupportable cold would be produced in the frigid zones; whilst, on the other hand, the solar rays would be reflected in the equatorial portions of the globe, and heat so excessive would accumulate in the lower stratum of atmosphere, that inevitable destruction to the animal and vegetable kingdoms would be the deplorable result. The infinite variety of beings and objects formed from a few simple elements, and the definite proportions in which these elements unite, speak volumes in favor of the wisdom of God; and are, of themselves, sufficient to convince every reasonable mind, that order and system pervade the universe; and that all nature is under the laws of infinite Intelligence. During the cold winter months, when the sun is partially withdrawn from our hemisphere, the moon with her enlivening silvery face, as if ushering from the Fountain of wisdom, makes her welcome visits, more lengthy with us than during the summer, spreading cheerfulness and life over our land, and dispelling the midnight darkness. The most necessary things are with the most consummate wisdom, generally diffused; whilst, on the contrary, those things that are less essential to human happiness, are less numerous, and more solitary. Food, drink, raiment, &c., are distributed every where; whilst gold, gems and other luxuries, are found only in certain places. Grain and grasses, the most useful to mankind, grow in more soils and climates than any other vegetables; and air and water, are judiciously spread throughout the globe, and wisely placed beyond the control of man. The justice of God is often foolishly arraigned, by inconsiderate persons, who charge him with partiality for making an unequal distribution of his blessings, in conferring beautiful farms and superior native powers upon one person, and withholding them from another. But in fact, when we look upon this subject in a philosophical sense, we irresistibly discover, that the dissimilarity observed in the human form and countenance, so far from being an act of injustice, is a wonderful exhibition of infinite wisdom. For were not the human features and human person constantly various, there could be no mark of distinction between persons—crime would pass undetected; criminals would perpetrate their deeds of villainy with impunity, without the least possible means of detection, and ruinous anarchy and chaotic confusion would reign throughout the land.

The anomaly discovered in water, to the general principle, that all bodies expand when heated, and contract when cooled, is another striking instance of the mercy and wisdom of God; for were not water subjected to the law that causes it to expand, at all degrees below the freezing point, and gradually to contract and become more dense, till it attains 40° F., and then to reverse its law again, and expand for all degrees of elevated temperature above this point—the most fatal consequences would ensue. For as the water upon the surface of deep rivers and lakes became congealed into ice, it would constantly descend to the bottom, until the water became frozen solid, and the destruction of man, together with all other animals, would be unavoidable, for want of water. And even if water did not become more dense from the freezing point, till it attains 40° F., the ice in many of our deep waters would remain undissolved during nearly the whole extent of our summer season.

In leaving the earth's surface, and diving into the subaqueous portions of the globe, still there do we equally find that infinite wisdom is present. Here in this vast laboratory, we discover materials in abundance for the generations of the innumerable shells of the mighty deep, which, by many eminent philosophers, are supposed to be the mediate means by which granitic rocks are formed. Here, by the simple means of small zoophite, coral reefs are formed for the habitation of man, many thousand miles in extent. Mineral springs are constantly rising from the lowest depths of the ocean, yielding nourishment to submarine plants, and affording a constant supply of various salts to the grand aqueous reservoir—various marine inhabitants leave their retreats, as if urged by impulse, and roam through the boundless deep, affording sustenance to other animals that prey upon them. Thus, for instance, the seal makes his periodical excursions towards the poles, supplying food for the bear, wolf, &c.; whilst, on the other hand, the herring make their annual migrations towards the equator, affording exhaustless food for man and various marine animals. The boring shell, commonly called teredo navalis, has been foolishly considered by many, especially by seamen, as a destructive and useless animal, created by the Supreme Being to effect a vindictive and malignant purpose, in destroying ship timber; when, in truth, it is wisely designed by the Creator to serve a benevolent purpose—to bore, and subsequently to sink, the inconceivably large quantity of timber, that is floated by rivers into harbors and estuaries.

Among the numerous subjects that are included under the head of divine wisdom, the magnificence and beauty of the heavens, unquestionably strike

The eye, with the greatest force and splendor. By the aid of astronomical instruments, and a proper skill in using them, we discover that the planetary and stellar systems, are arranged in the heavens with the most perfect order, and harmony,—all occupying their respective places, in the immensity of space—each revolving in its allotted sphere, agreeable to certain immutably established laws—the sphere of each planet having the great king of day for its centre, which regulates its motion, and gives life, heat and light to its vegetable and animal kingdoms. Neither does he retire abruptly from our western, nor appear instantaneously in our eastern horizon; which would emerge suddenly from darkness to light, and from light to darkness, and thereby ruin our sense of vision, and subject us to many inconveniences; but by the wise provision of the refrangibility of light, and the refractive power of the atmosphere, his advent is gradual, and his exit slow and gentle; sending before or leaving behind him, his gentle daughter twilight.

The intelligence displayed in the human organism, and the constitution of the human mind, is of itself sufficient to fill the most callous heart with emotions of grandeur and irresistibly to force it to acknowledge, the existence of infinite wisdom.—Hamlet, in contemplating the grandeur of creation, breaks forth into this sublime apostrophe on man, "How noble in reason, how infinite in faculties! In form and moving, how express and admirable! In action, how like an angel! In apprehension, how like a God! The beauty of the world, the paragon of animals!" In view of the unspeakable wisdom every where displayed in the universe, well did the celebrated philosopher exclaim, "O Lord! how manifold are thy works! in wisdom thou hast made them all." Or justly did the heathen Cicero, in the depth of emotions, declare that "The beauty of the world, and the admirable order of the stars, are alone sufficient to make us acknowledge the existence of an eternal and all perfect Being, who merits the veneration of the human race."

A SIMILE.

I once had a young Pedagogue boarding with me, who made high pretensions to skill in figures. I took an opportunity to ask him to solve me a snug little problem in Arithmetic. He seized the slate with an air of assurance, and soon dashed me out an answer. But the difficulty was, he could not make it prove! He made another trial, and still another, but could not demonstrate his answer. This failure caused some of the children to think the fault was in Arithmetic itself; inasmuch as their learned teacher could not demonstrate his work. No, no, children, said I, do not think so; for I can assure you there is truth in Mathematics; and should he try and fail fifty times, still rest assured there is a blunder in the work. He has either misapplied the rules or else he has counted wrong. An unpretending bystander took up the slate, and with few figures wrought out the true answer, and proved it correct.

Just so, thought I, with the Christian religion—there is so much false figuring over it, that many children (and some with hoary heads!) are led to believe it all a farce. And no wonder; for craft and fanaticism have so far obscured the true light in the shades and mists of non-essentials, and external appearances and performances, that the quintessence of the whole, (viz., "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them,") is so obscured in the blaze of religious fanaticism, as to be considered too dark and dry to mention in a great revival assembly. But these false deductions are the inevitable result of a bad start in the premises. The false rule that the goodness of God is to turn on the goodness of his dependant creatures—that His nature is to be good to the good, and bad to the bad, is sheer Armianism, and has doubtless been the legitimate source of more infidelity than any other error ever promulgated in the world.

It was said of Titus, the Roman Emperor, that "He had a soul so generous and so brave,

That he his greatest enemies did save."

Is it not a pity for Christians to attach a character to the King of Kings, that would throw him completely into the shade when contrasted with that of a pagan monarch? What! God command us to burn the heads of our enemies with acts of kindness, and he burn his with endless wrath! It is not strange that "adders" will not listen to the sound of such charming. No, a bigoted, intolerant clergy have been for centuries figuring over a glorious subject; but basing it on a false theory, they fail in demonstrating. How is it possible for a man to love and adore a Deity that he thinks will torment a sinner endlessly for his sins; whilst he, himself, would be glad to save him from them if he had the power? It would seem as though the religious world had fancied that the Lord God had said unto them—"Now ye are coworkers together with me, and ye shall work by my rule, which is as follows—There is a world of sin and evil to resist, and when ye commence on poor sinners, begin with all, 'long suffering and labors of love; invite them, exhort the, and expostulate with them, and if they will be reclaimed by fair words and gentle means, well and good; but if not, when your patience is all exhausted, you will think that mine is also. Then turn upon them, give them over to the secular power for correction, if you have a union of church and state; if not, then do whatever the civil law will allow, if it is nothing more than to treat them with a kind of holy, scornful neglect.—If they are honest and kind-hearted, and make it the rule of their conduct to do as they would be done by, no matter, they are the more dangerous! If they will not confess your creed and receive your mark, call them infidels in disguise—treat them with studied religious contempt. You must allow them to attend your meetings, but should one arise to speak, sing him down, and bar all reasonings and investigations with him; for this is your safest way. Tell them that when the power of my love (which is stronger than death) has failed me, then will I overcome evil with my endless wrath! And be ye followers of me as dear children. When ye commence a revival, open with sweet inviting strains like the following—

"Come ye sinners poor and needy,
Weak and wounded, sick and sore,
Jesus ready stands to save you,
Full of pity love and power.
He is able—he is willing—doubt no more."

"But if there are any in divine presence who will not be born again, experience a change of heart, and become God's workmanship, and be created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that they should walk in them, before they step out over the threshold of your door; then tell them that I have changed my mind and feelings towards them entirely and eternally—that I have concluded to cast off forever, and anger shall henceforth rest in my bosom, as an eternal attribute of my nature—that I will no longer have compassion on the ignorant and those that are out of the way—that I will cause grief, but will no longer have compassion according to the (former) multitude of my mercies—that at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow, to be sure; but some willingly, and some unwillingly; some shall bow to my love, and others to my wrath—that every tongue shall confess, but some sincerely, and from others I will extort an awful hypocritical confession, and then hurl them down to the abodes of eternal death—that my whole nature is love, but my love is confined to my friends alone!

"After laboring and slaving through a protracted meeting for weeks together, by day and by night, dismiss the impenitent part of your audience with pathetic lines like the following—

"Far in the deep where darkness dwells,
The land of horror and despair,
Justice has built a dismal hell,
And laid her stores of vengeance there—
Eternal plagues and heavy chains,
Tormenting racks and burning coals,
And darts to inflict immortal pains,
Dipped in the blood of damned souls."

"And then retire and spend a sleepless night, wondering why the lion and lamb do not lie down together under the sound of such good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people."

And now the way to state the sum and prove it, is this.—No matter how pious man is, nor how many religious duties he attends to, it is impossible for him to love the Gospel with that perfect love that casteth out fear, so long as he understands it to embrace the doctrine of endless misery; for if the Gospel means any thing else besides salvation alone, there is no dependence to be placed upon it. If it is not as the angel said, "good tidings to all people—it is good tidings to nobody. And 1 John iv: 18, 19, well understood, is the proof. "There is no fear in love—but perfect love casteth out fear, because fear hath torment. He that feareth is not made perfect in love. We love him because he first loved us."

JUSTICE.

That philosophy which could not advance a single sentiment peculiar to itself, without contradicting some other prominent and necessary part of the same system, would be generally called a refuge of lies. And yet there is nothing so justly exposed to this impeachment, as the creeds which are framed in support of endless wo. Some of these contradictions we have already presented to the reader; and we will give a few more. We can scarcely look at the prevailing theology, in any light, without being confronted with the utter irreconcilability of the integral parts which go to make up the whole. It says that God's justice demands the endless damnation of the sinner. And accordingly we often—very often—hear the advocates of this doctrine say that if justice was done, not a single sinner would be out of hell now, meaning an endless hell. And yet they talk a great deal about justice, and profess great concern because they fancy that universal holiness and happiness are opposed to the justice of God. One moment they belie the justice of God—voluntarily assume a state of things contrary to the demands of justice, and bless God for it; and then turn round and accuse Universalism of being contrary to justice, and profess to abhor it on that account.

Nor is this the worst feature of this doctrine, that justice demands more than is inflicted. It is a bare faced charge of injustice upon God. God is either just or unjust. There is no half way ground. If he is just, he does all that justice prompts. If he does not accomplish all that justice prompts, he is unjust. Injustice consists as much in withholding justice, as it does in inflicting too much—as much in deficiency and omission as in excess. We say, then, that Partialism accuses God of injustice, when it represents him as omitting or withholding the demands of justice. The universal utterance of its advocates, when they kneel to confess their sins and beg for pardon, is—"O Lord, if thou hadst dealt justly by me, I should have been in hell with the damned, long ago!" What an inconsistency to pretend to beg for mercy at the same moment that one is accusing God of not doing justly!

It involves a contradiction equally glaring. Here we are told that the justice of God is not enforced, and in some cases, at least, never will be. This is the sentiment of the Partialist and his creed. And the same person and the same creed, refer us to the justice of God as proof of the doctrine of endless damnation.—Thus the creeds of men tell us that the justice of God is the foundation on which is built the doctrine of endless wo; and then assure us that this justice is so far from being enforced, that men are rescued from its demand here, and will be saved hereafter, who are justly deserving of as much wo as any others ever did or ever will! The very justice of God on which endless damnation depends, demands that the sinner should have been sent to hell long ago, and yet he is not there, and never will be. What a creed!

Let us condense this array of contradictions. Partialism is so much wedded to a certain something which it calls justice, that it abhors every thing which accords not with it, except itself. Then it contends that the very worst of sinners are not dealt justly by, and never will be. And then it says that the same justice, which it respects so much, and which is violated so often, is proof that sinners of far less viciousness, will be endlessly miserable. If any persons can show the harmony of truth among these propositions, I shall be much obliged to them. A. R. B.

REASON.

"Yea, and why, even of yourselves, judge ye not what is right?" Luke xii: 57.

It will not be necessary to point out the facts with which this passage of Scripture is connected—its simple spirit is all that is necessary to be borne in mind, while our meditation is directed to a few thoughts concerning reason. The object of the passage was, to direct the attention of the Jewish people, with whom the Saviour was conversing, to the truth that they could judge for themselves, of the affairs which were developing around them—in regard to the Messiah and the consequences of his coming. It recognizes the fact, that they had the right of judgment, of reasoning; and that if they exercised the power of reason, they would be likely to discover the truth.

It is no less necessary to interrogate people now, than it was in the days of Christ, "why, even of yourselves, judge ye not what is right?" Necessary, not only because so many people suffer their reason to lie perfectly idle in relation to divine things; but because the idea is still frequently contended for, that people have no right to reason, to examine thoroughly, what may be advanced as Christianity—that reason is likely to lead people astray—that it is carnal to reason—that we must implicitly believe whatever the word of God teaches, without asking and pursuing the question, "what is truth?"

I know of no position so unphilosophical and unscriptural, as the thought that we must not reason concerning sacred subjects. Take reason from man, and he is deprived of his intellectual greatness—the star of his existence becomes quenched, and like the blind idolator who reasons not, or who reasons ignorantly, he is ready to bow to the rule of superstition. It is upon the exercise of reason that we depend for the development of truth which will enlighten people, give them purer views of self-government, and clearer notions of God's reign and rule. And for the possession of reason, we are indebted to the benevolence of God—it is a spark from the eternal mind, deposited in earthly tabernacles. And so far from seeking to repress it, God respects its operations and seeks its better health and exercise. He called his ancient people to reason with him concerning his government over them—"come now, let us reason together, saith the Lord; though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." In this sublime instance, in which God reasoned with the Jews, we find him recognizing the right of reason on their part; unfolding his actions to them that they might decide for themselves concerning their justice and benevolence. I repeat it then—mind, reason, the power of judging between truth and error, is one of the richest boons from God to man—it is the breathing of his benevolence; a shadowing of himself.

On what ground then, is it contended that reason must not be used in reference to Christian truth? We may say that its exercise will lead men to imbibe error, in many instances. Admitted—but it does not therefore follow, that the thing abused, is not to be exerted. The exercise of the power of eating frequently betrays men to excess—they often abuse their moral sentiments and rush into vice—but who would hence dream that we are neither to eat or be active moral beings, because our powers are liable to abuse? The very same argument which is presented to show that reason is carnal in relation to divine truth, was produced as an argument by the Catholics against the free circulation of the Bible—for when, after the reformation, the first society of Deists sprang up in France, who rejected the Bible altogether, the Catholics argued that the fact of their rejecting it, was a strong reason why the great mass of people should not have the privilege of reading the Bible and deciding in regard to it for themselves. Now this argument is just as valid, as that which affirms that we must not reason concerning Christian truth, because so many reason themselves into error—though it may well be questioned, whether error, instead of arising from the exercise of reason, does not spring up for want of the healthy activity of reason.

We find it to be the case, by observation, that even those who affirm that reason is wrong, when exercised to test every religious opinion, do not hesitate to employ it in defence of Christianity. Let the atheist deny the existence of the supreme Being, and reason is at once roused into vigorous action in order to demonstrate the absurdity of his declaration. It ranges out into nature—it refers to the heavens and their countless hosts of worlds—to the earth and all its wonderful scenes—to the organized things which fill the vast universe—and by their side, tells the atheist to wake up his reason, that it may hear all those works

"Forever singing as they shine,
"The hand that made us divine."

Let the deist declare that the Bible is a fable, Christ an impostor, the resurrection a dream—and no one thinks of pursuing any other course, than to reason with him. Reason labors with energy to show him the necessity of a revelation from God—the fact that the Bible is such a revelation, filled as it is with minute prophecies, so wonderfully fulfilled centuries after they were spoken, is pressed upon his notice—he is told of the life and death of Christ—of the excellence of his doctrine—of the miracles he performed—of the morality of the Scriptures. These, with multitudes of other arguments are urged upon his notice, and in their strength, he is asked to judge for himself, whether, under such circumstances, the Bible can be a deliberate imposition upon the world.

Now, in answering the atheist and deist, no person thinks of denying the use of reason. But the very moment we open the lids of the Bible, and proceed to investigate the truth of certain opinions which are said to be in the Bible, and to thoroughly test them, then we begin to hear that reason is not to be exercised in regard to sacred subjects—that we must take religious principles as they are given to us. Now the whole secret of this objection, is simply this—the church has written certain notions in her creed-books, which she declares are sustained by the Bible—but lest the exercise of reason should lead to a denial of those opinions, it is said that reason is carnal and must not be used in regard to the supposed sacred creeds.

But so far from this procedure being correct, it is evident that the great truths of Christianity, the express revelation of God with its sublimity of faith and excellence of precept, are addressed to man's reason, to his perception of what is just and consistent. Paul said to his brethren, "prove all things; hold fast that which is good;"—while Messiah said to the Jews, "yea, and why, even of yourselves, judge ye not what is right?" Thus by their respect to reason, they paid homage to it and recognized its excellences. In fact, without reason, the Scriptures are a dead letter—for it is by reason that we compass the truth, perceive their harmony, judge of their excellency, and rejoice in their noble influence among men. And I do not know of a single principle in them, which is exempt from the full gaze of reason. So far from enfeebling and depriving reason of its power in regard to Christianity, it is here that its greatest energy is demanded; its highest and holiest powers called for. And mind should be perfectly free, untrammelled, when approaching the book, which, like a full and gushing fountain, ever pours its waters of light and salvation into every community. Indeed, the individual who best appreciates the Scriptures—who enters the most fully into their spiritual meaning—who rejoices with the greatest zest, in their sublime and ever holy truth—is he who has examined them most thoroughly and reasoned most fervently concerning them with all prayerful industry.

And if people would exercise their reason more and trust their teachers less—if they would persevere in thoroughly ascertaining whether the religious opinions presented them are indeed taught in the Bible—if their minds were always exercised with the question which Pilate addressed to the Saviour, "what is truth?"—then there would be less error, less difference of faith, and consequently far less bitter opposition than now exists between the sects. G. W. M.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The marriage in Mentz had no name as a voucher for the notice. We repeat, we can not insert notices of marriages and funerals that are sent us anonymously—they must be signed by some responsible person. In fact, all articles and notices intended for publication should be signed by the writer's or sender's name. If the name is not to be published, say so, and we will keep it secret. But we insist on it, that a correspondent who can not and will not confide in an Editor's honor, has no right to ask an Editor to confide in the honor and veracity of an anonymous writer. Are we understood?

Br. Kibbe—please favor us with your address, we have a letter for you. Your volumes will be bound for you, if sent to this office.

Br. Kingsbury—the cars run daily on the road from Auburn to Albany, at present.

Br. E. T. M.—I would prefer waiting until you can get more information. A call for more, might be inserted.

Br. Warren's sermon in our next.

Dorothy's letter received, and will be duly attended to. The former article was not inserted because it was too long for one number, and would not well allow being divided. The article is really a good one—none too severe for the circumstances were the fellow himself worth the notice. But I have seen so much of his want of candor and veracity in his published articles—of his determination to misrepresent us, in despite of all the kindly given information of our brethren, that I must conclude that God has permitted him to cherish the strong delusion that "the end justifies the means," and left him to believe a lie, that he may be damned. Perhaps after Satan has tormented him sufficiently, he may realize that God judgeth in the earth, and so his spirit be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. Amen.

The above remarks are thus offered, to save the labor of writing letters to each person concerned. A. B. G.

THE REGISTER FOR 1844.—Inquiries are sometimes made, why a certain preacher's name is inserted, or another's omitted, in the Register? I answer, in general terms, that I can give no reasons about it, being wholly dependant on brethren at a distance for information and correction of the list. Probably there is no design in either case, but simple inattention or forgetfulness. In some cases, men are retained in formal fellowship by their Associations, long after they have ceased to preach, or to be worthy. Now it is not my province (or that of my informant) to judge the Association, and rectify their neglect of duty. All such persons must be registered as preachers in fellowship, for they are officially such; and if there is any wrong about it, and any blame for that wrong, let it be charged where it belongs—to the negligent, or cowardly, or corrupt Association; for one or the other it is in such case. Indeed, I believe the registering of such persons is useful, inasmuch as the public shame may drive the Associations to do their duty. I believe that the publication of our Register annually, with the necessary calls for statistical information, has had a powerful influence in regard to a better organization in our denomination. It shows the necessity for organizing our various ecclesiastical bodies, and keeping them organized, in such a way that the annual calls for information may be supplied, and that the published statements may be a little more correct, and full, and creditable to the persons and societies and Associations concerned. I know that it has had such an effect; and I hope that this effect may be increased until we can have a Register whose gaps, and vacuums, and errors, will not cause any Universalist to blush.

But the object of this article is to say, let the Standing Clerk of every Association in our order, furnish a list of preachers and societies, &c., &c., in fellowship (and of those approved preachers not in fellowship) with his Association, and send it to the nearest Universalist Editor for publication forthwith—and I may get my list corrected up to the present date at least.

Will our Editors please notice this call, and publish the answers they may receive, in their respective papers? and greatly oblige all concerned in this department of labor.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

"THE TREE OF LIFE, a monthly Journal devoted to the doctrines of universal grace." Published in Waterloo, Seneca county, N. Y., at $1.00, or 75 cents if paid in advance, by Alihu Bordman! A ministering brother has sent us the first number of this small sheet of interesting odds and ends, for which he has our thanks. We wish to say nothing of Mr Bordman; but as he publishes a professedly Universalist paper, we deem it proper to inform the public, that Rev. Alihu Bordman, formerly of the Methodist ministry, is not in the fellowship of the Universalist denomination, and that therefore he alone is responsible for his own sayings, writings and doings.

"RECOLLECTIONS OF FIFTY YEARS SINCE; with glances at present aspects and future portents of the age and times. A Lecture delivered before the Young Men's Association of the city of Utica, February 2d, 1843.—By Ezekiel Bacon. R. W. Roberts, Printer, pp. 43." We thank the venerable and esteemed author for a copy of the above lecture; the more particularly as its perusal greatly interested and amused, as well as instructed us. It is a very agreeable mélange of recollections of the past, candidly compared with the improvements and deteriorations of present manners, customs, conveniences and morals. Judge Bacon, unlike too many of the aged, looks through hopeful eyes, and consequently, in most respects, the future of our earth, though he may not see but a little portion of it, send its brightness back to warm and cheer his own heart. The moral reflections and excellent advice to the young, which close his lecture, are worthy of the giver and the receivers. The pamphlet is for sale in our Bookstores generally, and should have been noticed earlier—but "better late than never" says the Editor for himself, and to those whom he advises to purchase and read it!

CHRIST HEALING THE SICK—This large and beautiful and interesting painting, by Sir Benjamin West, is now being exhibited in Mechanic's Hall in this city, and will soon be exhibited in the principal places in the western part of this State. The subject of this painting is recorded in Matt. xxi: 14, 15—and its merits are universally acknowledged to be very great—worthy the fame of the great American artist by whom it was designed and executed. The price of admission is put so low, that nearly all can embrace this (probably only) opportunity of seeing a great painting, by a great artist, on an interesting and instructive subject. Let all who have, or would cultivate, a taste for such things, spend an hour in calmly and quietly surveying this picture, and trying to become absorbed in its representations.

THE ZINCALLI; or an account of The Gipsies of Spain. with an original collection of their Songs and Poetry. By George Borrow, author of the Bible in Spain, &c.

Every reader of that delightful book—"The Bible in Spain"—will hail the appearance of another work by the author, in the same cheap and commodious form, with feelings of sincere pleasure. Nothing can be more exciting and interesting than this picturesque and vivid narrative of the customs, habits and dwellings of those wild, strange and gregarious people. They are more wonderful than the Egyptians of old, or the wandering hordes of Asia and Africa. Mr. Borrow lived among them till they fancied him one of themselves—and the reader may well be subject to the same illusion, on account of the perfect knowledge which the author displays, with all the romantic incidents and adventures of these Ishmaelites of modern days.

Terms.—Single copies 25 cents—five copies for $1; $16 per hundred. Address, J. Winchester, 33 Ann-st. N. Y.

THAT FIFTY CENTS!!!

The time is approaching when our terms will require the addition of fifty cents to the subscription of all those who have not paid for the current volume. We remind our patrons of this fact, in the hopes that they will be induced to benefit themselves, and at the same time give us that assistance which we so much need at the present time. Will our agents endeavor to collect as much, and as speedily as possible, and forward the same.

The English papers make mention of the death of Richard Carlisle, the infidel publisher; and they add that he, some time since, made an open profession of Christianity.

The whale ship Barclay, at New Bedford, reports that the United States sloop of war John Adams sailed from Cape Town, Cape of Good Hope, on the 3d of January, from Rio Janeiro, having Capt. Boernum and the other officers and crew of the sloop of war Concord, lost on the East Coast of Africa.

A bill has been read in the Senate of Pennsylvania by Mr. Sullivan, called "an act to punish seduction, and to afford a more adequate remedy for the injury." The bill declares that the seduction of any female is an indictable offence, and in addition to the remedies now given by law, any person convicted of this offence in any court of quarter sessions, shall be sentenced to pay a fine of not less than $500, nor more than $10,000, at the discretion of the court, and further, to undergo solitary confinement, at hard labor, in the penitentiary, not less than one year, nor more than ten; and that the action for seduction may be sued by the mother or any other relative of the female seduced.

At a meeting of the Synod of Alabama, on the third week in January last, contributions were called for to purchase a colored man, a slave, of extraordinary character. It was stated that he was a good classical scholar, and wholly self-taught. He is a blacksmith; and it was stated on the floor of the Synod, by members and others, who knew him, that he first learned the letters of the alphabet by inducing his master's children and others, to make the letters one at a time, on the door of the shop. In this way he familiarized himself with the letters and their names. He then learned to put them together and make words, and soon was able to read. He then commenced the study of arithmetic, and then English grammar and geography.

It was also stated that he is now able to read the Greek Testament with ease, has some knowledge of the Latin language, and even commenced the study of the Hebrew language, but relinquished it in consequence of not having suitable books. It was stated that he studied at night till 11 or 12 o'clock, and that in conversing with him, they felt themselves in the presence of their equal.

Mr. Shortridge, formerly a merchant in Portsmouth, N. H., but for sometime poor and subject to occasional derangement, recently became greatly troubled by the doctrines of Miller, and had made a garb for the Second Advent. The Boston Bulletin states, that a few days since, becoming impatient, he climbed to the top of a tree, clothed in his robe, and attempting to leap upward fell to the ground and was killed.

The heirs of one of our oldest and wealthiest citizens, who died a few weeks back, on taking possession of his house discovered a large sum of money of which they had no previous knowledge whatever. They continued their researches until the sum of one hundred thousand dollars was collected, (of which there was no account left by the deceased,) part in bank bills but the larger portion in checks, one, two and three years old, upon our city banks—not certified—and yet every dollar of which was promptly paid on presentation at the different banks. Such windfalls are rare enough.—[N. Y. American.

A child about four years old, a son of Mr. Walter, of Lyel Road, was choked to death on Saturday evening, in consequence of getting a bean in his throat, while playing with it.—Rock. Dem.

We are informed by Mr. Lynds, superintendent of the Troy and Schenectady Rail Road depot at Saratogo Springs was destroyed by fire yesterday morning, with eleven passenger cars and twelve freight cars. The building was a large one, and the loss by the fire must be considerable.—Troy Whig.

The sixth of April ensuing has been set apart by the Governor of Massachusetts, as a day of humiliation, fasting and prayer, throughout the commonwealth.

Mr. Amasa Stetson, of Dorchester, Mass., has presented the citizens of that town with a spacious building valued at $10,000. It is divided into two large stores and a school room, and the rents of the stores are to be applied to the support of the school.

The late insurrection in Rhode Island cost that State $98,959 18.

A gentleman at Point Petre, (Guadaloupe,) giving an account of the earthquake which recently destroyed that city, mentions that while he was attempting to escape, his foot and leg were caught in one of the deep fissures of the earth, and he thought that he was fast. But another shock came, and the crack opened again, and he escaped.

The Albany Daily Advertiser of the 5th inst., says:—A young man while attending a thrashing machine at Esperance, Schoharie county, a few days since, in the act of pitching the sheaves, slipped and fell, his head striking immediately upon the teeth of the machine, and was drawn in and instantly crushed to atoms. The unfortunate boy died immediately.

We understand that the estate of the late Elmore Williams, of this city, is estimated at about $500,000; and it yields the income of that sum. It is also, we believe, totally without debt. This large property is the accumulation of one life in the city of Cincinnati, without speculation or mercantile operations of any kind.—Cin. Chron.

MEMORY OF JOYS THAT ARE PAST.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

There is a tear of sweet relief—
A tear of rapture and of grief;
The feeling heart alone can know
What soft emotions bid it flow;
It is when memory charms the mind,
With tender images refined;
'Tis when her magic spells restore
Departed friends and joys no more.
There is an hour—a pensive hour,
And oh! how dear its soothing power;
It is when twilight spreads her veil,
And steals along the silent dale;
'Tis when the fading blossoms close,
When all is silence and repose;
Then memory wakes; and loves to mourn
The days that never can return.
There is a strain—a plaintive strain,
The source of Joy, and yet of pain;
It is the song whose dying measure
Some friend beloved has heard with pleasure,
Some friend who ne'er again may hear
The melting lay of Memory dear;
Ah! then by magic spells restore
Visions of blissful day no more.

TOO LATE.

"It is well," said the venerable man to his wife, as they sat together late one evening in July, 1840, "it is well that we discovered the character and habits of the young man, before he had advanced farther in our esteem; he might else have inveigled our only daughter into marriage, and brought disgrace upon us, as well as misery upon our child."

"Which would have been misery to us, too, surely," said the wife.

"It would have been insupportable misery. But, thank God," continued he, raising his eyes in heartfelt gratitude, "I was informed in season to prevent my child from the disgrace of a connection with a —."

"With a what?" said a good looking young man, bowing to the venerable pair, "with a what, sir? speak out now! I am your daughter's husband; and it seems not unfit that there should be so much confidence between father and son, as that the father should know the opinion of the former upon his pursuits, when the former knows the relation in which each stands to the other."

"If it is too late to prevent the marriage," said the father—

"It is too late."

"Then, at least, though my rights as a father may have ceased, those of a husband and of a man are unimpaired; and if I can not rule those in my house, I can, at least, say who shall be its inmates."

"Father," said the bride, kneeling, with clasped hands, "do not cast me from you; give me—give him time at least, to prove that you have not done him justice. Mother, dear mother!"

The closing of the door at the other side of the room drew the attention of the suppliant, and she found that her husband was the only one left with her. It was too late.

Hand in hand the newly married pair left what had been to the wife an Eden of quiet happiness. The stern commands of a father were there, at least, to be obeyed; and she was yet to learn whether a serious act of disobedience on her part, would ever be forgiven by one had seemed wrapped up in her affections—whose life was apparently entwined with her obedience.

She left that Eden, then. Hand in hand the banished pair took their departure; and as the offending daughter, and confiding wife, turned back to look at the closing door of her paternal mansion, it seemed to her, indeed, as if some angel, severe in awful beauty, guarded the portal against her entrance to the place which she had desecrated by filial disobedience.

The pride of the new husband, was just too much for his situation. He was anxious, not only to maintain his wife independently of her family, but to give her many of those comforts to which she had been accustomed. He could easily have attained the former, and have met all her wishes in that respect; but his pride induced him to neglect rational means of acquiring ordinary comforts, and led him to resort to what he deemed chances of sudden wealth. He had, before his marriage, suffered in the estimation of many respectable persons, by his associating with certain dashing young men, who, to their other social qualities, were supposed to add that of fondness for games of hazard. He had amused himself in that way without pecuniary profits, and by observation, had learned the tricks of the art without practicing them upon others.

Time passed onward, and the young wife became a mother, and saw, in the birth of her boy, a renewal of the attentions of her husband, which, without apparent lapse of affections, certainly without other evidences of unkindness, had of late been pretermitted. He had absented himself from his home until a late hour at night, and had appeared haggard and care worn. It was also obvious, that the means of support were diminished, and the wife began to feel many, very many, of her comforts curtailed. The descent was rapid, and with it, the renewal of absence of the husband at night; but no open unkindness was exhibited, nor was there reproach on her part, unless the pale cheek, the emaciated frame, and the heart broken sigh could be so construed.

Misery, wretchedness, absolute want, beset the family; and the husband tore himself away from the bed of his wife and child early in the evening, with a determination to bring back to them some means of comfort. He met an old friend, who informed him that a place was vacant in an office which, with security for fidelity, would be his.

"And who will be that security?"

"Who? Any one—I will. I told you so two years ago."

"Will you now, indeed?"

"Present yourself to me to-morrow free of debt, and I will insure the place."

He was not free from debt, but a few hundred dollars would make him so. He felt assured that a few hours at the gaming table, the last time he would ever darken the accursed doors, would supply him with means to pay those debts—more than that he would not receive.

He hastened to the place, and paused at the last step of the door. "Why should I go in? The few hundred dollars which I owe, I can soon save; and he who, knowing my poverty, would be security for fidelity, would not think worse of my character, if I confess my indebtedness, and my determination never to place myself within the chance of such dangers again."

The resolution so excellent relieved his heart, and he turned with new feelings to adopt a course of virtue. It was then "too late."

He saw within a few yards of him, one of the officers of the institution in which he was to have a place of trust. To have turned from the door would be to expose himself, and he could not stand where he was. He entered, he played, and at midnight had won a few dollars. His "luck had turned," he said; he "followed up the luck," and daylight saw him possessed of more than the desired sum.

He left the gambling room a man of better resolves than he had been, though he had always resolved well. He thought of the pleasure in store, of the good he would yet do, and the delights he could yet enjoy.

The outer door of the house in which he lived was open. He stole quietly up the stairs, and gently lifted the latch of his room door. It was dark and still. The child, at length, moved. He felt that his wife had occasion to complain of his long absence, but the joy of his heart was to make her understand the new resolution he had formed, and the means he now possessed of carrying it into effect. He called her by name—she did not answer. He felt that his new intentions deserved more kindness. He called again, but in vain. He then opened a window shutter, and the light of the morning poured full upon the face of his infant. He went to the bed to awaken his wife. He laid his hand upon her arm, and its icy chillness struck to his heart. He threw himself upon the bed, and groaned in anguish. The crying of the child called some of the tenants of the house to the room.

The Coroner's aid was demanded over the dead body of the wife. The verdict of the jury was, "Died of the visitation of God." But one or two thought that distress had weakened her frame so much, that the anxiety and cares, the new feeling of suspicion, or the sense of utter abandonment that night, had been too much. Her heart broke with its over freight.

The pride of the injured father at length yielded, and with quiet efforts, he traced out the residence of his daughter.

Determined to meet her at more than half way towards reconciliation, he came just as the husband had awakened to sense of his misery. It is "too late," said the latter, and pointed to the bed.

The pomp of a funeral did not insult the wretchedness of the living, or the emaciated form of the dead.

The grave is on the very verge of the western declivity of Laurel Hill. There is no stone to tell whose heart moulders there. Why should there be? What lesson could it teach?

He whose reformation was almost begun before her death, tried the path of virtue afterwards, but it was "too late."

He had resolved to reform for the sake of his wife, and not for the sake of virtue.

YANKEE ENTERPRISE.

The adventurous and enterprising disposition of the inhabitants of New England, has been frequently remarked, and is universally known. There is not a sea, however tempestuous or remote, which has not been furrowed by the keels of their ships; there is not a port, however inhospitable and uncivilized, which has not seen the gleam of their canvass; there is not a branch of trade which has not derived additional impulse from their energetic and persevering activity. Unchecked by dangers or distance, they launch out into the world with a confidence in their own resources, possessed, in an equal degree, by no other people, and which in itself is the surest guaranty of success. They seek their fortunes in every corner of the world; they mingle in every kind of business; they discover new sources of trade, or improvements in conducting old branches; and they drive before them, wherever they come, the less energetic, enterprising, and intelligent competitors they find in the field. A good illustration of the spirit which actuates them, is to be seen in a recent letter, published in some of the newspapers, from an officer of our squadron now in the China seas. He describes the beautiful opium ships which he saw, and mentions his astonishment at finding them, though under British colors, officered by Americans. Another anecdote, which, perhaps, our readers will recollect, has been frequently told to the same point, respecting some Russian exploring expedition in the South seas. The squadron had attained a degree of latitude, which it was supposed had never before been reached when land was descried. The commander was congratulating himself upon a discovery which was to immortalize his name, when, standing out from the land, a schooner was observed, which was a sealing vessel of thirty tons. Hoisting the stars and stripes, the Yankee captain ran along side of the Commodore, and very politely offered to pilot him in. The Russian was most probably astonished to find such a craft and crew at a spot which in Europe was not known to exist; but, for ourselves, we can not conceive of a place where to find a Yankee that would astonish us.—Working a gold mine on Himalah, or speculating in dead horse flesh among the Usbees—heading a caravan across the Sahara, or trapping bears at the north pole—bartering yellow buttons for goat's hair in the capitol of the Grand Lama, or exchanging fox-caps and coral, for Soudan ingots, in the stalls of Timbuctoo—in any and all these places and employments we could meet a Yankee, a real down-easter, without the slightest emotion of surprise.—Hunt's Merchants Magazine.

FUNERAL SERMON.

Delivered at the funeral of Mr. Douglas Parke, of Pitcher, Chenango county, in July last, and now published by request.

BY REV. A. O. WARREN.

"But man dieth and wasteth away: yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?" Job xiv: 10.

Assembled to pay the last tribute of respect to a fellow mortal, it is becoming in us to entertain right feelings, and motives. No careless thought should be allowed to pass through the mind; no trifling subject should occupy our hearts; no vain feelings of pride and ambition should be allowed to rise; but all that is full of vanity should be forever excluded from the mind, while in the house of mourning. No feelings of revenge, hatred, or ill-will, should be brought here; no bone of contention should be contested for here; but all should be peace, union and sympathy. Our hearts should be occupied, not with the cares of active business and worldly gain, but with higher themes and nobler objects.

We should not place our dependance entirely in time, and on the things of this earth; but should be reminded of the uncertainty and fickleness of them. We should be reminded that we are human, subject to every variety of change, from the greatest prosperity to the very lowest state of want, and last of all, to death itself. This is a change, however unwelcome it may be, which will sooner or later pass upon all men. But not only man must die, but all animate nature must fall before the grim messenger. Of this fact, we should be most strongly reminded, on occasions like the present. Here we have convincing evidence of our feebleness. Here we have an evidence of man's mortality, and of the changeableness of the things of time. But, if we let our thoughts rove for one moment from this solemn scene, and cast our mind's eye upon creation, we see change stamped upon every thing with indelible characters.

Think of the condition that our now happy country was in some three hundred years ago. Then the tall green forest raised its mossy boughs high above the earth for the abode of the feathered tribes, and a shelter for wild beasts. "Then the wild thistle unmolested nodded in the wind," or scattered its seed upon the evening breeze. Then another race of men dwelt on the face of all this land, peacefully, with none to molest, or make afraid.

But how different is the scene now! All these things have vanished away like a dream, and we can scarcely persuade ourselves that it is reality. No trace can now be found here of this race of men, and if we ask where are they, "the chronicler of the grave answers, they have withdrawn," and wasted away before the light of civilization, and soon the last roar of the Pacific's wave will settle over them forever. Where once they reared the wigwam, now waves the luxuriant field of grain. Where once were their peaceful homes, and their sacred burying ground, now stands the field of snowy cotton, and on their fishing grounds stands the populous city, whose streets are thronged with another race of beings, that heed not their memory. These facts show to us in a clear manner, that change is stamped upon all things earthly; that here there is nothing stable and firm. Even one entire race of men have died, and wasted away, "yea, they have given up the ghost" and where are they? Let these facts settle into our hearts, and there let them start conviction, and remind us that we too are mortal, subject to change, and that ere long the last great change will come, and then "the places that know us now, shall know us no more forever."

Yes, this is verily so, and we have many things to remind us of its truth.

The tender grass is a faint, but true representative of man's life here. The tender flower as it fades on its feeble stalk, and its silver leaves fall, speaks with a silent eloquence to man saying, "you too, like me, must die, and waste away."—But who would stay the seasons as they roll, and dwell in perpetual spring? Who would wish to see the face of nature ever wearing a rosy bloom? Ah, no one. It is well that the beauties of spring, and the odors of summer, fade away to give place to the fruit of autumn. Perpetual spring would yield the husbandman but a poor harvest. Complain not, then, that the beauties of spring depart; let the year roll on; let the flowers fade away, and though the change cause sadness, still let us rejoice in the hopes and prospects of an overflowing harvest. How fully does this represent human life! It comes forth, and is cut down; so it is with us. We come into the world and our faculties expand, and grow like the swelling bud, and they burst into loveliness and strength, like the flower, and for a while all is life and activity. But as the flowers bloom but to die, so man, with all his noble and majestic powers, his strength and the glory of his nature, must die and waste away. Yes, the glories of human nature will depart, the flower will wither and fade away to ruin, none can save the flower or man from death.

Of this fact all must have knowledge, for we are not left to infer this from circumstances, or to draw this conclusion from the decaying flower; but we see man, our brethren and sisters, our fathers and mothers, our sons and our daughters, on every hand giving up the ghost, and we follow their remains to the silent mansions of the dead, where they repose unmolested. In fact these very forms of ours, which are now active in busy life, that move so gracefully along at will, contain within them the seeds of destruction to which they must sooner or later fall victims. It is impossible that these frames should slumber in the dust. But this is not all.

When we take up the volume of Inspiration, which our Maker has put in our hands, we find a reason for all this, and also, that it is certain, saying, "Dust thou art and unto dust thou shalt return." Here we learn that man was formed to die, and we feel this truth but too forcibly at the present time. We now know, indeed, that "man dieth and wasteth away; yea, man giveth up the ghost," "and goeth to his long home and the mourners go about the streets."

Hence, being convinced of the truth of this fact, all men look forward with a fearful apprehension, to the approach of that unwished-for period, which shall shut their eyes forever from the things of time. They startle oft at the thoughts of death's approach, as if it were a fearful foe. All sexes and ages draw back from his cold embrace. But why is it? It is because they know not his character. One has said he was the forerunner of the most execrating misery, and "has clothed him with a loathsome shape and sent him on a dreadful errand." Another has said with death man ceases to exist, that death brings cold, blank annihilation.

"These cunningly devised sayings, which have been given for the character of death, have doubtless operated with a power little less than a spell of enchantment on many timid souls, and being so well calculated to coalesce with the fears, and prejudices of the unenfranchised mind, it has helped to weave the worm-wood chaplet, which has crowned death, the king of terrors. And, through constant fear of this great devastation, they have been all their life time subject to bondage, and oh how cruel has that bondage been! The ideas which are naturally, and inevitably associated with the thoughts of death, when we gaze upon the motionless form, the rigid features, the glazed and rayless eye, and the forever sealed lips of some one whom we have fondly loved, with whom we have been wont to hold sweet converse, and whom we were about to commit to the cold tenantry of the narrow house, are of themselves sufficiently painful. And then, when the thought comes of pleasures vanished, of friendship severed, of hearts bleeding, and of hopes blasted by his touch; and when, too, we reflect, as we look upon the marble representative of what was once life and joyous motion, that we too, yea, that all who live are soon to be summoned to join

"The innumerable caravan
That moves to the pale realms of shade, and take Our silent chamber in the halls of death," sadness fills the heart.

"We all know, that the ghastly pageant of the pale monarch, as he thus presents himself, is well calculated to check the heart's pulsation and cause the purple current to run back, blanched, to its source, and the poor afflicted mortal, to sink from the remorseless tyrant, with aversion and dread."

We know that the fear of death, and the love of life, is strongly interwoven with every fibre of our hearts. But it is not enough in the last trying hour, or in the season of mourning, to be convinced that we must die, and that our bodies must be committed to the silent tomb, there to moulder into dust; it is not enough to be told that we must leave all that is now held most dear to our hearts, and sink into forgetfulness and inactivity; it is not enough that we should hear of the agonies of death, or have the dying scene brought up fresh to our minds, or be told that they are forever gone from our reach while on earth, and that they are removed far beyond the reach of pain, unhappiness and death; but there is another thought that rests heavily upon the mind, which, it seems, would greatly relieve our feelings if it could be answered. Nay, let philosophers theorise on the certainty of death, its power and character, if they will; let them describe the horrors and work of death in the most glowing manner, or with language that burns; still it is void of consolation, the needed relief on occasions like the present.

We are all convinced that "man must die and waste away; yea, that he must give up the ghost;" but we mourn their departure and must, till we have the question answered, which is proposed by Job in the text. After saying, "man giveth up the ghost," he asks, and with emphasis, "where is he?" And again in another verse he inquires for the same thing in different language, saying, "if a man die shall he live again?" Let these questions be answered, and death is robbed of his terror, and the grave of its gloom. The mourner's tears cease to flow in a great measure, though we can not but mourn our loss. Yes, let these be answered aright, and we no longer fear to meet the grim messenger; but, if they are answered wrong, it only adds new gloom and dread to his already dreadful character. But how shall we answer these aright, seeing there are so many different ideas about it? One has said, that death could only transplant the greater part of the human family from this world of care and disappointment to another, where never-ending torture awaits them. Another, that death was to be the closing of man's career, both now and forever. They have said that man, with all his noble powers and gifted intellect, must sleep the dreamless sleep of death, and never awake. Now with these opposite sentiments before us, how shall we decide?

Not from men's opinions. We have something more sure than this. It is the word of God, or the Gospel of his Son. But it must be admitted, that if we had no other instruction than the Old Testament, our trust would be small and our hope would not be sure as it now is; though the prophets seemed to catch a glimpse of the glorious future, which they described in glowing language. But, aside from this, little was known or said. It was left for another to bring this truth to light, and cause the sad and desponding hearts to cheer up, for all is well. The wise man, however, seemed to look beyond this vale of tears, and he said, "when the silver cord should be loosed, or the golden bowl broken at the fountain, then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return unto God, who gave it." But this does not seem quite sufficient, and we inquire still "where is he?"

But thanks be to God, he has not left us alone to lament the departure of our kindred, but has sent his only begotten Son into the world, to give us the desired information, and has answered our question satisfactorily. Almighty goodness and wisdom saw, while seated on the throne of mercy, that the life of man was as a shadow; he saw that as the lightnings mark their crooked course among the clouds, and leave no trace, so man wasteth away and leaveth no durable remembrance. He saw too, that over the grave there hung a cloud of impenetrable darkness. No ray of light could be caught from beyond the silent tomb, by man. His vision could not pierce the dark vista that hung over the tomb. Hence he sent his Son to raise the vail from off the grave, and to let the light of his Gospel, light up the dark shadow of the valley of death.

As he went from city to city, he strove to win the minds of the people from the things of this world, as much as was for their benefit, and to place them on higher objects, that would not, like earth's, fade away. He strove to soothe the mourner's anguished bosom, and to dry their tears, even when he was going to the fatal spot that was doomed to close his earthly career. Looking around him then, and seeing some lamenting his sad fate, their minds filled with all the horrors of death and the gloom of the grave, he said to them, "Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me, but weep for yourselves and your children."

Again, standing at the tomb of Lazarus, with his two sisters, who were bathed in tears, he pointed them to a brighter scene, saying, "Thy brother shall rise again;" and again he says; "I am the resurrection and the life." Consolation to all was his aim, and to effect this, he labored. But for this he was despised and persecuted. The Pharisees railed at him because he taught equality in the resurrection, and the Sadducees, who deny the resurrection, questioned him concerning it. They brought up the case of the woman who had seven husbands, and asked with triumph, having silenced the Pharisees with the same, "in the resurrection, whose wife shall she be of the seven, for they all had her?" But how were their mouths stopped when he said, "ye do err, not knowing the Scripture, nor the power of God; for in the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven;" or as St. Luke has it, "neither can they die any more, for they are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection."

Here the darkness begins to fly away, and we behold the morning twilight of eternal life, beyond the grave, beginning to pierce the dark clouds of the shadow of death. We begin to feel assured, that the sleep of death is not an eternal sleep. It causes us to believe, that though our mortal frames decay and moulder into dust, yet the spirit springs away from its clayey tenement, to a brighter world, where it is not subject to pain and death any more, but is as the angels, "a child of God being a child of the resurrection." O then wipe away the falling tear, my friends, for to you these words are spoken. Think not that the beloved husband and Father has ceased to be, but that he lives on in immortal bloom. But this is not the only evidence that we live after death in continued life and happiness. Christ told his disciples, that the third day after his death, he should rise. But when they saw him groan and give up the ghost on the cross, when they saw his body laid in the cold sepulchre and a watch set about; they began to suspect that there was his final end. But lo! a sudden trembling shakes the ground, and it is announced to their gloomy minds, that he is alive and has arisen from the dead. Hope once more cheers their minds, the gloomy spell of doubt and anxiety, that had hung over the grave, was now broken, and they felt assured that because he lived after death, they should live also; for thus he had taught them. They saw the bars of death broken asunder, and the king, himself, led away captive forever by one he had once taken. Yes, their Lord and Master had raised the vail, and brought to light a glorious immortality beyond the grave.

Of the truth of this, we rest satisfied, for it is impossible that there should be a mistake. And if we look at St. Paul's testimony on this same subject, we feel more sure (if it were possible) of its truth. He testifies, that he had seen our Lord after his resurrection, and he labored to prove the resurrection, for on this truth was based all his hope and consolation. Deprive him of this hope, and he is like a mariner on the heaving billows, without a helm or a compass to guide his unway-wise vessel. Most truly did he regard this as the polar star in his gospel firmament; for, says he, "if in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable." But he continues his testimony and chain of consolation, saying, "But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept. For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive."

Taking this for our guide, we believe all will be made partakers of eternal life, for all will be raised from the dead. Here, then, my friends, we have something for our consolation in hours of affliction and mourning. We feel assured that our beloved friends have gone to a better world, where they shall die and waste away no more, but where they shall enjoy the smile of God's countenance, and see his goodness and wisdom made perfect in the redemption of man from the grave, and from every sin and pollution. With these facts before us, let us cease to heave the deep drawn sigh of bitterness, but rather let us forget our present loss and affliction, believing in the sure promise of the Gospel which has brought life and immortality to light beyond the grave. Let us lose sight of time, and the things of time, which vanish and fade away so soon, and place our thoughts on the unseen and immortal world, where all is life and everlasting bloom. Let us think that our friend, for whom we now lament, and who is laid in the winding sheet now before us, is far beyond the reach of pain, and that he is destined to be freed from the grasp of death, and to sing the triumphant song of victory over death and the grave. Let us forget the imperfections of this life, the disappointment, care, anxiety and blasted or disappointed hopes of this world; and let us look forward to that time when all enemies to the peace and happiness of man, and to the spread of Christ's kingdom, shall be conquered to rise no more. Let us look to that time "when he shall have put down all rule, and all authority and power; for he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet; and the last enemy, death, shall be destroyed."

Mourn not, then, that "man dieth and wasteth away," that he shakes off this clayey frame; for we are instructed by Heaven's teachers, that "as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." Oh glorious assurance! how does this truth strengthen the sinking soul, and cause it to revive, even amid desolations. What a balm of consolation art thou to the sorrowing soul! Well might St. Paul say, "But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not even as others which have no hope." No hope—oh withering words! "They come like the winds scattering the flowers and making desolate; their breathings are more sad than the voice of the storm, that has made a grave in the waters for hundreds; they conjure up phantoms, dark as the shadows of a fearful dream, and the heart is made sick. What, to see all the loved depart—to die ourselves without hope; O! who could bear the thought! If over our earth there walks an object of pity, it is that one, who feels not that he has a Father, and that his spirit has an immortality; who looks in the grave, and sees there the end of man, and believes not in a better world beyond; who rejoices not, that when to him, earth's loveliness hath passed away, brighter and more enduring beauty will be unveiled. Our hearts may well bleed for him; for if he has affections bound to dear objects, and worthy of love, there is a cup preparing for him, that will be agony indeed to drink.—No hand of love is seen presenting it, no trust in a Father's wisdom to lessen its bitterness, and no hope to allay the fire of grief in his heart." His must truly be a lamentable situation; but thanks be to God, this is not our situation; for we have a strong hope toward God, in the immortality and final restoration of all men from the grave, and their admittance into the pure fields of heaven, which is "as an anchor to the soul, sure and steadfast."—"For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." Hence, we look beyond this vale of tears, when we are called to follow the remains of a fellow mortal to the tomb; to that time when "the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces," and when "there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain." Oh, friendly hearer, let me direct your mind to that happy time, and let your sad heart be comforted. Let not your eyes weep for bitterness of soul, but be ye comforted; for this pain and affliction endureth but for a day. Let your hearts rest on the fact, that "this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality," and when this is brought to pass, remember, "then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory." Then will you be prepared to sing the triumphant song over death and the grave, saying, "O death, where is thy sting! O grave, where is thy victory?"

STRAY LEAVES.....NO. II.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

MORNING.

Lo, the beautiful handmaiden of Nature, dewy eyed morning, approaches from the east! How cheerily she trips across the brows of the green hills, waking up the violets that lie sleeping upon the grass-swards, and shaking down the apple blossoms like snow, over the smoothly shaven lawns!

The willow waves its yellow tassels, redolent with fragrance to welcome her approach; the rose-tree throws open its pure white buds, to blush into radiant beauty beneath her smiles; and the streams, gushing forth with a glad shout from the bosoms of the hills, toss up their wreaths of mist and spray to garland her brow with rainbows, and sandal her feet with gems.

Far through the dim and scented woodland, rings the loud blast of the huntsman's horn; and the cry of the hound reverberates through the glens scaring from their covert the whirring partridge, and the little rabbits whose ears yet glisten with the dew. Scythe upon his shoulder, forth goes the mower to his early task; and the farmer's boy with a loud halloo sends forth the eager herd to the sweet clover-fields that lie ripening in the sunbeams.

Beautiful, very, is the picture that Morning presents, and manifold are her lessons to the feeling and thoughtful mind. So should we be in the morning of life—glad of heart and active of limb, sending forth beautiful messengers from the world within, to brighten and rejoice the world without.

QUOTATION MARKS, vs. PLAGIARISM.

That plagiarism is an unpardonable sin, the literary world in general, and editors in particular, are perfectly satisfied. You may take an editor's umbrella in a rainy day, upset his arm chair, or even purloin his subscription list, and he will play you the philosopher with all imaginable grace. But publish a sentence of which he has ever read the proof, or send him a word looking like anything he ever saw before, without a goodly array of double commas—and you will find him as testy as a Tartar.

Well, be it so; as we do not often play the scribe, perhaps we ought not to complain. But we would like to ask, if the sin of omission in this matter, is so heinous, what shall be said of that of commission? If a contributor furnishing a good article for publication, without stopping to say that another made it, deserves to have it thrust down his own throat; what does the Editor merit, who kills his correspondent's originals, by hanging around them "signs of quotation?"

Now for a case in point. In preparing a recent obituary, and to gratify a friend who had mistaken me for a poet, I coined four whole lines; and did it, too, all in one short night! I sent them to press, and that "infernal machine" worked them off in quotation marks. See current volume Magazine and Advocate, No. 10, page 75!!!

POETASTER.

There, Br. Grosh, you will please feel yourself pretty effectually used up, and at liberty to use the above any way you please. Always yours,

Z. COOK.

N. B. Done effectually! have only strength and substance enough left of me to say, "Thank you, Br. Z. Cook, for the gentlemanly and scientific skill displayed in reserving the coup de grace for the last blow—as that has allowed me to read the article entire. Had you killed me off before I had read it all, I would not have forgiven you to the end of my life!" A. B. G.

INFORMATION WANTED.

Rev. John Gray, a Presbyterian clergyman of the new school, and belonging to the Albany Presbytery, is now located here. In 1832 he was in Mexico, Oswego county, N. Y.; in 1833 in Camden, Oneida county; in 1834 in Philadelphia; in 1835 in Troy, N. Y.; in 1838 in Utica, Mich.; in 1841 in the western counties of this State, and in 1842 at Cahoes Falls, Albany county.

Can not some friend give us a sketch of his life, character and adventures? I have no doubt that it is rich in materials for such a biography. See the Magazine and Advocate, present volume, No. 10, page 77. E. T. M.

CONFERENCE MEETINGS.

Very large and highly interesting Conference meetings continue to be held in Boston and several places in that vicinity. Brethren and sisters from all the neighborhoods around, meet together, fill the meeting house to overflowing, and pray, and sing, and relate experiences of God's goodness, and exhort to the practice of the precepts of Jesus, and the cultivation of the spiritual affections, from morning until night, and then depart, resolved to meet again the next week in some other place, for the same purpose. Laymen, and even some of our sisters, take an active part in the prayers, experiences and exhortations, and all who can, unite in the singing, of course.

We much admire such meetings, and more especially a weekly praise meeting in each Universalist society where it can be sustained. But to get one up and sustain it, the laymen must take it in hand, and carry it forward. A single preacher, even assisted as he sometimes may be by one or two visiting ministering brethren, can not make such a meeting go off. Like our Washingtonian meetings, to do well, many must speak and sing—tell their experience of the blighting effects of sin, of error, and of bigotry, and the joyous and salutary influences of righteousness, pure devotion, and peace-giving faith in universal salvation—they must unite in pointing out God's ever present goodness and unchanging love, as a motive to holiness; and successively exhort to the imitation of God and the Saviour. If our lay brethren and sisters, in all our societies, would only get up such meetings weekly, and engage in and sustain their services, we should soon cease to hear of difficulties, embarrassments, and apathy—the pleasure of the Lord would prosper among us, and converts be multiplied, and believers become doers as well as hearers of the word. Can not this be done? where is the society that can not find among its members at least half a dozen who will commence and carry on the good work? A. B. G.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Br. BARRY—Yours of the 23d did not reach me in time to answer it—nor could I have complied, as the cars did not go east on Saturday, on account of the drifts. Will the 4th Sunday in April answer?

Br. F.—I thank you very kindly for your letter of the 17th—postmarked 20th. I shall have no controversy on the subject, believing that is not needed, and may be injurious. The excessive zeal will defeat itself, and the mass of the people interested, will, I trust, see that it is best to maintain the unity of the spirit in the bonds of peace, and will judge for themselves according to works rather than empty denunciations and professions. Till then, let us be patient, conciliating, and straightforward in our course of duty.

Br. Hayward's articles were safely and thankfully received, and will appear in due time.

DEATHS.

In Madrid, Feb. 14th, Mr. IRA HAWLEY, aged 76 years. Br. Hawley had long been a believer in that faith which proclaims salvation to every son and daughter of the Adam race—and in his death, Universalism has lost a strong advocate, and society a useful member. May the hopes and consolations of the everlasting Gospel sustain the bereaved partner of the deceased, and comfort all who mourn. His funeral was attended on the 15th, and a discourse delivered by the writer. D. MOTT.

In Sheshequin, Pa., on the 20th of Feb., of pulmonary consumption, Mrs. MARY S. AMES, consort of Rev. G. S. Ames, and youngest daughter of the late Rev. Moses Park, aged 29 years. She died as she had lived, a believer in the final holiness and consequent happiness of all intelligent beings: which doctrine cheered her in health and supported her in the hour of death.

Throughout a tedious illness of several months, she manifested a resignation to the will of her Father in heaven, and seemed to enjoy a living faith in Christ as the Saviour of all.

Her funeral was on the 22d. at which time a numerous and sympathizing congregation assembled to pay their last tribute of respect to the remains of the deceased; and mingle their sympathies with the bereaved friends. Sermon by H. E. WHITNEY.

In Minden, at her father's house, on Dec. 31st, 1842, Mrs. CATHARINE MAXFIELD, aged 77 years. She bore up under a lingering illness with Christian resignation, and went down into the grave in peace, leaving behind a bereaved husband, and three children, and numerous relatives and friends. Funeral on Jan. 3d, last, sermon from 1 Cor. xv: 49, by A. C. BARRY.

ANNA KILTS was born February 9th, 1750, and departed this life December 14th, 1842, aged 92 years, 10 months and 5 days. She was married, on March 18th, 1763, to Peter Snell, who died July 14th, 1804—making her married life 36 years, 5 months and 6 days; and her widowhood, 38 years, 4 months and 20 days. Together they presented to the world, 11 children (8 sons and 3 daughters), 109 grand children (70 sons and 39 daughters), and 294 great grand children; and she lived to hear of the birth of 6 great great grand children—the posterity amounting in all, to 420 persons during her life-time. She lived through three wars in which the country was engaged, and lived a comfortable life, till she was taken with a dropsical affection about 9 weeks previous to her decease, to which she fell a victim, and resigned her spirit to God, who gave it. As one remarkable fact, I would add, that not one of her posterity ever was a justice of the peace, or a merchant, or a pauper, or a bankrupt—COW.

In New Hartford, March 21st, JOSEPH HEWRY, only son of Joseph P. and Hannah Richardson, aged 8 months.

PRESENTIMENTS.

BY MISS CELIA M. TIBBITS.

Have ye e'er felt a weight of sadness steal,
O'er all the spirit like the frost of years,
Chilling its gladness and its gushing mirth
With undefined, yet dark, foreboding fears?
Have ye not felt it when the moaning winds
Have waved the curtains of the stillly night,
When mystic voices o'er the spirit come,
Darkly subduing all its fancied might?
I have known grief of many a varied form,
Have felt my heart wrung with unuttered wo,
But there is sadness, worse though undefined,
Misgiving thoughts that o'er us come and go.
They come we know not why, vague thoughts of ill,
Chilling the spirit in its happiest hour,
Clothing in darkness all its sunlit sky,
Bidding us tremble at their awful power.
'Tis coming evil which before it casts
Its lengthening shadows o'er the joyous soul,
Bathing in darkness all its rainbow hopes,
Bowling us down by its unseen control.

REFLECTIONS ON MATTHEW XI: 2-6.

BY REV. E. R. CROCKER.

"Now when John had heard in the prison the works of Christ, he sent two of his disciples, and said unto him, Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another? Jesus answered and said unto them, Go and shew John again those things which ye do hear and see: the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the gospel preached unto them. And blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me."

The reader will first please notice the wisdom of "John the Dipper." He will thus see at once that he was not the man to be imposed upon by impostors. He was sent to prepare the way of the coming of our Lord. He was sent as a herald to announce his advent. And never was man more careful not to be imposed upon, or not to impose upon his fellows.

Some are troubled to account for the design of John's baptism. Many suppose his baptism is now binding—that he baptized Jesus as an example to his followers, that they should follow in his steps. And notwithstanding John himself explained the difference between his own baptism, and that of Christ, declaring that he, himself, baptized with water unto repentance, (or until the time of reformation as I understand it,) but that Jesus should baptize with the Holy Ghost and fire, (which is often used to purify metals, and, therefore, furnishing a good figure;) yet many even now-a-days attempt to maintain that John's baptism is yet binding upon all who make a profession of Christianity. I would refer the reader to John's Gospel (i: 31,) to find an explanation of the design of John's baptism. "And I (says John) knew him not: (viz., Christ); but that he (Christ) should be made manifest (revealed) to Israel, THEREFORE am I come baptizing with water." Now read the next verse, and you will see how baptism in water made him "manifest," or revealed him. "And John bare record, saying, I saw the Spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon him." Now read the next verse: "And I knew him not; but he that sent to me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending and remaining on him, the same is he which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost." And now the next verse. "And I saw and bear record, that this is the Son of God."

It is certainly strange to me how men can read this testimony and not understand the object of John's baptism in water. Certainly its design must have been to prove by it, who was the true Christ. Who does not at once see the divine Wisdom in this plan? The evidence by which to prove the true Messiah was so contrived, that there could be no deception practiced. All creation might have presented themselves to test their Messiahship (if I may use such a word) but, yet, no person except Messiah himself could exhibit the signs necessary to constitute him the Christ. In fact, how many did present themselves for baptism; and I have no doubt in my own mind, that many who did thus offer themselves, ran away with the idea that they might be the Christ. John was ready to baptize all that came for that purpose, for he knew he could not himself be deceived, and as the consequence announce the wrong person as the Saviour of the world. He knew the holy Ghost would descend in the shape of a dove (what a touching figure of the holy Spirit is a dove!) and that was the sign by which to know the true Messiah. Ah! reader, doubt not that the Son of God hath already come, died and risen for you! For John could not have been deceived when he proclaimed Jesus as the Christ. He had an infallible test.

But again, John seemed to have been one of the naturally unbelieving kind,—like Thomas, who would not believe his Master had risen, until he had thrust his hand into his side, and beheld the nail prints upon his hands and feet. His wonder, or marvelousness must have been small; he was, therefore, "slow to believe." And in this again, we behold the "wisdom and prudence" of the God. For if the record had intimated that the witnesses of Jesus were easy of belief, and, therefore, were liable to arrive at conclusions prematurely, were too credulous, too ready to believe and thus liable to be imposed upon themselves, then of course there would have been reason to doubt the validity of such witnesses, and, hence, to doubt whether Jesus was the true Messiah.

It may be, however, that John was convinced himself at the first, i. e. as soon as he baptized Jesus, and thus witnessed the Holy Spirit descend upon him; but, that for others' sakes he sent his disciples to inquire of Jesus whether he was the promised Messiah, or not. In either case we see marks of consummate wisdom in the Divine plan, as thus exemplified in God's providence. The design seems to have been to make assurance doubly sure.

But listen to the answer of Jesus to John's disciples. "Go and shew John again those things which ye do hear and see." Jesus knew John's disciples had eyes and ears no more liable to be imposed upon and deceived, than other people—the learned, the rich, the wise, for instance. So, "Go and tell your Master, John, what you see and hear"—the best kind of evidence; for if we may deny the evidence of our senses, then may we deny our own existence—then deny our denials, and we stand where we started from, ready to race around again in this ring of nonsense! "Go and show John again those things which ye do hear and see. The blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the Gospel preached to them." Impositors are correctly looked upon as bad men; and they always have as the secret motive of their impositions, some sinister, or wicked and selfish purpose in view. They impose upon the credulous for the purpose of benefit to themselves and at the expense of their credulity. But, my God! what sinister or wicked purpose did the dear Saviour have in view, in giving sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, and life to the dead? O! ye scoffing infidels, tell me! Point to one immoral act in his whole life, if ye can! Ah! many good things did he do, and for which do you accuse him? O! infidelity, you are stark mad! And your eyes of reason are owl's eyes. The more clearly the sun of truth shines, the more perfectly blind you are. Go to your own place. Go into the dark night of error and tremble at every shadow of truth; and stay there till you will cease hooting your dismal tones of unbelief and sin in the ears of those who would see, but for your own evil deeds!

Jesus raised the dead; he gave sight to the blind, and hearing to the deaf. And he, nor any other person could do this, except God were with him.—And if Jesus were an imposter, God would never have, in spirit, been with him. He never lends his wisdom and power to imposters, by which to impose upon his own dear children. No, thank his holy name, he does not! Jesus was sent from God to reveal his character to us; to reveal our duties to one another, to bring to light, life and immortality beyond the grave. And if these things be so, (and who can with the shadow of reason deny it?) O! how solemn the thought! And yet how comforting! And how foolish are we, if we heed not his kindly voice. He speaks in accents of love and tender mercy. He calls upon us to love God and our neighbor; yea, and our enemies. He calls upon us to trust in God and his providence in which all live. He calls upon us to be reconciled now and ever. And O! let us obey.

FEMALE INFLUENCE.

BY REV. N. C. HODGDON.

"What can the fondest mother wish for more,
Even for her darling son, than solid sense,
Perceptions clear, and flowing eloquence."
With true virtue going on before?

Every careful observer of the times and seasons, must acknowledge, that female influence is greater at the present day, and more excellent, than it ever was before in any age or clime. Since Christianity and science have shed down their bright and halcyon beams upon the mind, and raised woman to her proper sphere of knowledge, she has exerted a better and more powerful influence than she ever did before.

Yes, and when woman becomes as intelligent as she may be, and should be—when her gentle and affectionate mind and spirit are adorned with useful as well as ornamental knowledge, and her thoughts are placed on nobler objects—more worthy of her attention and care—her influence then will be deeply and broadly felt. Guided by that religion which raised her from ignorance and slavery, she is leading and moving the world on to a brighter and happier day.

We are not aware of the extent and benefit of this influence, because we are always cheered by its light in this Christian land. We are also insensible of the blessings of the sun which daily gives us light and heat, and it is on this very account, we have always thoughtlessly received its favors. And how true it is that we think less about those favors daily bestowed upon us, than we do those seldom conferred by our friends. But let the sun be blotted out of existence, and how soon we should feel the loss, and how sensibly realize the blessings departed! Let woman, too, be stricken out of existence, and how dark, unsocial and joyless life would become. The moving spirit of all improvements and enterprises would be less, if any at all. Give to the whole race of men an immortality—and how much joy would there be for us—poor, lonesome lords of creation, as we suppose ourselves to be—if we had not the smiles of woman to cheer, or her affection to bless.

This may show us how much woman is capable of adding to human felicity—and how much she does add. It also shows how much influence she holds in the society where she walks, and administers—and where she is treated as a friend and a companion, and considered as man's equal.

A Christian character can be formed no where else, among women or men, but in a civilized country, which is blessed with the light of the gospel. Where, but in the land of light and knowledge, is woman permitted to go alone, and allowed her freedom? Woman in this land has her liberty, and such liberty gives her much—yea, great influence. It is here that the light of the moon becomes as the light of the sun, and sheds forth all her beauty and splendor, and we rejoice that it is so, and that woman is honored, beloved and respected. In heathen lands, it is not thus. From infancy to old age—from the cradle to the tomb—from the fireside to the halls of legislation, the moulding, forming, and reforming, elevating and holy influence of woman is felt.

The mother who smiles on the image of her tenderness, when on her breast, speaks to it words that never can be forgotten. She who teaches her bright-eyed boy to lift his infant hymn and prayer to God—who breathes into his awakened mind in pleasing tales, the beauties of truth, and a love for all that's pure, exalted and fair—the sister who softens, refines and chastens with her gentle affections the wild, wayward passions of her youthful brother—the lovely and accomplished maiden who wins and attaches the young man to virtue, temperance and pure religion, does a great deal for our country's good—and these things are doing more for the elevation and happiness of the world—they are exciting a more powerful, controlling—a more salutary influence, than they whose voices (I might say voices seen) are yearly heard to thunder in the Capitol at Washington, and shake the Halls of legislation. O yes, these formers of the tender mind are doing more in shaping the future destiny of our country's glory, peace and prosperity, than sage law makers, law expounders, or law ex-ecutors.

Washington's mother was a Christian, and she used her influence in forming his young and tender mind—and what was the consequence? Mother's, go on—sisters, go on—maidens, go on and do your duty, and future years will bring peace and joy, and the crown of glory shall fall upon your heads, and free them from all trouble.

"Honor and shame from no condition rise, Act well your part, there all the honor lies."

STUDY OF THE NATURAL SCIENCES.

No study is so vital in importance to the well being of mankind, as that of the natural sciences, commonly so called—yet, perhaps, no branch of literature, is less generally studied. Unfortunately is no unusual thing in this our enlightened age, daily to meet with persons, holding respectable stations in society, and even professional men, who are grossly ignorant of the first principles of the natural sciences.

I am fully aware that an announcement of this nature, may appear to some paradoxical; but notwithstanding, it is the no less true, and thousands there are, that will attest to the truth of this assertion. As a presumptive proof of this statement, I call attention to the circumstance, of the rare cases that we meet with persons in our travels (though communicative upon other points) that will engage in conversation upon the all important subject of science; owing undoubtedly to the fact, that they are ignorant upon this topic, and hence, having more prudence than knowledge, they are tacit for fear of exposing their deficiency. It is high time that public attention should become enlisted in the proper promotion of American literature—that books upon the natural sciences, and especially upon the rudiments of natural philosophy, should be introduced into our common schools, to be studied as common text books—that a more general interest should be excited upon this subject—that scientific periodicals should be more liberally patronized, and that the spirit of novel reading, which is poisoning to an alarming extent, our infant literature, should be discouraged.

It is no little to the discredit of proud, boasted America, whose name is associated with every thing else that is great and noble, that she should thus stigmatize herself, by withholding her support from scientific journals, and other means for the dissemination of scientific knowledge. There are at present in the United States, very few scientific periodicals, of a respectable standing, and these like all those that have preceded them, are imminently in danger of ceasing to exist, from the unfortunate fact, that their editors are reduced to extreme penury, because of their want of pecuniary support; whilst other periodicals, publishing fictitious tales and other balderdash of a similar nature, are as numerous as the leaves on the trees of the forest, and are blighting the brightest prospects of our noblest youth with their baneful influence.

As an evidence of the true literary spirit existing in the United States, I refer the reader to the reception, and subsequent treatment, of the three English literati, who recently visited our country. The one a novelist, and the other two scientific gentlemen. I allude to Dickens, Lardner, and Lyell. The former, for composing in a ridiculous style, a few nonsensical stories, only fit for a gossip to read, was received on our shores amid the enthusiastic praise, and acclamation of thousands (who disgraced themselves and nation)—he was invited to the palaces of the rich, and aristocratic, to partake of extravagant dinners—the fair, and fashionable flocked around, vying with each other, to see who should first do homage, or strew garlands in the way of their vain guest—our public prints, teemed with long, and repeated encomiums, extolling him to heaven; and in short, he was eulogized and pampered to such a degree, that the more sensible part of community turned from the folly with disgust, and blushed deeply for their country's dignity. But how different was the reception and treatment of the two latter gentlemen, whose writings, and particularly their lectures, have effected a permanent and salutary influence upon our literature, that will be felt to the remotest ages. Were they received amid pomp and splendor? Did the skies resound with the acclamations of an enthusiastic multitude? Were they invited to costly dinners? Or were they eulogized in our public prints? No! far otherwise; for they were scarcely treated with that respect, so richly due to their exalted dignity, and especially the former gentleman, I am sorry to say, has been grossly injured, and shamefully slighted.*

If a scientific work is composed, its announcement is received by the public with a perfect indifference—a few copies are published, and a much less number purchased, and those that are purchased, are often never read, but cast into one corner of the library, as a nuisance. But on the other hand, let it be announced that a novel, or some fictitious pamphlet is to be published, and immediately the public curiosity is excited—it is eagerly inquired when the work will come from the press—how can it most speedily be obtained—thousands rush to the printing office—force the unbound leaves from the hands of the printer, and devour their contents with a ravenous avidity. And thus it is, that novel reading, that voluptuous consumer of time, is fostered to the great prejudice of the study of the sciences. Why, I inquire, has our noble country come to this? Upon whom, or what does the responsibility fall? Common observation answers, upon the press, that mighty engine of virtue or evil—the efficient revolutionizer of public sentiment, and the despotic controller of nations. Just as the press is bent, the mind is inclined. Hitherto, it has been the common practice among printers, to pass by with absolute indifference, nearly all literary productions of real worth, and merit; whilst, on the contrary, they have been extravagantly lavish, with their encomiums upon pieces of a trifling and fictitious nature. Consequently our youth, being naturally emulous of praise, and seeing where it might be obtained, have bent their talents and energies in that channel most likely to secure it, till novel writing and novel reading has become as popular in America, in the nineteenth century, as poetical composition was in Greece in the time of Homer. Why then (if extravagant novel reading is an evil) will not the press, (in whose hands is the destiny of our nation) enlist her services in the noble cause of the dissemination of the sciences? Why will she permit American literature, to be a dishonor to our nation, and unworthy of the dignity of the name that she falsely wears? Let her, then, if she wishes to serve the true interests of her patrons, lead the people to a just appreciation of the all important advantages * NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—I regret that Juvenis has been so unfortunate as to select Dr. Lardner's name for an illustration, when others more worthy could have been named. Whatever may be Dr. Lardner's merits as a philosopher, it is well known that his moral character is very bad. His elopement, and living with the wife of another man (Mrs. Heavyside) is enough to account for his exclusion from any decent family.

In conclusion, let her apprise them, in the language of the celebrated Dr. Combe, that "before religion can appear in all its might and glory, it must become philosophical—its foundation must be laid in the system of creation, and that its authority must be deduced from the principles of that system, and that its operations must be enforced by a demonstration of the power of Providence operating in enforcing the execution of its dictates."

POPULAR ADMISSIONS....NO. V.

FORGIVENESS.

I can not, if I would, avoid noticing the company which the popular doctrine of forgiveness is made to associate with. If there be any propriety in extending the proverb so that it may read, "a doctrine is known by the company it keeps," total depravity has truly taken up its abode under the auspices of Partialism. I believe that the most devoted adherent of the doctrine which teaches the conflicting destiny of mankind, will not approve of two neighbors, each engaged in undoing what the other properly does. When politicians and office seekers devote their whole time to undoing previous legislation, merely from party feeling, we are apt to think that they deserve the censure of an enlightened community. Yet that community cherishes and defends a theology, the several parts of which are naturally and necessarily antagonistical in their legitimate offices.

For instance. The doctrine has already been alluded to which inculcates that the sinner justly deserves the punishment of endless damnation. This view of justice is a main pillar to the system which men are trying to dignify with the cover-all title of Orthodoxy. But, as if utterly regardless of consistency, the same system contends that the office of forgiveness is to interpose, and rescue man from the inflictions of justice. How, then, is it possible for two attributes more directly to contradict the spirit and intent of each other? The sinner deserves a punishment, and justice is intent on inflicting that punishment. But forgiveness consists in delivering man—not simply from a state of guilt—but from the punishment which he deserves, and which justice demands. Here justice demands the endless woe of man, and forgiveness demands his deliverance from merited woe. If Ezekiel's two sticks had been half as dissimilar, the effort to make them one would have been hopeless.

But the Partialist doctrine proceeds to prescribe where justice shall take effect, and where forgiveness shall interfere, and thus to divide the spoils. Let us carry out this arrangement in temporal matters, precisely as it is carried out in theology. The Emperor of China has a law against all insubordination, by which justice demands that all who transgress shall be out-lawed, and banished his dominions. But he is disposed to be forgiving, and as all his subjects have been disobedient, he offers to substitute his son, and issues an edict that all who accept of the substitute in a particular manner, shall be pardoned. Well; one of his subjects rebels for thirty years, and then accepts the substitute. The emperor feels very indignant at his past sins, but pleads that his character for mercy must be vindicated, and so he pardons him. By and by another of his subjects begins to be weighed down with infirmity and age, after having spent a whole life in obedience. But unfortunately the very last act of his life, which can do harm, has been one of disobedience. He is now disabled, and dependent wholly upon his country, and fast hastening to the grave, but he accepts of no substitute. He is willing to suffer all he deserves, but unwilling that another should suffer for him. Mercy now points to his condition, and pleads for his pardon. No, says the emperor; justice demands his outlawry. Mercy refers to the previous case, wherein justice was silenced by the interposition of a pardon. Yes, replies the emperor, I was pleased, in that case, to vindicate my forgiving disposition; but my justice must be vindicated also. And he orders the helpless dying man, body and soul, to be anathematized and banished from the celestial empire. If such a system of antagonism, between the natural officers of justice and forgiveness, would look ridiculous in the government of China, how does it look in the theology of the nineteenth century?

I have one more point to look at. Universalism gives no hope of escaping the actual demerits of sin. It has no forgiveness of merited punishment. Hence its opposers charge it with cruelty. Well, Partialism says that God's justice demands the endless woe of the sinner. What a merciful doctrine this is, especially when we consider that it is of no conceivable use to God, the saints, nor the damned! But you effectually deny the doctrine of forgiveness, says the opposer. Not so.—We believe in the forgiveness of sin. But let us look at the popular doctrine. Its justice demands the endless punishment of the offender. Its forgiveness rescues him from the penalty. But still God's justice was so inflexible that he was determined not to forgive unless his vengeance could find a victim somewhere. So He wreaks the ire of his justice upon an innocent person, and then saves the guilty from the punishment which they deserve. And this men call forgiveness!—What an array of incongruities! And with how much modest grace does such a system charge others with cruelty, and a denial of the true doctrine of forgiveness! The truth would blush to be found in such company.

EXPLANATION OF THE 4TH CHAPTER OF MALACHI.

"For, behold, the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of Hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch. But unto you that fear my name, shall the Sun of Righteousness arise with healing in his wings; and ye shall go forth and grow up as calves of the stall. And ye shall tread down the wicked; for they shall be ashes under the soles of your feet, in the day that I shall do this, saith the Lord of Hosts. Remember ye the law of Moses my servant, which I commanded unto him in Horeb for all Israel, with the statutes and judgments. Behold I will send you Elijah the prophet, before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord. And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse."

My object in this article, is, to trace out the exact meaning of the prophetic passage which has been quoted—to ascertain the event to which it applies, and to clear it of those incorrect notions which it has been adduced to prove. The day here spoken of, is, by many, supposed to refer to a time of general judgment in the world of immortality—the oven and the burning up of the wicked, is supposed to signify the endless misery of the wicked. But yet it is a fact, notwithstanding this common view of the passage, that the commentators, Dr. A. Clarke, Scott, Henry, the Editor of the Cottage Bible, and others, instead of applying it to scenes in the future world, explain it as referring to events which transpired during the ministry of Christ, and during the forty years which succeeded his resurrection. We hence perceive, that such men, when calmly examining our subject, have been compelled to dissent from their brethren of the same faith; and to state what facts fully prove, viz., that the entire passage refers to occurrences attendant upon the setting up of the Gospel kingdom nearly eighteen hundred years since, and does not refer to scenes which involve millions in ceaseless anguish, to be inflicted on them at the end of that kingdom. These positions will stand out in bold relief as we progress with our explanation.

In order to arrive at a clear knowledge of the instruction communicated by the prophet, we must turn back to the third chapter, which opens thus:—"Behold, I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me; and the Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple, even the messenger whom ye delight in; behold, he shall come, saith the Lord of hosts." v. 1. That the messenger to prepare the way, was John the Baptist—that "the messenger of the covenant" who was to come suddenly to his temple, was our Saviour who came in a manner unexpected to the Jews—hardly seems to admit of a doubt. Dr. A. Clarke, in his comment on this verse, states this view as one which admits of no question. But our Saviour, to settle all discussion on the point, when speaking of John the Baptist, said:—"For this is he of whom it is written, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee." Matt. xi: 10. Now, as John the Baptist did prepare the way of the Lord, by teaching the people to expect the immediate manifestation of the Messiah, and as Christ did come unexpectedly to the Jews, so it is evident, that instead of looking forward to the end of time for the fulfilment of this passage, we must look back to the period which transpired between the entering of our Saviour on his ministry, and the destruction of the Jews as a nation. Can there be any doubt on this point? If we may rely on our Saviour's words, all doubt not only ceases, but we have a key furnished us which unlocks the entire subject.

What was to take place at the time thus spoken of? The last verse in the chapter informs us:—"And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels; and I will spare them, as a man spareth his own son that serveth him. Then shall ye return, and discern between the righteous and the wicked; between him that serveth God, and him that serveth him not," verses 17, 18. At the period of the sudden coming of the Messiah, there was to be such a separation between the wicked and the good, as that they could readily be distinguished one from the other. This same event is spoken of by our Saviour, in the 25th chapter of Matthew, where he represents himself at his coming, as separating people as a shepherd divides his sheep from the goats—those on the left hand, were those who did not serve God; those on the right hand, were those who did serve him. The Revelator refers to the same fact, when he said:—"He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still." Rev. xii: 11. And to show that the time of this distinction was then nigh at hand, he said:—"And behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." He which testifieth these things, saith, Surely I come quickly." verses 12, 20. Now these statements are so like that of the prophet, viz., that "the messenger of the covenant" should come suddenly to his temple, that it is evident the prophet and revelator refer to the same event and to the same period of time. And if we add the language of our Saviour to that already quoted, every shade of doubt must disappear:—"For the Son of Man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels, and then he shall reward every man according to his works. Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom." Mat. xvi: 27, 28. How clear it is, that at the coming of Christ to destroy the Jewish covenant, and people, and cities, there was a separation between the righteous and the wicked—that our Saviour then rewarded every man according to his works, by punishing those who did not serve God, and rewarding those who did serve him.

This separation, and punishment and reward, the prophet distinctly illustrates in this 4th chapter. He says:

"For, behold, the day cometh that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch." This is truly terrific language—and if people are not careful, they will be apt to assume the position, that it refers to ceaseless woe—assume it, not from its connection, which points out its true application, but from the terror which the language is calculated to inspire in certain minds. Observe two facts in regard to it. 1. It declares that the fire shall burn up the wicked, so that it shall leave them neither root nor branch. But according to common notions, this fire, which is supposed to be endless, does not burn up the wicked at all, but leaves them "root and branch" to all eternity, only in agony. Surely this can not be its interpretation. 2. By studying the books of the prophets, it will distinctly be seen, that "fire," and "furnace," and "oven," are used to set forth the temporal judgments which fell on the wicked. The following passage is to the point:—"Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Because ye are all become dross, behold, therefore, I will gather you into the midst of Jerusalem. As they gather silver, and brass, and iron, and lead, and tin, into the midst of the furnace, to blow the fire upon it, to melt it; so will I gather you in mine anger and in my fury, and I will leave you there, and melt you." Eze. xxii: 19, 20. This language is as terrific as that used in the text; and yet we perceive that it is expressly said, that this furnace and melting were to be in Jerusalem. And as Malachi expressly shows, that the time he spoke of, was the coming of the Messiah, in the first century of the Christian kingdom, so it is evident that by the burning of the oven, he sets forth the punishment which was to come on the wicked Jews for not serving God. This view will stand out more clearly as we proceed.

After having shown the punishment of those who did not serve God, by the figure of burning in an oven, the prophet said:—"But unto you that fear my name, shall the Sun of Righteousness arise, with healing in his wings; and ye shall go forth, and grow up as calves for the stall," vs. 2. But in what manner were they to fear the Lord? We find the answer in the 4th verse:—"Remember ye the law of Moses my servant, which I commanded unto him in Horeb for all Israel, with the statutes and judgments." The Jews were to fear the Lord, by carefully observing the law of Moses—if they did this, they would not only be virtuous, but they would see that the Messiah was promised—and when he came, they would be in the right frame of mind to receive him as a spiritual Prince, and not fall into the error which was then common, that his reign was to be temporal. At the period our Saviour appeared among the Jews, many of them undoubtedly thus feared the Lord. One such is spoken of by an Evangelist. After the death of Christ, it is said:—"Joseph of Arimathea, an honorable counsellor, who also waited for (or, expected,) the kingdom of God, came, and went in boldly unto Pilate, and craved the body of Jesus." Mark xv: 43. He was in the right situation to believe in Christ—because, as he feared God in the obedience of the law, he was ready to appreciate the evidence which our Saviour presented to prove that he was the promised Messiah, so long foretold by the prophets.

To all such, the Sun of Righteousness was to rise with healing in his wings. This "Sun of Righteousness" undoubtedly refers to the Saviour. When did he rise as righteousness? When he entered on his ministry, and began to preach the good tidings of the Gospel kingdom. Here again the period of the events which the prophet was describing, is accurately designated. That period embraced the time which intervened between the commencement of our Lord's ministry and the destruction of the Jewish people.

There is a beautiful allusion in the sentence, "the Sun of Righteousness" shall "arise with healing in his wings," which we must understand, in order to have the subject thoroughly before us. The following fact will effect that object. "The late Mr. Robinson, of Cambridge, (England,) called upon a friend just as he had received a letter from his son, who was surgeon on board a vessel then lying off Smyrna. The son mentioned to his father, that every morning about sunrise, a fresh gale of air blew from the sea across the land, and from its wholesomeness and utility in clearing the infected air, is always called the Doctor. 'Now,' says Mr. Robinson, 'it strikes me that the prophet Malachi, who lived in that quarter of the world, might allude to this circumstance, when he says, the Sun of Righteousness shall arise with healing in his wings. The Psalmist mentions the wings of the wind, and it appears to me that this salubrious breeze, which attends the rising of the sun, may be properly enough considered the wings of the sun, which contain such healing influences, rather than the beams of the sun, as the passage has been commonly understood.' Bush's Scripture Illustrations. The allusion in the figure, is evident. As this salubrious wind, which commenced blowing with the rising of the sun, and is hence called the wings of the sun, swept all impurity from the atmosphere, so to those who feared God by obedience to the law of Moses, Christ would arise with healing in his wings, to heal them of all doubt, darkness, and error—to show them the light of immortality and reconciliation—to lead them to the new covenant to be written in the soul, whose dwelling is the mind, and which purifies the entire conduct. When the darkness of idolatry and sin brooded over the Gentile world—when blindness of mind characterized a large portion of the Jews—then the Saviour, the Sun of Christianity arose, and by the healing influences of his doctrine, saved his people from the sickness of sin, of erroneous views, and of fear of death. And those who waited for his rising, and were in the right condition to receive him, entered into the Gospel kingdom with great joy and gladness. It was true of these, as Paul said to the Colossians:—"Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son." i: 13. This was the result of the influence of the healing wings of the Sun of Righteousness.

We come now to the last two verses of the chapter. "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord; and he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse." Elijah the prophet was to precede the coming of the "great and dreadful day of the Lord." Now, if we can ascertain who Elijah the prophet was, and the time when he came, we shall also ascertain the time of the "great and dreadful day of the Lord." Dr. Clarke says, that Elijah the prophet "is meant alone of John the Baptist." Note on Mal. iv: 5. To this, agree those commentators whose names were mentioned at the beginning of this article. But we will not rely on commentators—we will quote more distinguished authority, from which there is no appeal and about which there can be no doubt—it shall be that of the Saviour himself.

On a certain occasion, "his disciples asked him, saying, Why then say the Scribes that Elias" (or Elijah) "must first come? And Jesus answered and said unto them, Elias truly shall first come, and restore all things. But I say unto you, that Elias is come already, and they knew him not, but have done unto him whatsoever they listed. Likewise shall also the Son of man suffer of them." Matt. xvii: 10, 11, 12. The person whom he designated as Elijah, who, he declared, had already come, is pointed out in the next verse:—"Then the disciples understood that he spake unto them of John the Baptist." v. 13. But why was John the Baptist called Elijah the prophet? The angel who was sent to Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, said of him:—"And he shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elias," (Elijah), "to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just; to make ready a people prepared for the Lord." Luke i: 17. There was such a resemblance between the two prophets, in point of spirit and energy, that John the Baptist is prophesied of as Elijah the prophet. And as our Saviour most expressly declares that Malachi, by the sentence, "Elijah the prophet," refers to John the Baptist, there can be no mistake as to the individual intended. John the Baptist entered into his ministry, just previous to the time when our Saviour commenced preaching the glad tidings of the kingdom. And by declaring that the kingdom of heaven was then at hand, and by exhorting people to repentance, he so turned the hearts of fathers and children together in unity of feeling, that a people was prepared to receive the Lord when he should arise in all the glorious light of divine truth.

Now, as John the Baptist was to precede the coming of the "great and dreadful day of the Lord," it is evident that this day signifies the terrible judgments which were to come upon the people, immediately succeeding the ministry of John who preached in the power and spirit of Elijah. Speaking of this same day, Paul said to the Romans:—"The night is far spent, the day is at hand." Rom. xiii: 12. So Peter remarked:—"But the end of all things is at hand." 1 Peter iv: 7. This same apostle, when speaking on the day of Pentecost, quoting from the prophet Joel, and applying his language to his own time, said, "the sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and notable day of the Lord come." Acts ii: 20. How clear it is, that this day, was, in the time of the apostles, near at hand—was then approaching. But why, it may be inquired, was it termed the "great and terrible day of the Lord"? Because our Saviour says of it:—"For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not from the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be." Matt. xxiv: 21. And to show that this tribulation was then approaching, he says, farther on in the chapter, "Verily, I say unto you, this generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled." v. 34.

This "great and terrible day of the Lord" refers to the period when the Mosaic covenant with all its institutions, were to be swept away—and when the dreadful judgment was to fall on the Jews, by which under the scourge of the Roman armies, they, as a nation, were to be destroyed root and branch. This destruction, the prophet Malachi represents as a fiery oven, in which these wicked people were to be burnt up—and he calls it the "day of the Lord," because it was God who brought this punishment on them for their rejection and crucifixion of his Son. Hence, Jesus said: "But when the king heard thereof, he was wroth; and he sent forth his armies, and destroyed those murderers, and burned up their city." Matt. xxii: 7.

When this took place, the prophet affirmed, that there should be a discovery of who were righteous and who wicked—who served God and who served him not.—This was effected, by the punishment of all the wicked and the deliverance of all the righteous from the evils of the times. When our Saviour was speaking of these events, he said:—"But he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved." Matt. xxiv: 13. And again:—"And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved; but for the elect's sake, those days shall be shortened." verse 22. There was a special provision for the "elect," the believers, those who served God and received his Son. Enduring cheerfully all tribulations while adhering to the cause of their Lord, when the end of the Jewish age arrived, they were to be saved from the dreadful evils which accompanied it. That they were all saved, is obvious from the following passage, quoted out of Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History:—"The whole body, however, of the church at Jerusalem, having been commanded by a divine revelation, given to men of approved piety there before the war, removed from the city and dwelt at a certain town beyond the Jordan, called Pella. Here, those that believed in Christ, having removed from Jerusalem, as if holy men had entirely abandoned the royal city, and the whole land of Judea; the divine justice for their crimes against God and his apostles finally overtook them, totally destroying the whole generation of these evil-doers from the earth." p. 86. Of this overwhelming judgment, our Saviour said to his disciples: "But when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh. Then let them which are in Judea, flee to the mountains; and let them which are in the midst of it, depart out; and let not them that are in the countries, enter thereinto. For these be the days of vengeance, that all things which are written, may be fulfilled." Luke xxi: 20, 21, 22.—Now, one of the things written in reference to these events, is the last chapter of Malachi—which was fulfilled in the judgment of which our Saviour spake.—Here, too, in the language of the Saviour, the disciples received their warning to flee from among the doomed people, when the coming of the armies showed that destruction was at hand. Accordingly, they fled, and were all saved—while the wicked people found that God "will by no means clear the guilty." And thus, the wicked and righteous were as certainly separated, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats. And thus was fulfilled the language of the prophet:—"Then shall ye return, and discern between the righteous and the wicked; between him that serveth God, and him that serveth him not." Mal. iii: 18.

With the subject thus clearly before us, can there be a question as to the meaning of the last chapter of Malachi? He speaks of the punishment of the wicked under the figure of burning them up root and branch in a fiery oven—that day, he affirms, should be preceded by the coming of Elijah the prophet—and Elijah the prophet, in this case, refers to John the Baptist, as our Saviour expressly declares. That all these facts prove that the great day of the Lord did come to pass at the end of the Jewish covenant and the destruction of the Jewish people, is to me most evident, and beyond contradiction, clear. Hence, it follows, that this chapter, instead of referring to the end of the mediatorial reign of Christ, as many people refer it, belongs expressly to the beginning of the Gospel. So it is with many other passages, which people adduce as proof of terrible scenes in another world—if they would examine them more carefully, they could not well avoid the discovery, that their application belongs to events which transpired between the time when Christ entered into his ministry, and the year seventy, when the great tribulation was experienced by the Jews. This is the great mistake in regard to the day of judgment. People fix their eyes upon a period at the end of the reign of Christ, when the day of judgment is to begin. But instead of looking forward, if they will look back by the light of the Scriptures, they will find that the day of judgment commenced eighteen hundred years ago, when our Saviour established the reign of Christianity by his resurrection from the dead. Hence he said:—"NOW is the judgment of this world." John xii: 31. This judgment is going on, rewarding us for our good deeds and punishing us for our bad deeds; and will continue, until the reign of the Messiah shall cease—then there will remain no necessity for judgment. And in describing the end of that reign, it is not mingled up with fiery ovens and furnaces and terrible days, which belong to scenes long preceding the conclusion of the kingdom of heaven—but it is described in this way:—"Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule, and all authority and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy shall be destroyed, death. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith, 'all things are put under him,' it is manifest that He is excepted, which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto Him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all." 1 Cor. xv: 24-28. G. W. M.

HOPE.

BY SCHILLER.

We speak with the lip, and we dream in the soul,
Of some better and fairer day;
And our days, the meanwhile, to that golden goal
Are gliding and sliding away.
Now the world becomes old, now again it is young,
But "the better" 's forever the word on the tongue.
At the threshold of life Hope leads us in—
Hope plays round the mirthful boy;
Though the best of its charms may with youth begin,
Yet for age it reserves its toy,
When we sink at the grave, Man planteth—Hope!
And it is not a dream of a fancy proud,
With a fool for its dull begetter;
There's a voice at the heart that proclaims aloud,
"Ye were born to possess the Better!"
And that voice of the Heart, O ye may believe,
Will never the hope of the soul deceive!

READ THIS, BOY!

"This is the effect of shoe-making," said a young mechanic to us yesterday, shaking a well filled purse in our face. It was not said boastfully, but with an honest pride. We wish to refer our readers to a few particulars in the history of this young man. He is the fourth son of an industrious mechanic, who has known the heights of affluence and the depths of poverty. His eldest son is reared for the ministry, and is, we believe, a talented and useful member of society. The second was a mechanic, a hard working fellow. The third has acquired an excellent education after much labor and hard work, through his own means. The youngest son, him to whom we introduce the reader, was brought up in the conviction that labor was derogatory to respectability—that wealth was the highest good that could be enjoyed by mortals. He was early sent to school; and then to an academy, preparatory to a course of professional studies. Mean while, his old father was toiling on, striving to attain the distinctions which are attendant upon wealth, merely for the sake of his children; but still willing to forego all the pleasures and emoluments of the world if his sons could be useful and lauded in community. The young man entered upon his studies, convinced that he was the son of a rich man comparatively, and that consequently he was entitled to a "full swing" in all the frolics and speers which are prevalent in a high school. Books, and duty itself, were made subservient to the love of fun. So when his six months were completed, he came home to his disappointed parents, a wild, reckless, indolent boy, instead of the sedate, fixed, and ambitious young man. He loitered about home some time, but his father's constitution was broken, his business retarded, his sales low, and his returns nothing. Starvation was before the family. Fruitless and equally many were the applications which the young man made at the trading establishments in the city for occupation. There were more clerks than there were merchants, and more traders than buyers. Worn out with fatigue and with the stings of conscience for his former mis-spent time, with his spirit humbled, and his mind nerved to undergo any privation rather than return without employment to his father's house, the shop of every mechanic, from the blacksmith's to the jeweler's, was besieged; but it was a time of general depression in business, and every man looked out for his own good. So without blame, conscious that he had done his best to obtain an occupation, the young man went home. The well spread table, the carpeted floor, and the refinement which was visible in the household, but seemed to aggravate the misery of its tenants. Lower and lower the cruze went down till the old was well nigh exhausted therein. One day the young man was in the shop of a poor blind shoemaker who had amassed by his own industry a reputable fortune, while he had built up a reputation which can never die from the memory of the community in which he lived. "Why don't you go to work?" asked the old man. "I can't get any thing to do," was the response.

"Come and learn my trade," said the old man. It was a bargain. The pampered son of fortune forgot his pride, bowed his head to the yoke and became the apprentice of honest Father—. His good habits endeared him sensibly to the generous shoemaker, and the progress which he made in his new avocation surprised every one who had formerly been acquainted with his idle habits. The old man died; during his illness he carried on the business of the shop, and received for his service some old tools which had been the property of his employer. He commenced business for himself, but soon went to a flourishing village of shoemakers, and entered the large establishment as a journeyman. His love for study and refinement increased. The best society was thrown open to him, the confidence of his master was unbounded in his integrity; his shop-mates were pleased with his naive talent and address; he became the sun of their little circle, and when he left his employer, in the hopes of obtaining a more lucrative situation, his loss was severely lamented. We were conversing yesterday with this young gentleman, (for he can justly lay claim to this title,) upon the false pride which has ruined so many boys. Said he, "if I had obtained a clerkship when I sought it, I should have been an outcast in society, and a beggar. This is the effect of shoemaking, of industry, and of enterprise—a good reputation, a clear conscience, a happy life, and a triumphant death."

MARRIAGE vs. INSANITY.

"Few people are aware how much more insanity prevails among the bachelors and unmarried ladies, than among the married of both sexes. From the examination of very many reports, out of every five of all the lunatics sent to American Hospitals, three are unmarried, and only two are married, and that almost all of them are over twenty-one years old. On the other hand, it is pretty certain, that in all the community over twenty-one years of age, there are more than three times as many in as out of wedlock. If this be the case, then the unmarried are more than four times as liable to become insane as married people.

"To make this matter more certain, Dr. Jarvis, of Taunton, Mass., has written to some gentlemen in almost every town in Massachusetts, and in some towns in Connecticut, requesting them to count on the list of voters—the married, the unmarried, and the widowers, and to give him information of the number in each of these classes belonging to their respective towns."

There can be no doubt of the fact, that insanity prevails more among the unmarried than among the married, notwithstanding people so often say that the young folks are crazy to marry so young. But what are the reasons?

In the first place, persons who exhibit strong symptoms of insanity, do not generally get married; and that will account for a goodly portion of the difference referred to by the writer above.

Secondly.—Married people, in this country, have generally enough of cares to balance their mind, and to prevent the extensive effect of that morbid action of the mind which, in the unoccupied, is so dangerous to its peace and soundness.

It is, of course, mournfully true, cases frequently occur of this most to be dreaded affliction. But we incline to the belief that it may often be prevented by kindly watchfulness, and a judicious direction of care, thoughtfulness, and more especially tender forbearance, under some circumstances, and free, yet delicate conference, upon the dangers of certain movements, thoughts, or pursuits, which tend most to destroy the balance, and give unfavorable proclivity to the mind. Thousands who have enjoyed the respect of society, and only subjected themselves to the charge of eccentricity, have owed their sanity, and the credit of that sanity, to the delicate attention of a watchful friend, of whose watchfulness they were ignorant, or to the candidly affectionate intercourse of one who entitled himself to confidence and respect by delicacy, kindness and decision.

While on the other hand, tens of thousands have been driven from eccentricity to the most miserable mental derangement, and to squalid, raving madness, by the cold neglect of those who should love and soothe, and the taunts and jeers of those who have no regard for the noble mind o'erturned.

The married, we may suppose, who fall into mental aberration, are within kinder influences—that of husband, wife, or children, than the unmarried. But married or unmarried, the mentally sick need not only a physician to prescribe with skill, but a nurse to soothe and serve with delicacy. "The image of God," it is said, "is effaced." Admit that it is so. Their "God is love," and love and affection can alone recall his image.

We have seen very many instances in which the irritated were soothed by delicacy and kindness, when authority and temper would have chafed into fury.

"Dr. Kirkbride!" said a young woman, as we were passing along the corridors of the Hospital in Blockley, some time since.

The doctor paused—the eye of the patient flashed with anger.

"Is this the way, sir, you——"

"Good morning, Miss H.," said the doctor. "I hope you feel well, and that your flowers have not faded."

"There again," said she, with a boggard temper, "I was promised by Mrs.——"

"Mrs. Kirkbride regrets she could not be with you earlier. One of the children is unwell, but the other is now preparing a fine bunch of flowers, and Mrs. K. will bring them, and sit with you a little while, if you have time to spare. You are not engaged, I hope?"

"Not at all. Mrs. K. is very kind; and I am happy to say that I have been able to keep in quite good order the flowers she had the kindness to send me yesterday. But you say she is coming herself?"

"She will be here in half an hour."

"I am very much obliged to her and you. And here is a paper you kindly lent to me; I found it very interesting."

All pervading spirit of kindness! thought we, as we listened to this dialogue, and marked the subsiding of the mental storm—it is thine to lighten the load of the afflicted one, and soothe the anguish of the bruised.—Thou bowest beside the wretched that is crushed beneath the accumulation of misery, and if thou canst not remove the load, thou whisperest patience, and strengthenest to endurance by sympathy. Thine eye powereth light across the dungeon gloom of the prisoner, and thy voice wakens the slumbering reason of the maniac.—Whatever of earthly evil may befall me here, may kindness at least awaken the memory of those hours when a mother's love shielded from harm, and may affection mitigate the blow which prudence could not avert. And if the call of a maniac is my destiny, let the tones of civility, at least counterfeit respect and affection, and sympathy medicine, if it may not cure my ills.—[U. S. Gazette.

A German Philosopher has made a most singular calculation in regard to the distances of the Planets from the sun. He has constructed a table as follows:—

0	3	6	12	24	48	96	192
4	4	4	4	4	4	4	4
4	7	10	16	28	52	100	196
M	V	E	M	—	J	S	H

The reader will observe, that the upper line of figures begins with zero, and then goes on doubling each time, starting with 3.

The constant quantity 4 is added to each of these numbers, and the results from addition show the representative distances of the planets from the Sun, beginning with Mercury on the left. Observe the blank which occurs in the vacuity between Mars and Jupiter. It is between these orbits that it was thought a planet ought to exist, corresponding to the distance 28, and here the fragmentary bodies, (asteroids) or wrecks of "a shattered world," have been discovered. It will not fail to strike any one as most wonderful, the singular mathematical system by which the Architect of the Universe, has measured, and ordained the positions of the heavenly bodies.

STRAY LEAVES.....NO. III.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

FREE DISCUSSION.

We belong, each individual of us, to a great mass of humanity, bounded not by walls of sect and party, but all blended into one glorious family, on which the same sun smiles, the same dew falls, and the same God bestows his parental blessings. It is only a narrow and bigoted mind that refuses to look beyond its own creed, its own social circle, or its own long-established opinions for truth, usefulness, and important benefits to the human race.—Liberality of thought, and a free toleration of adverse parties and opinions, is the only safe foundation for any social or civil constitution; and free discussion is like a sculptor's chisel, hewing away excrescences, modelling into fair proportions, and elegantly perfecting the stern Doric architecture of the eternal Temple of Truth.

No subject—however rude and uncultivated the mind that brings it before the world, and however loaded it may be with useless decorations and unmeaning appendages—no subject that bears upon the interests of humanity should be shut out from candid and thorough investigation. There is no danger that error will ever extensively prevail in a community addicted to free and liberal discussion. The human mind is so constituted, that error finds no permanent foundation within it, while agitated by rational and deep-probing inquiry.

He is a coward who opposes the exposition of any doctrine, or science, through fear of its evil influence upon society. Let him oppose its principles and arguments with all the force he can bring from mature reflection and superior light; but never should he put a muzzle upon the mouth of any person who speaks with the zeal of sincere conviction.

There have been times and countries in which even the sublime doctrines of Christianity could be proclaimed only in mountain fastnesses, and hidden and remote caves; but truth is destined never to perish under any severity of persecution, or strictness of prohibition; and one feature of this enlightened and Christian age should be, the encouragement of free discussion, and the candid and mature investigation of all subjects connected with human rights and interests, whether intellectual, social, moral, or religious.

GREATNESS AND MEEKNESS BLENDED TOGETHER.

BY MRS. LUCY HORTON.

According to gospel rule, in the Christian mind, the spirit of the lion, and that of the lamb, are blended together—and also the spirit of the eagle, and that of the dove. And what is more noble, than greatness of mind, united with humility and meekness?

We see the Superintending Mind exhibited, not only in the magnificence of the planetary worlds, but in the lowly plants and flowers of the fields, and also in the formation of the insect creation.—We see a mind of economy exhibited in the formation of plants, flowers, and insects of every description, and we can also see a mind exhibited in the ant, and honey-bee, which causes them to provide for future wants! And from these circumstances, I think we may learn the simplicity, and Fatherly care of Him, whose GREATNESS is beyond the stretch of human thought, and whose meekness, and fatherly care provides for the smallest insect!

And if such is the nature of the OMNIPOTENT, and OMNIPRESENT JEHOVAH, will he cause even one dear soul of Adam's race to be endlessly miserable?

UNIVERSALISM TAUGHT BY THE VOLUME OF NATURE.

BY REV. H. L. HAYWARD.

I well remember a conversation which I had some years since, with an intelligent lady belonging to the Presbyterian church; in the course of which I asked her how it was possible for a person of common intelligence, to look abroad upon the wide spread volume of nature, and view the ample provision which has been made for the supply of man's wants and the gratification of his lawful desires, and still believe in the chilling doctrine of endless woe? Her reply was in substance, that if we all followed the teachings of the book of nature, we should, as a matter of course, be Universalists; for, said she, "the doctrine of endless misery does not receive a particle of support from that volume; all its teachings going to corroborate Universalism—but when I open my Bible, I learn a very different lesson." As this lady is not alone in her views of this matter, it may not be altogether amiss to examine the subject somewhat minutely, and see wherein consists its error.

Here is a certain book, which we denominate the Bible. It claims, what all Christians readily grant, viz., that its author is divine—that it was written with the finger of Inspiration, and contains truths of deep and vital interest to mankind. It is supposed to reveal the character of God, and make known the final destiny of the human race. A correct understanding of its teachings, is therefore of the highest importance to us.

But here is another book, of a still more ancient date than the former, and claiming to have originated from the same author; which we call the volume of nature, and which is supposed to teach a very different doctrine from the Bible—for, while it is freely admitted, even by believers in endless misery, that Universalism is taught on every page of nature's volume; it is contended by those very individuals, that the volume of inspiration teaches the doctrine of future endless woe. But is not here a manifest absurdity? Both these volumes were written by the finger of God, and contain revelations of his character and will. They are simply two volumes of the same work, and God is alike the author of both; hence, it is unreasonable to suppose, that they teach opposite and conflicting doctrines—because, where two volumes in combination of the same subject, have been written by the same author, and that author a being of infinite wisdom; we shall be able to perceive throughout them both, the most perfect harmony and consistency. If then, the book of nature, (which we shall denominate volume the first,) teaches the doctrine of Universalism, as the lady above referred to freely acknowledged; the book of inspiration, (which we denominate volume the second of the same work), must be a continuation of the same subject with volume the first, and can not conflict with the doctrines therein advanced. And if the author has advocated Universalism in the first volume of his work, it is hardly rational to suppose that he would advocate the doctrine of endless misery in the second.

I know this is sometimes the case with men—as the history of W. Whittaker and M. H. Smith abundantly prove. But it should be remembered, that men are fallible and changeable, and the opinions of to-day are frequently discarded on the morrow. With God, however, the case is very different. "He is of one mind and none can turn him"—"the same yesterday, to-day, and forever"—hence, the revelations which he has made at different times for the benefit and instruction of his creatures, must be in the most perfect harmony, and teach the same general truths. Volume the first, contains simply the rudiments, the first elements of that glorious science, which relates to God's moral government. Volume the second goes still beyond the first, and furnishes clearer and more definite instruction, with reference to man's final estate. But there is still a third volume of the same work, forthcoming, written by the same author, and furnishing revelations which mortals can read only by the eye of faith. Relative to the contents of volume third, we shall never be able to learn but little, until mortal is exchanged for immortality, corruption clothed upon with incorruption; and we are permitted to see eye to eye and face to face, and know even as we also are known. In that volume we shall delight to study, and through the wasteless ages of eternity, we shall continue to make new discoveries, each more glorious and entrancing than the former; and thus go on from one degree of knowledge and improvement to another, until we shall rival angels in the magnitude and extent of our discoveries.

THE MERCY OF GOD.

BY REV. H. H. WATSON.

"His mercy endureth forever" DAVID.

In the book of Psalms we have this expression, "his" (the Lord's) "mercy endureth forever," thirty three times: once each in the 106th and 107th; five times in the 118th, and twenty-six times in the 136th: and notwithstanding so vast an amount of testimony is found in the inspired writings, of God's unbounded mercy; yet it is unblushingly declared by the would-be orthodox, that a part of mankind will be made to endure endless suffering by this merciful being. How inconsistent!

"His mercy endureth forever." Mercy is that virtue which inspires us with compassion for the woes and miseries of others, and inclines us to assist them in their necessities. It is mercy that fills the human breast with pity, causing a painful sensation whenever an object of misery or want is presented to our view.

And in no situation does man appear more noble, than when he is engaged in dispensing comfort to the miserable, wo-worn and sorrowing sons of humanity. And it is this that exhibits him in a character which becomes his nature. But though man is a merciful being, yet in him mercy is a finite attribute; for though he may once have been alive, as it were, with sympathetic feelings, yet by a continual observation of misery in its various forms, he will become almost, and perhaps quite void of compassion; having forgotten those holier feelings, which warm the breast of the philanthropist.

In reference to this subject, the question is asked and answered by the Lord, through the mouth of his prophet Isaiah, "Can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion..... yea, they may forget, yet will I not forget thee." Hence we see that if man forgets to be compassionate to his fellow man, the great Author of man's existence will not forget him; for "his mercy endureth forever."

God's mercy endureth forever. How cheering the thought! And it is the more so, when we reflect that His ways are not as our ways—that he is immutable, for mercy in God is that essential perfection or attribute, (if we may be allowed the expression,) whereby the sufferings of his dependant creatures are pitied and relieved. "For" (declares the sweet singer of Israel) "the Lord is good, his mercy is everlasting; and his truth endureth to all generations." Again, "The Lord is good to all; and his tender mercies are over all his works."

And the prophet Jeremiah speaking of the unbounded goodness and mercy of God, declares as follows—"The Lord will not cast off forever; but though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies, for he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men." Then—

"Give to the Lord immortal praise;
Mercy and truth are all his ways;

* * * * *
"His mercies ever shall endure,
When death and sin shall reign no more."

QUESTIONS TO UNIVERSALISTS.

BY REV. U. CLARK.

How many Universalists are there, who do all they can to forward the interests of their cause—their denomination? Let us not be particular about using the name, the party—Universalism, for it is folly to profess to go under other colors with the hope of maintaining the whole spirit and power of the Gospel.

How many professors of Universalism exert every possible influence in promoting the cause upon which they can talk with fluency when opposed? How many make the principles of the Gospel the principles to guide them in all their dealings and intercourse? How many prove themselves by maintaining the public ministration of the word by every possible means? How many are willing to make personal sacrifices of time and money for their cause? How many do all they can to uphold public preaching by their regular attendance? How many stay at home, while they would condemn the preacher for doing the same, and talk of the coldness of others? How many take as many Universalist publications as they can, and do all in their power to aid in their circulation to convince opposers and encourage the indefatigable publishers, who are suffering losses and labors in consequence of neglect? How many never think of lending their papers? How many never mention Universalism to those who believe it not, while they are mingling with them continually? How many Universalists consider all the responsibilities which rest upon them, all the inestimable blessings of the Gospel, all their privileges, all the demands of their profession?—how many, taking all these into consideration, exert themselves to the utmost in acquitting themselves faithfully and honorably?

IGNORANCE.

How much of the misery of this world has its origin in ignorance. How many, influenced by the false ideas that "Stolen waters are sweet," that "Bread eaten in secret is pleasant"—I say, how many under these mistaken notions, launch out upon the broad waters of life, with a firm belief that happiness will crown their efforts—that the haven to which they are destined, contains all that heart can wish—where they can bask in the sunshine of peace, and prosperity; while, at the same time, they are moving onward, ignorant, and consequently regardless of the laws by which the world is governed. But, alas! how soon these bright anticipations vanish, and how different the realities! They soon find that many, very many are the impediments which obstruct their course; shoals and sand-bars meet them on every hand; still they move on in the same channel, unconscious that these evils and misfortunes are brought upon them by their own transgressions—the germination of seed sown by their own hands.

Such individuals, not understanding God's moral government, are continually scolding, and finding fault with the ways of providence. They should know, that the physical, the organic and the moral world were governed by certain laws, perfect and immutable, partaking of the nature of the fountain from whence they flow, laws which can not be infringed with impunity, no more than you can thrust your hand into the scorching flame and receive no injury. Impress this upon their minds, and also the important fact, that these laws, and their penalties were instituted to guide and govern the children of men—to induce them to turn from the error of their ways—to discard vice, and flee to virtue—to admire the ways of Providence instead of grumbling and finding fault with them—"to cease to do evil, and learn to do well"—let these facts be fully established in the world—let mankind understand them universally; and how much of the misery which man is now heir to, would become annihilated. Let the doctrine of rewards and punishments be fully investigated and understood—let the voice of experience, the best of teachers, be listened to; and they will become fully convinced that "the righteous are recompensed in the earth, much more the wicked and the sinner." When this declaration of Divine Writ shall become fully impressed upon every mind, then will moral darkness, which has so long bound man in servile bondage, be dispelled by the purifying rays of divine truth. Then will mental slavery be abolished, and the propensities which have so long held the supremacy and led man onward in misery and crime, until the earth has been literally drenched with human gore, become subjected to the intellectual and moral man, and he be elevated to his primitive station. Then and not till then, will happiness universally prevail. Then, and not till then,

"Will man his duty know,
And kindness to his brethren show;
Do unto all as he would fain
Receive of them in turn again."

Then will he do good because he loves it. Then will love which "worketh no ill to its neighbor"—which "is the fulfilling of the law," the "common ligament which binds man to man," flow spontaneously from every heart. Without this, life would be nought but a thorny maze, a cruel bitter, without one ray of light to brighten our pathway, and cheer us onward to acts of virtue and morality.

"What is life when wanting love?
Night without a morning;
Love's the cloudless summer sky
Nature gay adorning."

THE DISAPPOINTMENTS OF YOUTH.

The first disappointment falls most heavily and blighting upon the heart, and withers its warmest and best affections. The victim of early disappointment, is like a young and tender rose opening its petals to the bright, laughing sky, but which, ere it has opened in all its loveliness, is despoiled of its unfolding beauty by an untimely frost. And though the young and elastic spirit may sometimes arise from beneath the deadening influence of its weight of woes, and appear to recover its wonted cheerfulness, when surrounded by the gaieties and pleasures of life, yet there is still a cold and barren place in the heart, where hope will not blossom, and where no bright anticipations exercise their benign and soothing influences, by allowing fancy to revel amidst the delightful scenes of future enjoyment. Love, in youth, is doubtless the strongest and most absorbing passion. It takes entire possession of the heart, and holds a powerful and controlling influence over all beneath its sway. The history of its powers is spread over the whole earth; they are taken from every condition and station of life, and painted in every variety and form of coloring of which the mind is capable of conceiving.

It is a subject upon which the poet dwells with intense delight, and which the novelist renders deeply interesting, by clothing in all the beauties of language, the melancholy feelings of many a broken heart, caused by early disappointment.

"For they who have loved the fondest, the purest, Too often have wept o'er the dream they believed;
And the heart that has slumbered in friendship secure
Is happy, indeed, if 'twas never deceived."

It is in the productions of the poet, the writer of fiction and the faithful historian, that we find so beautifully represented, the paradise of love, its wild tornadoes of destruction and violence, its morbid melancholy, its sullen pride, its shrinking timidity and its remorseless vengeance. All these have been portrayed to the imagination in the most vivid characters; and in thousands of instances have they awakened the tenderest emotions of the heart, by bringing to recollection

"The smiles and tears of other years,
And the words of love then spoken."

The first disappointment of the heart poisons every fountain of existence. Its withering, scorching effects vary according to the character and disposition of its hapless victims. Many sink beneath its influence, and never recover from the deadly shock; others seem to pass through the fiery ordeal unscathed and unharmed; but while they laugh with the gay, and glide smoothly along upon the surface of the stream of pleasure, "the cold heart to ruin runs darkly the while."

The gloomy misanthropist, the reckless votary of dissipation, and the miserable victim of the demon of intemperance—many, very many of these objects of compassion, were made wretched from an early disappointment of the heart. In the secret chambers of their hearts lies buried many a withering thought, of which the world knows not, cares not, thinks not. They were too dream-like, too unearthly, in their nature, to be brought forth amongst those other thoughts "all outward bound, 'mid sands, and rocks, and storms, to cruise for pleasure." They chose rather to keep concealed within their own bosoms those life-consuming thoughts, well knowing, that their disappointed hopes of earthly happiness would receive but little sympathy from a cold and heartless world, that wots not of the mental suffering occasioned by disappointed love.

"CARS READY—ALL ABOARD."—Miller.

We occasionally have strange things here, although we live, comparatively, in the country. A Mr. Daniel Tuller, from Connecticut, has been giving us a few lectures on the subject of the "Second Advent of Christ." He commenced by saying, that his business was not to prophecy, but to explain the Bible, and tell the people what he thought it meant; and in doing this, he wished to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. He then proceeded to show that to Abraham and his seed were promised the land of Canaan; that Abraham and seed consisted of the righteous and faithful, both the Jews and Gentiles; that the promised land of Canaan, which is the new world that is to be, has not yet been received by Abraham and his seed, but that it would be inherited at the coming of Christ in 1843; that when Christ did come, the world would take fire, and burn up the wicked, whilst the righteous would be caught up in the clouds with Christ; that there are to be two judgments, first of the righteous! when Christ comes in 1843—then of the wicked, at the end of a thousand years, during which time Satan is to be bound.—He then went on to enumerate the signs of the times, to show conclusively, that the coming of Christ is near at hand. His arguments instead of being so very conclusive to fix the time in 1843, would apply as well to any other year, as to this.

He read from Joel ii: 31, "The sun shall be darkened and the moon shall be turned to blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come." To show that this had just been fulfilled, he referred to the dark day of May 19th, 1780, and also to the earthquake at Aleppo, in 1822! He next went into the writings of infidels, and read several extracts which went to prove that if the Bible was true, Miller's doctrine was true, and the world must wind up its affairs in 1843!

After he had closed one of his lectures, wherein he had misrepresented history, and matters of fact, Rev. Wm. J. Goss rose, and requested the privilege of saying a few words—he said he would not detain them over five minutes. In different parts of the house, Baptists (and limitarians generally) cried out, "this is not the place for you to speak," and he was not permitted to speak.

Mr. Tuller at his next lecture launched off with the 24th chapter of Matthew, and said that this chapter was the most difficult chapter in the Bible: that the opponents of Millerism in general, and the Universalists in particular, pretended that this chapter had all been fulfilled in the destruction of Jerusalem; and that in order to prove this they (the opponents, Universalists, &c.) substituted for the name of Christ, the Roman Army. He then read the chapter through with this alteration. (Here Rev. Mr. Goss from the assembly rose, and requested, in a very respectful manner, that Tuller would give his authority for saying that the opponents of Millerism made this substitution. Mr. Tuller proceeded as if nothing had been said. Mr. Goss said, that he supposed this question was sufficiently respectful to entitle him to an answer. Mr. Tuller, after throwing out his vial of wrath and indignation at Mr. Goss, for presuming to insult a public lecturer before such an audience, said, that if the gentleman wished to give a lecture he must take a different time and place from that. He did not come there to explain the Bible to suit that man, who did not believe in the Christian religion.)

He then proceeded to show, that this chapter was now being fulfilled, and the 36th verse, "But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only," he said, the word knoweth, was in the present tense, and it did not mean that we never should know; and that in Daniel it said that, "many shall be purified, and made white, and tried; but the wicked shall do wickedly; and none of the wicked shall understand, but the wise shall understand;" and then intimated that he was one of the wise, and could understand; and those, who would not believe in Millerism, were the wicked. He observed that the doctrine of Millerism, was the sine qua non to an admission into heaven; he did not believe it possible for a Christian to go to heaven, unless that Christian believed that Christ would come in 1843: for this was Bible doctrine. The Bible instead of its being like an old fiddle, as some supposed, on which you might play as many tunes as you pleased, taught but one doctrine; and if it was a true book, Christ must come in 1843.

He said, that a great many pretended they could not understand that part of the Bible which related to "Christ's second advent," because they were not learned; and, that those who were learned, pretended that it was a scaled book. And after throwing his anathemas at Academies, Seminaries and Colleges, he flew off in a tangent upon Universalists, and said that they were universally opposed to the doctrine of Millerism; that they were preaching up "peace and safety." He read from 2 Timothy iv: 3, and more than intimated that the popularity of preachers and editors of this denomination, was confined to that class who would not "endure sound doctrine;" that they were that kind of teachers, who had "itching ears;" that their doctrines were readily swallowed by that class mentioned in Rom. i: 30, 31.

He said, that we had no time for controversy—that our modern rail road cars were a literal fulfilment of the scriptural chariots, and for one, he was ready and waiting, and meant to take the first train; and that those who waited for the second, would surely go the road to destruction.

A very illiberal spirit has been manifested by Mr. Tuller and the Limitarians, in their attempt to put down that spirit of inquiry by which the whole truth might be brought forth in respect to the "Second Advent of Christ."

It may be well to remark, that the doors of the Baptist house were readily thrown open for Mr. Tuller's lectures. It is this same Baptist church, which refused to open their doors to the Universalists, when they held their Association here in January, 1842. The reason of that refusal was, that they did not believe the doctrines of Universalism; and believing that they told the truth, we can not but infer that the Baptist church of Lenox are firm in the belief that Christ will come in 1843—in fine, they, as a church, are Millerites. ## UNIVERSALISM IN PITTSBURG, PA.

Pittsburg, March 20th, 1843.

Br. Grosh—As there appeared in the Advocate some two years since, a notice of the death of Universalism in this city, I presume that any information respecting its defunct body, will be gratefully received by yourself, and your readers. It was the will of God our heavenly Father, that we should not always sleep; so he caused breath to enter into the dry bones, and they now live. Yes, verily, they have arisen from the dead; and are alive unto God. Thanks be unto His goodness, this is no fiction, Br. G., but a sober reality.

Br. Ammi Bond has been laboring with us one half the time for the last 18 months, to good acceptance; and the society has been slowly but steadily increasing ever since he came amongst us. Our society numbers over forty that would do honor to any cause; they are mostly poor in this world's goods, but rich in faith. The times are hard and money scarce; but none of these things discourage us, and we hope, (ay, believe) that with the blessing of Heaven, we shall be able, ere long, to say, the cause of God's impartial grace is permanently established in this portion of his heritage, and that beyond the powers of darkness to overthrow.

We have a fine Sabbath School attached to the church. Br. Bond has agreed to remain with us another year. He preaches the other half of the time in Beaver, Beaver county. They are prospering there finely. Yours in the Gospel of Christ.

SECULAR NEWS.

THE LATE HURRICANE.—The following summary is compiled from various accounts of the loss of life and property during the terrible gale of the 13th of February, a loss which is, we believe, without a parallel in the history of our mercantile marine. The hurricane seems to have been general, and so awfully sudden, that the best vessels quailed under it.

	Total vessels.	Total lives.
England and Wales,.....	154	190
Ireland,.....	5	104
Scotland,.....	17	30
Coast of France,.....	5	100
	181	424

Here, then, we have no fewer than 181 vessels and 424 lives lost in one night. These figures, too, can only be considered an approximation to the truth; many vessels and lives having doubtless been lost of which no account will ever be obtained.

Littleton Hunt, an old soldier of the revolution, who served five years, and was in the battles of Guilford and Eutaw Springs, was drowned on the night of the 12th ult. Mr. Hunt was 107 years old.

Water was first let into the Pennsylvania canal on Monday, 27th ult. It was supposed that boats would be able to pass up on Friday last. The North River is open to Poughkeepsie.

SECOND EARTHQUAKE IN THE WEST-INDIES.—The Charleston Patriot of a late date, says:—"We learn from Capt. Smith, of the schr. Francis Cannady, that a second shock of an earthquake was experienced at the north part of Gaudaloupe on the 3d inst. At the time, the captain of a vessel off the North Point of the island, stated that it shook his vessel with such severity that it was with difficulty the crew could keep their feet. A dense cloud of smoke ascended from the vicinity of Bassaterre, and serious fears were entertained for the safety of that place. It was quite sickly at Point Petre, caused from the offensiveness of the ruins of the town."

BORDER DIFFICULTY.—Some excitement has been caused in the Aroostook Territory, by the arrest of a person named Daniel Savage, by a British official, in the Hancock plantation, on the south side of the St. John's river, and consequently within the boundary of Maine, as fixed by the Webster treaty. Some troops turned out at Fort Kent, to effect a rescue, and capture of the offending officer. A meeting of the inhabitants on the plantation was called, and appropriate resolutions were adopted, and the subject commended to the attention of the State government.

A mine of Black Oxide of Manganese has been discovered near Jackson, Miss. The ore yields 85 per cent of the mineral.

ANOTHER COMET.—We understand that several gentlemen saw another comet about mid-heavens, between 12 and 1 o'clock on Sunday night.—[Norfolk Herald.

OSWEGO BANK.—This bank has suspended specie payments for the present, in consequence of a disagreement in the election of a President to succeed Alanson Douglass of Troy, who has officiated for the last two months. The bank was in good credit and had but a moderate circulation.—[Utica Observer.

PAPINEAU.—This well known individual will shortly return to Canada. He has been allowed to draw on the Canadian treasury for $4000, the amount of his salary as Speaker of the House of Representatives, remaining unpaid on the breaking out of the rebellion.

WESTWARD HO!—The New Orleans Bee says that about one thousand persons will rendezvous at Fort Leavenworth on the first of May, for the purpose of emigrating to the Oregon Territory.

TRUE TO HIS PROFESSION.—Biglow, who was sent to the Penitentiary from Lewis county, for dealing in the business of counterfeiting, actually cast several pieces of counterfeit coin in his cell in prison a few weeks since, and gave them to a convict whose term of service was about to expire, to enable him to pay his way until he found employ.—[Mo. Sentinel.

At Allentown, Pa., on Saturday last, a female domestic named Mary Ritchey, employed in the family of William Gornley, was so badly burned by her clothes taking fire, that she died in six hours after the occurrence.

A woman named Susanna Shaw, was killed in New York on Wednesday night, in consequence of taking eight Stychnine pills, containing together half-a-grain of concentrated nux vomica. The pills had been given by a regular physician, accompanied with both oral and written directions, not to take more than one at a prescribed time. This mode of proceeding was too slow, and under the impression that a large dose would do all that was expected at once, the unfortunate woman took the dose mentioned above.

The Montpelier Watchman estimates that the maple sugar produced in that State the present season, at the low price of five cents per pound, will amount to $1,000,000. This will make the quantity of sugar about twenty thousand hogsheads. In 1840 the quantity was but 5,500 hogsheads.

The Meadville (Pa.) Republican, state that on the 25th inst., a Mrs. Burnsdaile, residing in that vicinity, died of hydropobia, produced by the bite of a dog seven weeks previous.

SEDUCTION.—We learn from the Reading, Pa., Democrat, that the Rev. Mr. Griebeler, who was for some time past the pastor of several churches in the upper part of that county, suddenly disappeared a week or two since, having previously borrowed of his neighbors various sums of money. He had not been long absent when the reason of his sudden departure was discovered, and the fact made known, that a servant girl in his family, scarce 14 years of age, was the victim of his licentious passions. Griebeler was a Saxon German, and 30 years of age.

The following Address, (says the Tribune, from which we copy,) to the Indian Warriors who have been stopping for some time at the American Museum, was written by Mrs. CAROLINE M. SAWYER, after several visits to, and friendly conferences with these remnants of the proud race which once possessed this Continent. The substance of these verses was communicated to the Red Men by an interpreter, and received by them with expressions of profound sensibility.

LINES TO THE INDIAN WARRIORS.

"We met!—'tis but a few short days
Since I, with quickly throbbing breast,
Came, with the curious crowd, to gaze
On the Red Warriors of the West.
But not like them did I depart,
With careless smile and thoughtless word;
He only knows, he reads the heart,
What feelings in my breast were stirred.
The tale of all the cruel Past—
The wrongs too monstrous to be told—
Like a wild torrent strong and fast,
In burning tide o'er Mem'ry rolled!
But peace, my heart!—I would not rouse
One thought that now were best to sleep,
Nor see across those noble brows
The shades of dark Resentment creep!
I watch your stately tread, and meet
The beaming smile, the glance of pride;
And, frequent, through the busy street
I come to linger by your side.
Your hands have oft been clasped in mine,
Our eyes in Friendship's light have met;
And many a speaking look and sign
Have told—what I can ne'er forget!
You leave us—and I know 'tis well!—
For that far home I ne'er shall see;
And men would smile were I to tell How sad WA-CON-TAM's* heart will be!
E'en now, to think you must depart
Far over mountain, stream and deep—
WA-CON TAM has a woman's heart—
A woman's heart—and she must weep!
Brothers, farewell!—the hour is near
When you must go, and I must stay;
But oh! how oft to God my prayer
Will rise for you when far away!
Go to your homes!—there loved ones claim
Your thoughts, your kindness, and your care;
Yet tell me—will WA-CON-TAM's name
Be ever spoken by you there?
Ay, go!—and blessings on you rest,
Wherever you in life may roam;
And may the hearts that love you best,
With joyful shouts receive you home!

DONATIONS.

Br. Grosh:—Having noticed of late, some few "cards" in your paper, by various brethren, in which the liberality and benevolence of their parishioners are set forth in a very pleasant manner, and being somewhat a stranger to such things, you will confer a favor upon a friend, and perhaps upon more than one, by permitting me to make a few inquiries relative to donations, and the form in which they are bestowed. There has been no little query excited in my mind, whether or not, those were free gifts—the offspring of the friendship which the people have for their beloved pastors. If they were freely bestowed, then surely the donors are entitled to great praise, and dead must that heart be to all the finer feelings of humanity, that would neglect to render back in return, the emotions of an overflowing gratitude. The man that would act in this manner, is undeserving of the confidence of his fellow beings, much more those hallowed principles of affection, whose office it is to pour the balm of consolation into the sorrowing heart—to brighten and beautify the faculties of the mind, and render life one continued season of happiness and joy.—But a something whispers me, that there has a wrong impression gone forth relative to those acts so highly complimented.

For instance; I have noticed some statements in your paper, declaring such donations occasionally to amount to the sum of $100, and as a preacher is generally located in the country for about $400 per year, I am unable to persuade myself that this donation of one hundred dollars is not deducted out of his stipulated salary, leaving the balance to be paid him at the year's end. If the conclusion here drawn is correct, it is certainly a mark of wisdom in the societies, to carry in the $100, in the form of a donation; for they thereby get puffed in the paper—their fame trumpeted from Dan to Beer-sheba!—trumpeted? yes, but not like the pharisees of old;—no; improvement keeps pace with the stately march of time, and now instead of sounding their own trumpet as was done in days of yore, the preacher is set apart to sound it for them—and the more wind he is in possession of, the louder and longer does the blast of fame echo and re-echo afar, arousing the wonder and admiration of the world; and surely the poor preacher will not be so ungrateful as to murmur at the conclusion of his engagement, because they deduct the amount of the donation from his stipulated wages! No; this would be the height of impudence—uncharitable in the extreme! But should people be so lauded for the payment of their honest debts? I am aware that in this age of degeneracy, it is somewhat difficult for one to meet his obligations; but I have yet to learn that the task is so difficult of accomplishment, that it should be spread abroad before the gaze of the multitude, as a remarkable display of a superior Christian virtue.

But perhaps the conclusion upon which are founded the foregoing remarks is erroneous; and if so, surely none would more heartily rejoice upon a knowledge of the same, than myself. For were I persuaded that liberality and universal love had become so far prevalent, that numerous societies not only paid their pastors their stipulated compensation, but in addition thereto, the members united in visiting their preachers and bestowing upon them the tokens of their friendship and love, it would assuredly be hailed as the dawning of a better day to many a weary and care-worn soul. It is a lamentable truth, that too many of the promulgators of the doctrine of "the restitution," have heretofore been, and too many now even, are under the necessity of travelling "over hill and down dale"—compelled to suffer the scorching heat of a burning summer's sun, and then to encounter the peltings of the winter's storm—to toil on, toil ever, in order to secure a small pittance for themselves and those dependant upon them for support and protection.

Again:—In all things there are extremes, which are alike deleterious in their tendency, and so far as our present subject is concerned, the one extreme consists in making those pastors who are poor, donations, and deducting the amount from their limited compensation, when, had they been paid in something more available, many articles of the donations would have been dispensed with, and something more essential procured to supply their places. The other extreme is that of making large donations to pastors who are able to live genteelly without them, while many poor people, who are actually suffering for the necessities of life, would be thankful for the favors thus bestowed upon the rich.

There are but few, however, of the ministry of "the reconciliation" who are in possession of a respectable share of this world's goods, but in other denominations there are many who are decidedly wealthy, and my heart has often been pained when I have seen the citizens of a village congregate and pay their respects to these abodes of comfort and plenty, merely because the tenants were clothed in the clerical robe, while the humble shed—the abode of poverty, wretchedness and woe, where the greatest distress was preying upon the sorrowing inmates; was shunned as one would shun the grim spectre of pestilence. Perhaps people who proceed in this manner have an excuse, inasmuch as the poor are always with them, while the pastors are not. This is true; for those pastors, I have always noticed, receive many calls to labor in different sections; and hence it is necessary that people bestow upon them the tokens of their friendship while they have an opportunity of so doing, for when the Lord calls them to a place where they can obtain a greater amount of salary, they invariably leave, and then many regrets are experienced that more attention was not bestowed upon them at the place from whence they were called; while the poor are always at hand, and tokens of charity can be bestowed upon them at any period, which though perfectly easy of accomplishment, yet I am sorry to say that the work is too often neglected.

But if people would see the pure principles of religion bearing a peaceful sway in the world, let them bestow upon their religious teachers a salary sufficient to enable them to live in a comfortable style—upon those who enter the ministry poor, sufficient to enable them to lay aside a stay for after time, when age or disease shall have impaired their faculties; and that which is now bestowed upon those members of the clergy who are worth their thousands,—let this be given to the poor, and soon we shall behold a change in the Christian world—sorrow driven from the heart of the child of poverty and distress, and praise every where go up before the everlasting Throne for the unspeakable blessings of pure and undefiled religion. So mote it be.

FORGET ME NOT.

There is not in the English language three words, that can move the pulses of the human heart with such a magical and thrilling power; around which cluster so many endearing and holy recollections, and with which are associated so many sacred and heart-binding ties, as those three words, Forget me not! Appealing language of the heart, how few, how short, yet how deep and thrilling the words! 'Tis the language of every heart; from smiling youth to silvery headed age, all feel and acknowledge the force of these impassioned words.

The desire of living in the hearts of others, that our memory may be cherished by those who are near and dear to us, when we are absent and gone, is a universal and a sacred sentiment—one that has its source in the purest and holiest feelings of the heart. Have the days of our youth passed by, and is our bark launched on the rough waves of life, struggling against the rising billows that threaten every moment to engulf it? Let us go back, and behold once more the scenes of our early days—those scenes that are endeared to us, by those sweet and holy ties that cling round that one loved spot, the home of our childhood and youth—the scenes to which we are bound by sacred ties that are entwined and linked with every fibre of our hearts, and to which memory (guardian angel of the past) clings with fond and deathless tenacity. Let us retrace those loved scenes, and though the remorseless hand of time has swept o'er them with many a desecrating change, yet as we retrace the paths we once trod with the loved friends of other days, in all the buoyant happiness of innocence and youth, the voices of bygone days breathe over the heart, and from every tree and shrub, from every flower and plant, from every blade of grass, from the gliding waters of the murmuring brook—there comes a voice that speaks to the heart in solemn and unearthly tones, Forget me not! All, all are eloquent with the remembrances of the friends of our childhood and youth.

Or go to yon grave-yard, and pause by that marble slab, that marks the resting place of a beloved friend; perchance the form of that lies mouldering beneath those sods is that of a fondly loved sister, who was called from thy side in the bloom of youth, to lie down in the loathsome embrace of death—or the form that is enshrouded beneath, may be that of the loved one, to whom were given the dearest affections of thy heart, whose image was linked and blended with all thy hopes of happiness in life, who was torn from thy arms, while the bright wreath of love and happiness was blooming in all its beauty around her fair brow. O! what sweet and endearing recollections of that loved one crowd upon the soul, vibrating through every nerve of our frame, every fibre of our being, filling the heart almost to bursting. The form of that cherished one, as we last clasped it to our bosoms in the heart rending agony of the parting embrace—as we took the last look, and imprinted the last kiss of affection—seems to arise before us, and for a moment—a short, a blissful moment—we are lost to the stern realities of life; there steals o'er the soul a tender and mournful sadness, the spirit of our departed friend seems hovering o'er us, and breathing in tones of heavenly sweetness, Forget me not. O! with what thrilling and electric power does that angel voice touch the chords of our hearts!

Again, as we stand by the bedside of a loved friend who is about to bid farewell to the scenes of earth, whose spirit is hovering upon the confines of another and, as we trust, a better world—as friends gather round the couch of the dying one, to imprint the last kiss and take the last look—as the hand that we grasp grows cold, and the voice of the loved one husky, as it utters in faint tones the last prayer of the heart, Forget me not. O! with what vivid and thrilling powers do these words, at such a moment, fall upon our ears! Every moment and token of the loved and lost, pleads in strains of unearthly sweetness, Forget me not.

The heart instinctively shudders and recoils from the thought of living unloved and uncared for—of dying unmourned and unwept—that no one will cherish our memory and water our grave with the tears of affection—our hearts grow sick and cold within us at the thought of such a fate. We would fain live in the hearts of our friends, that at least one loved one, will cherish our memory, embalm it in the heart, when the cold damps of death shall have checked the warm current of life that now beats in our veins, and the winding sheet and the cold silent tomb shall have closed o'er us, we can ask no dearer boon than this, that when called to leave the scenes of earth, and take the last look of the friends of our youth, we may live in the hearts of those we loved on earth—that our last resting place may never be shunned, but be hallowed by the tear of affection from those we held communion with while on earth. ### THE WORDS OF JESUS.

"I said therefore unto you, that ye shall die in your sins; for if ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins." ST. JOHN viii : 24.

By this we may see, that so long as we "believe not, we die in our sins"; and so long as we die in our sins, where Christ is we can not come; because we have no love of God or heaven in our souls, and therefore are shut out from the kingdom of heaven. L. H.

UNIVERSALISM IN THE WEST.

Kensington, Mich., March 17th, 1843.

Br. Grosh—Again I take the pen to drop a few more of my scattered thoughts to you, for the purpose of casting in another "mite" to help the glorious cause of salvation forward, and do a little, to encourage you and the publishers in the laudable work in which you are engaged. And first, (because the most important to you,) I will say that "after so long a time," with much endeavors, I have obtained two new subscribers for the Magazine and Advocate.

Our cause is moving onward in this vicinity, with rapid strides, in spite of the pressure of the times and the united efforts of three or four denominations, who do what they can to retard the wheels of our car; but the ponderous car of boundless grace moves on with an accelerated velocity. Our congregations are constantly increasing, and as their numbers increase, a proportionate interest is manifested, and even some, who, six months ago were cold hearted and careless, are now warm in the cause, and are beginning to manifest an anxiety to organize into church fellowship.

Our friends here are making arrangements for purchasing a building for a meetinghouse, which, in all probability, will soon be carried into effect, and a church organized that will be an honor to the cause; for our motto is "onward;" and our watchword is, "perseverance."

Oh, Br. Grosh, I must tell you what an affect your sympathetic articles on the subject of donation parties have had upon the people of these "western wilds." On examining the craniums of these "wolverines" I find the organ of imitation, as a general rule, very fully developed; and when they read those articles in the Magazine they said among themselves, "let us go and do likewise." And they asked me if I would like it if they should, and I thought I would imitate Br. G.; so I told them I was "a non-resistant;" and they agreed upon the 22d of February last for the day. Accordingly, on the afternoon of the 11th anniversary of the birth day of the Father of our country, the gentlemen and ladies, both old and young, began to come in, and in an hour and a half my house was, not "more than full," but literally filled with both the wealthy and respectable of this community; and what is remarkable; is, there were several of other denominations; and another such a mess of trash as they brought in I never saw. It consisted of more or less of almost every article necessary for the use of a family: even from white beans down to cash! and the medium consisted of articles of clothing for my wife and children. And a more social and friendly chat I never shared; and after being refreshed by a cup of tea, etc., etc., they retired, leaving my house well supplied with the comforts of life, and my heart filled with gratitude; and if you please, I would like, as a tribute of respect to them, to express my thanks to those numerous and warm hearted friends through the columns of the Magazine and Advocate. And as you say, I could wish the same to every preacher in our denomination. J. H. SANFORD.

A CARD.

Myself and family would thus publicly express our warmest gratitude to the kind friends of this village and surrounding country, who paid us a visit a short time since, and who left us many substantial tokens of their good will. May the happy social interview which we had at that time, long be remembered by us all—may it tend to strengthen the cords of brotherly affection and unite both pastor and people more closely in the bands of brotherly love. ### ORGANIZATION AND DISCIPLINE.

The United States Convention having virtually declined doing any thing to recommend a uniform, consistent and practicable system of organization and discipline for our societies, associations and conventions, the labor of doing something on this subject now devolves on the several State Conventions. There is scarcely a State in the union where our denomination has any uniformity of organization and discipline. In this State and a few others, at least, there is a great variety of practice in almost every thing pertaining to the government of our ecclesiastical bodies. There seems to be, in fact, no rule but the convenience of the members, or the expediency of the moment, or the shifting precedents of those who have preceded us. And for the want of some settled rules and course of action, the guilty often escape for a long period, until the evil becomes so great as to rouse up our people to seek and apply some hasty remedy; or the innocent suffer, until endurance becomes no longer possible. This loose, undefined and irregular course of government hinders our prosperity, destroys all efficiency, and perpetuates the want of general union on those measures and objects in which all are agreed. Can it not be remedied, then? Can we not remedy it at least in this state? Are there are not certain forms and rules of government and discipline in which all are agreed—certain great leading measures which all can unite upon, and urge forward for the prosperity of our cause? I think there are, and would suggest that our State Convention, at its session two months hence, take up the subject, and recommend it to our Associations for their immediate consideration. I care not in what particular mode the subject is approached, or how the plan of government is developed and embodied into a system, only so that it is done—only so that it embraces a plan of forms, measures and objects which shall meet the views of all. Will not our brethren speak out on this subject, and urge it on the attention of our State Convention at its next session—and then on the attention of each Association in the State? Each Association might appoint a Committee to draft a plan as above suggested, to be forwarded to a well chosen Committee to be appointed by the Convention, which Committee might select and combine from them all, a definite plan to be laid before the Convention in 1844, and after being passed upon there, to be submitted to the Associations for their final action. It appears to me that such a mode would secure to us the great leading features in which all could agree, and give us, in this state at least, a form of government and discipline which would be highly beneficial to the cause—and, perhaps, form a model for other states. But, as I said before, any mode that will secure the object sought, will satisfy all who, like myself, have long desired a better organization of our order. A. B. G.

OUR NATURAL CAPACITY.

I know not why it is, that man is so ready to impeach the fair workmanship of God in the creature. All I know is, that it is too often done. No sooner does a man begin to dishonor himself, and prostrate his own capacity to unholy works, and distrust his Maker, than he begins to think and say, that it is most natural for him to do so—just as if God had given him a nature, the constitutional promptings of which were vicious. Did I need any proof of the falsity of this notion, I should find it in the fact, that this depreciating estimate of our natural capacity, always proceeds from those who have demeaned themselves by an abuse of their capacity. It is the conviction of a mind under the violation of the powers which God has given to it. We should therefore be suspicious of all opinions originating in such a source. We should rather study to know our true capacity, and how well it is adapted to the demands which God makes of it.

The fact is, if man has no prospect of unqualified perfection, he has, at least, the capacities of untiring progression. Even when he neglects his capacity, and moves backward from his high destiny, that very movement proves his capacity for progression, and the consequences of his retrograde movement show that it is most natural for him to go upward in the scale of excellence and of being. The process of proving this is extensively varied; but the beautiful conclusions to which analogy will lead us, are perhaps the most pleasing.

Why is it that the mind become perverted in inactivity, unless it is because the mind has no business to be inactive? has a higher calling than merely to be, and then cease to be forever? Why is that the richest luxuries of earth pall upon the senses, and grow noxious, even to the thought of their greatest abundance, if it is not because thought is thus delayed in its upward journeying? Would the captive bird pine, and grow songless in its gilded cage, if its birth-right was not the freedom of the boundless ether? Would the aged prisoner of the Bastille have gone back into his lonely cell without a murmur, if his spirit had not been wounded, and his hopes crushed by being driven from their own free soarings? Would the mind shrink from annihilation, if there was nothing in it allied to the spiritual and eternal? or suffer from vice and error, if virtue and truth were not its most natural aliment?

I repeat, that man has the capacity of untiring progression; and the consequence is, he must advance, or droop in the agony of tantalized and ungratified, yet irresistible longings. And this capability is exhibited by man in all his relations. If we view him as a social being, it is with him—if as a denizen, an artist, or a disciple of wisdom, it pushes him forward in quest of the new, the more beautiful, and the more useful—if as a worshipper of the High and Holy One, it speaks with a truthfulness that will be heeded; it tells us that we must not touch it with the manacles of impious distrust—that we must not limit it to the sordid grovelling of the earthly and sensual. And to this capacity God appeals by his grace, that he may win its single-eyed homage—upon it He lays his commands, as upon a servant whose destiny is amid the glories of the uncreated.

Away, then, with the doctrine of an alliance between vice and man's nature. Let us learn that we are the subjects of God's creative energy, and destined to be conformed to the nobleness of our origin. Let us learn that we are inwardly prompted to walk in wisdom's ways—that our nature urges us there, and is unsatisfied when we stray. Let us learn our natural capacity, and the demands of our heavenly Father upon it; and by the submission of one to the guidance of the other, approximate more and more to that moral elevation for which God has created us. Try it, Christian brother, and then say if you can continue to believe that you are by nature averse to all good, and wholly inclined to all evil. Try it, unbelievers, and then say if the reward of dealing justly, loving mercy, and walking humbly with thy God, does not reveal the true capacity.

RATHER BIGOTED.

Br. Asher Moore, one of the Editors of the Nazarene published in Philadelphia, lately published an article in that paper, giving his views on the miraculous conception and super-human nature of Jesus of Nazareth, and calling the attention of Universalists to that special point in a very earnest and impressive manner. In the course of his article, he remarked that, in all his acquaintance with our ministers, he had found but two who believed that the nature possessed by the Saviour was but simply the human nature, and that one of these soon afterwards left the ministry. As he found me to believe that the nature of Jesus was but simply the human nature, and as I have not yet left the ministry, I must be the only preacher to whom that article is addressed. So be it—I have carefully read it, and considered its arguments, and my belief regarding the nature of "of the man, Christ Jesus," remains unchanged. I believe him to be in nature, all the Scriptures declare him, "a man"—in character and in office the very image, representative and personification of the Deity, the Son of Man and the Son of God in a higher, purer, better sense than was any being that ever lived; being proved such by a greater indwelling of God's spirit, by a nearer and closer communion with God, by the wonderful signs and miracles God wrought by him, by "a name which is above every name," and by a mediation, and a mission, and a government which exceeds all others ever given of God to any being in the universe—but still, in his essential nature, simply a human being. And this belief in the nature, character, and offices of Jesus, which seems to me to be the clear teaching of Holy Writ, I know to be held by several of the most faithful and efficient ministers of the restitution in this state, and by a few in other states, some of whom do not (though the most of them do) believe in the miraculous conception of Jesus in a literal sense. For that conception need no more change the nature of Jesus, to a nature different from or above human nature, than the direct agency of God in creating Adam, necessarily made his nature something different from, or above, the nature of his descendants. At least, so it appears to those who hold to a belief that "Jesus of Nazareth" was "a man approved of God." But we seldom deem it necessary to dwell on this merely metaphysical point in our faith—we do not deem it one hundredth part as important to know or to teach what was the nature of Christ, as we do to know and teach what is his character, his office, and the ability given him to fulfil his mission, for in these, the all-important (or, at the very least, the "MOST IMPORTANT") point of our faith, the character of God himself, is involved. And I have noticed Br. Moore's article more at length already, than I intended to do when I commenced this article—which I intended to be a brief notice of another article, to which remarks on Br. Moore's were to be only prefatory. So, let us now to the article, for which I intended my caption.

In the last Nazarene, Br. "J. L. C. G.," of Williamsburg, Va., lands very highly Br. Moore's article above noticed, and thus comments on a portion of its statements. "It is pleasing to me to reflect on the EXCEEDINGLY small number of Universalist preachers, that have declared themselves in favor of Humanitarianism, and no less gratifying is the thought that one of that handful soon afterwards withdrew from the ministry!" (Have italicized the sentence I wish the reader to notice specially.) No name was given, no character ascribed to the minister who withdrew—his faith only, was named. It must therefore be simply on account of his faith on this single point, (the nature, not the character of Jesus,) that this gratification at his withdrawal is felt! Did Br. J. L. C. G. really mean what he wrote? If so, how much more humane and liberal are his feelings, than were those of the disciples, who, on a certain occasion told the Master, "we saw one casting out demons in thy name, and we forbade him, because he followed not with us?" How great is his love for Universalism, its spread, and prosperity, and glorious influences, when his zeal for the doctrine he holds concerning the nature (not the character) of Jesus, leads him to be gratified to hear that those ministers who hold not as he does concerning that nature (not character), have left the ministry? For, let it be remembered, that the moral, or mental, or social qualifications of the preacher, are not here taken into account; but simply his opinion concerning the nature—the metaphysical nature—of Jesus. Of course, if it affords him gratification to think that one preacher who believed Jesus was simply of the human nature, had left our ministry, it would afford him much more gratification to learn that all who hold that opinion had left it, however honest, virtuous, pious, talented, or useful they might have been to the denomination and to our race in that ministry. He surely can not soberly and seriously mean what he wrote—for, from his other articles which I have seen, I am persuaded he is more liberal, more charitable, more of a Christian Universalist, than to rejoice on such narrow grounds as these.—Suppose that he should learn that BRS. S. R. SMITH, HOSEA BALLOU, E. H. CHAPIN, (whom he probably knows,) and thirty or forty others of the oldest, and ablest, and best of our ministers, as well as my humble self and that one unknown preacher, all held that opinion, (as some of us do hold it,) would it be his desire to have all of us leave the ministry of reconciliation merely on that account?—would our leaving it en masse increase his present professed gratification thirty-five or forty-five fold? I can hardly believe it.

Why, then, it may be asked, have I taken so much notice of the expression? Because I deem it my solemn duty to exert myself to repress a constant tendency which I behold in some of our brethren, to let their zeal for some particular narrow item of faith or measures, swallow up their charity, and destroy their devotion to the great, illimitable, endless principles and doctrines of the Gospel. In the article of Br. J. L. C. G. already commented on, he calls the particular view of himself and Br. Moore concerning the mere nature of Jesus, "that MOST IMPORTANT article of faith"—(I give it as it appears in the Nazarene, capitals and all!) It is not only "important" in his estimation, but "most important," in capital letters!—more important than a belief in God, in God's nature and character, in the Bible, in life and immortality beyond the grave, in universal salvation from sin and death, in the character of Christ, &c.—yea, more important than any or all of these articles of faith; it is the "most important article of faith." Another fixes on some other little peculiar item in his creed, and makes that the "most important article of faith," without a belief in which no man should remain in the ministry. And another, still, selects some particular ceremony, or measure, as the "most important" item in the organization or advancement of our cause, and denounces all who will not adopt it with all his soul and body, as unfit for the ministry, a mere "nominal Universalist," a "disorganizer," and opposed to the improvement and advancement of the order. Now, all this ultraism, and one-idea-ism, there is much zeal and energy wasted, which might be truly useful if united with a little charity and prudence, and concentrated on Universalism in theory and practice. But as it now is, I must think it rather—rather bigoted. A. B. G.

THE WESTERN LUMINARY.

We thank Br. Grosh of the Magazine and Advocate for the respectful and favorable notice which he has given of the "Western Luminary" and the change which has taken place in the proprietorship of the same; and for one, I hope that nothing will hereafter occur to cause unpleasant feelings among brethren.

His remark, however, that "the company may not be able to superintend its publication as well as one," evinces in our esteemed Br. an oversight of the fact, that the company have employed a "Publishing Agent," who is to give his strict attention to the business of the Office, and is empowered by the company to transact all business pertaining to the printing, mailing, accounts, &c., connected with the concern. That the paper is now placed upon a better basis than formerly is a fact, we think "which nobody can deny." J. C.

Right! Br. Chase: I did not see the notice that you had been appointed the General Agent of the company—an event at which I rejoice; for I believe we can understand each other well enough to hear and forbear. I hope, now, that there will be a clear sky between Rochester and Utica, and that the two papers may engage, without any thing to distract their attention from it, in their great, proper and mutual aim—"the diffusion of the principles of benevolence and charity." A. B. G.

TO FRIENDS AND AGENTS.

Our list suffered a great diminution at the close of last volume. It occurred at the very hardest of the times—at the full commencement of winter, when cash was very scarce, and more than usually needed to lay in winter stores. Spring is coming, (though through frequent snow storms—snow four to five feet deep on a level in the woods, and drifts from ten to fifteen or twenty high in the fields and roads!) when business will revive again, and people feel a little more liberal. Can you not make up the losses of last fall and winter? Do please to look around you, and try and recover some of the old subscribers who have discontinued, or to get a few new ones. I think it can be done in many sections, if a fair trial is made.

Subscriptions that begin with May, will be but one dollar to the end of the volume.

New subscribers can yet be supplied from the commencement of the year. Who applies first? A. B. G.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

"UNIVERSALISM THE DOCTRINE OF THE PRIMITIVE CHRISTIAN CHURCH; a discourse delivered in the Universalist Church, Albany, N. Y., on the evening of the fifth Sunday in January, 1843. By S. R. SMITH." Mansell, printer. Pp. 20, 12mo.

The title fully discloses the nature and objects of the sermon, and the sermon fully justifies the title bestowed upon it. As to circumstances, the sermon was drawn out by the revival of ungodly slander, denunciation, abuse, biffingsgate and blasphemy, now carried forward (in the Baptist churches especially) in Albany, by the aid of Elders Swan, Knapp, Raymond, and others of the same kidney. This led to a course of lectures in explanation and defence of the Restitution, and its claims to public acceptance as the doctrine of God, the prophets, the Saviour, the apostles, and the early Christians.—The sermon in question goes to prove the latter portion of these claims, and does it briefly, but powerfully.—Those who know Br. Smith's power of condensation in, fact and argument, need only be told that the sermon before us is one of the happiest specimens of his ability in that line. We hope the sermon will be extensively circulated, and carefully read, and long remembered by the public. A. B. G.

P. S.—“Ancient History of Universalism,” by H. Ballou, 2d. Br. Smith in his brief preface to the above sermon, says very justly of this valuable history, that it is “a work too little known by the public, and too little read by the denomination.” This truth is our shame.

To CORRESPONDENTS.—The P. M. at Hennipen, Ill., is informed that the remittance came safely to hand. The new order was not answered simply because we had none to send. I hope an order sufficiently large to supply all that region will be sent early the next summer.

Rev. George Montgomery West, a self-dubbed Doctor of Divinity, and a self-constituted champion against Mormonism, infidelity, &c., &c., who was suspended by the Presbytery of Brooklyn in 1841, has been formally deposed and excommunicated by said Presbytery, and published accordingly.

Elmore Williams, lately deceased in Cincinnati, and noted for his honesty, prudence, and successful accumulation of a handsome property in that city, of half a million of dollars, without speculation of any kind, was also a very liberal man. His donations for charitable purposes amounted to at least 40,000 dollars, given without parade or ostentation. He was a Universalist in faith and in practice; and an “old-fashioned” man.

Brs. S. R. Smith's Lectures to Young Men have been published in book form by Brs. Gibson & Fairchild, Philadelphia. Br. Sadler, of Portland, Me., has published a book of interpretation of the prophecies of Daniel. Br. Chapin's Lectures on the Spirit of Reform have been published in New York. All these books are highly commended by the public press—when we get copies, we will try to read them, and then speak further of them.

The time is approaching when our terms will require the addition of fifty cents to the subscription of all those who have not paid for the current volume. Will our agents endeavor to collect as much, and as speedily as possible, and forward the same.

DEATHS.

In Sullivan, Madison county, March 15th, of quick consumption, Mr. ORLANDO CADY, aged 33 years. By this afflictive dispensation of Providence, a wife has been bereft of a devoted and affectionate husband; and two young children at an age when they most need the protecting care and guardian love of a father, have lost a kind and indulgent parent. Br. Cady was formerly a member of the Methodist church, but about five years since, he was led to doubt and inquire into the truth of the doctrine of endless woe for any portion of his fellow beings. He sought for instruction in the divine record, and after a diligent and careful perusal of the sacred Scriptures, he embraced in its fullness that faith which embraces in its heavenly provisions every son and daughter of humanity. And he adorned the doctrine that he professed. His illness of four weeks was attended with the most severe and excruciating pain, but not a murmur was heard from his lips; and when friends who stood around his bed, moved by his extreme sufferings, exclaimed that it was too hard, too much for him to bear—“Oh, no, he said, it was all right.” He was impressed with the belief from the first, that it was his last sickness—said that he wished to live for the sake of his wife and children, but was resigned and willing to go—and said to his wife the day previous to his departure, that he was going home. It was the privilege of the writer to be with him in his last hours, to witness the calm and holy resignation with which he met the dread messenger of death, and resigned himself into the arms of his Saviour. Sustained and upheld by the heavenly and all-glorious faith that glowed in his heart, he could calmly bid adieu to earth's fair scenes, though called in the prime of life to take the last look on loved friends, and lie down in the cold, silent tomb. The radiant light of that blessed faith played round his dying pillow, and beamed o'er the dark valley and shadow of death. Though suffering from the most distressing paroxysms for breath, which rendered it painful in the extreme for him to speak, he exclaimed but a few moments before he breathed his last, “I look to heaven;” and while a joyful smile played o'er his countenance, his spirit took its flight from a world of sin and suffering, to join the seraphic throng of angels in the celestial mansions of our heavenly Father.

His funeral was attended on Sunday the 19th, in the Universalist church, and a discourse delivered by Rev. E. P. Williams, (Methodist,) of Chittenango, to an attentive and sympathizing audience. E—

In Brighton, Mich., Sept. 13th, 1842, very suddenly, Mr. DANIEL TONERAY, aged 73 years, and 11 months. He departed firm in the faith of universal salvation, leaving an aged companion, and a numerous family of children and grand children who mourn not as those without hope; to whom, with a large audience of sympathizing neighbors, the consolations of the Gospel were tendered on the 15th, by J. H. S.

In Milford, Mich., of consumption, on Feb. 11th, Mrs. SARAH BOWERS, consort of Mr. Henry Bowers, aged 23 years. She has left a youthful husband who devoted on her, and a lovely infant. But neither her husband or other relatives are without comfort; for they trust in God as the Saviour of all men. Sermon on the 13th, to a crowded and sympathizing audience, from 2 Samuel xiv: 14, by J. H. SANFORD.

In Leyden, Feb. 18th, Mrs. LUCINA PARSONS, wife of Aaron Parsons, in the 38th year of her age. She was a kind and affectionate companion, a tender mother, and a virtuous and valuable member of society. Her faith in the doctrine which teaches the complete triumph of the Redeemer's kingdom, and a universal deliverance from sin and misery, was firm and unwavering. She was ready at all times to “give a reason” of her hope, to whomsoever might ask it of her, “with meekness and reverence;” and though her parents, her relatives, friends and neighbors, were, the most of them, believers in “another gospel,” yet her benevolent disposition and Christian deportment was sufficient to win the esteem and friendly regard of all. Her funeral was attended on the 19th, at the Universalist church in Leyden, and a sermon was preached to a large and crowded, though listening and attentive congregation, by the writer. G. SWAN.

In Andover, Allegany county, Feb. 23d, Mrs. ELIZABETH PERRY POOL, consort of Mr. E. C. Pool, and daughter of the late Peter Sampson, Esq., after a distressing illness of four weeks. She left an infant son, to the charge of her companion, and departed in the hope of meeting them, with a ransomed world, in immortal blessedness after the resurrection. Amiable and affectionate, she felt a sympathy for all that live and move, which was returned by all who knew her. Her remains were carried for interment to Springville, Erie county, where her funeral was attended in the Baptist church, on the 27th. Sermon by Rev. Alanson Tucker, Baptist. COM.

In Queensbury, January 1st, 1843, GEORGE, eldest son of Cornelius and Polly Bentley, aged 13 years and 4 months. He died in the first hour of the first day of the new year; and while many of his young companions were welcoming it with joy, the Saviour had taken him home, to begin the new year in heaven, and with it, the rejoicings of eternity. May the consolation of the Gospel support the bereaved parents under this afflicting providence, and enable them to look forward to the period when they will clasp the departed in the arms of immortal affection, and bask in the end's sunshine of Jehovah's love. Sermon by Br. Hollister.

A NEW UNIVERSALIST WORK.

The subscribers have now in hand a new Universalist publication, the first number of which will be ready for delivery on or before the first of May next. The work will be entitled: “SELECT THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY,” and will be published in monthly numbers of 48 large super-royal octavo pages, printed in book style, on fine white paper, in new bourgeois type, in a neat and handsome manner, and enclosed in a well printed cover. The object of the work is to furnish the public with approved UNIVERSALIST BOOKS, at about one-fourth the price for which they have hitherto been issued. Entire works will be published in the “Library,” and the twelve numbers, which will be issued in the course of each year, will make a volume of 576 large pages, and contain as much matter as now can be purchased, of the same character, for from five to eight dollars.

The first number will contain nearly the whole of “Winchester's Dialogues,” which will be followed by other works of equal and even greater value. And one of the advantages (which is of some consequence to the interests of the denomination) to be derived from the publication of this work, is, that it will rescue from obscurity, and place in the hands of believers and others a number of very valuable works which are now almost forgotten, and which otherwise will never be reprinted. Besides republishing old works, the Proprietors purpose purchasing from time to time, the copy rights of new productions, which may be considered of sufficient importance to deserve a place in the pages of the “Library.”

To persons residing in country places, the publication of the “Library” will afford facilities for obtaining Universalist books, which they have never yet possessed;—inasmuch as the work can be sent to any part of the country at the bare cost of newspaper postage.

The terms of this work will be so very low, that it is believed that every Universalist in the country will avail himself of the opportunity of obtaining a copy. It will be sold at Twelve and a half cents per single number, or ten numbers for one dollar.

As no book accounts will be kept, all orders for this work must be accompanied with the cash; and this must be forwarded in par funds, free of expense to the publishers.—The price of the work being placed at the mere cost of paper and labor, no losses can be incurred. The proper discount will therefore be made upon all uncurrent notes that may be forwarded, and all postage charged against us will be deducted in furnishing orders.

The only exception made to the foregoing rule, will be in cases where large orders are given by persons with whom we are well acquainted. In such instances we shall expect payment in cash, within thirty days after the copies shall have been delivered. Universalist Booksellers, Preachers, and others, will find it to their advantage to become agents for the sale of this publication.

Orders for the “Library” are respectfully solicited. All communications must be post paid, and addressed to

LOVE SONG.....FROM THE ITALIAN.

BY RICHARD HENRY WILDE.

O! WERT thou but with me;
In yon dark vessel free,
That o'er the moon-lit sea
Cleaves her way.
O! were it only mine,
From scenes in which we pine,
To bear thee o'er the brine,
Far away!

On ocean's ample breast,
Beneath night's starry vest,
All else but us at rest—
Thou and I
Of every mutual pain,
Together might complain,
And unbetrayed remain,
No one by.

Thus lifting memory's pall
From this dark life, all, all
The past we should recall,
With its woes:
And then what could we crave
From Heaven and the wave
But a harbor or a grave,
To repose!

DEATH OF DO-HUM-ME.

There are probably few readers of the Union and Messenger to whom the intelligence of the death of the young creature, whose name is attached to this article, will be new. But lest there may be—lest there may be those ignorant even that such a being has ever lived, I will for their sakes, tell who she was. Do-hum-me was the daughter of an Indian chief, one of the most illustrious warriors of his nation, one of the number composing the delegation from the far West, lately in this city, but now on their return home. She was an amiable and merry-hearted girl of seventeen, a general favorite with the tribe, and with all who became acquainted with her. When on their way from Washington to New York, a marriage took place between Do-hum-me and a noble young Iowa Chief, by the name of Cow-hick-ee. This union was characterized by an affection—an absolute devotion to each other, which, to those who have been accustomed to think of the Indians as of a race of stoics, would doubtless appear surprising. They were rarely seen, even for half an hour apart, and their deportment towards one another was marked on his side, by a dignified tenderness, and on her's by a caressing, yet delicate fondness. I saw them often, and knew them well, and can truly say that no one could know and fail to love one so mild, so amiable, so affectionate as was this interesting girl. What wonder then that her husband, who seemed gentleness itself, should do so!

But my limits forbid a longer dwelling on the sunny side of the picture. She had been for weeks a bride, when on the day before the one appointed for their departure to their distant home, she was seized with a violent illness which terminated in a congestion of the brain, and she died. I was with her through her last and most trying hours; she was attended by two or three experienced physicians; her father and husband never left her side for a moment, and could skill, or the deepest affection, have saved her, Do-hum-me had still lived.

Of the sobs and wails of deep and bitter agony, which burst from the husband and father when all was over, I have no heart to attempt a description. It was a scene which, should I live to twice the age of man, I shall never forget.

Although by a universal custom among the Indian tribes, the task of preparing the body for the burial is always performed by the nearest relatives, my offers of assistance were accepted with affectionate gratitude, and together we arrayed the departed girl as if for a bridal rather than a burial.

She was followed to the Greenwood Cemetery by her family, myself and two or three others who were glad to render this tribute of affection to departed worth.—

As a temporary resting place, she was laid in the Stranger's Tomb, but is soon to be interred in a grave.

It was gratifying to witness the satisfaction expressed by the mourners, that a spot, so like their own native wilds, had been chosen for the burial place of their dead.—More gratifying still was it to hear the expressions, communicated through the interpreter, of the mournful pleasure they felt at leaving her in my care; for I had won their entire confidence—how, it matters not now to tell—and they looked upon me as I was, a true and sympathising friend.

After the burial I was deeply touched at being formally adopted by the old chief as his daughter, not in the place of her he had lost, but that he might leave me to watch over her remains, and to perform the few simple rites which the Indians are accustomed to pay to their dead.

"The Great Spirit has taken her away from us," said the bereaved husband, in an address to me. "The Great Spirit has taken her away, and we give her up. But Wa-con-tam-e, (a name which they always called me,) Wa-con-tam-e will lay her in the grave, and will promise to go sometimes and sit down by it, and scatter food around it, that the spirit of Do-hum-me may not faint in its journey to the land of shadows! Wa-con-tam-e will not forget!"

It is needless to say that my promise to fulfil, with the most scrupulous exactness, this affecting request, was unhesitatingly and unreservedly given, and never shall I forget the clinging grasp, and the look of gratitude and affection I received in return. I promised also to use my best endeavors to procure a stone to be placed on the grave, that should tell who slept beneath it.

Cow-hick-ee has a brother who has received a liberal education at one of our Western Seminaries, but who has since returned to the home and the customs of his tribe, and with him I have promised to correspond on the subject, as soon as the burial has taken place.

I have received a kind and generous invitation from the Vice President of the Greenwood Cemetery, to select and appropriate, without compensation, whatever spot I might prefer for the final resting place of my sacred charge. So far my wishes are accomplished. But I am unwilling, for several reasons, to remove the body until there is something more substantial than a few feet of loose earth with which to cover it. I am anxious, and many others who knew her are also anxious, to procure a neat and modest monument to her memory. We surely owe thus much to the daughter of that ill-fated race which, through the cruel and encroaching policy of our laws, is fast fading from the earth. For her sake, then, and for the sake of those bereaved mourners who, with heavy hearts, are now wending their sorrowing way to that home which is never again to be lighted by her smiles, I trust that there are in this city enough sympathising hearts to contribute the moderate sum necessary for the accomplishment of this purpose.

Those who wish to contribute will find a subscription open at the office of the Union, or the money will be thankfully received at my residence, 246 East Broadway.

Whatever is done should be done immediately.

CAROLINE M. SAWYER.

TROUBLE.

Often, when there is an appearance of an epidemic in the city, a proper caution is necessary in the papers about announcing its existence, before its character and extent are understood, lest fears should be excited abroad, unwarranted by any danger, and the business of the city should thereby suffer. Sporadic cases of particular diseases are, therefore, more referred to as evidences of the prevalence of the disorder, because every season has some of the cases of a disease, which in times of calamity, distinguishes that season by its extent and mortality. But when once a contagious disorder becomes prevalent, or when any disease is epidemic, then it behoves the conductors of papers to sound the alarm, lest additions should be made to the sufferers, by new accessions of citizens, or to the sufferings, perhaps, from the same cause.

Such a case occurred in 1832, when the cholera raged, and the press promptly announced the appearance of the disease, and the extent of its ravages. And a case has again occurred, and with becoming promptness, we give notice of its existence and danger.—"Caveat Monitor."

The disease may be considered annual in our city.—If we mistake not, it is endemic, and also epidemic; and in its operations at the present moment, it is making sad havoc in family comforts. We have noticed that, like the "malaria" of Italy, it commences in the upper portions of a dwelling, but soon works downward through all the premises. We saw, last week, its operation, and noted the progress of the disorder in a house. The female portions of the family appear to be seized with a certain giddiness. All ordinary pursuits suddenly ceased. Several persons who seemed to partake of the same infirmity, had found their way into the house; and all who were thus affected were, in the upper rooms of the dwelling, in a most distressed and distressing situation. They had torn up the carpets, disturbed the beds, thrust the chairs out of the room, and upset buckets of water upon the floor, while one of the unfortunate, a colored woman, with a long handled brush, was daubing the ceiling with a compound of water and lime, parts of which had descended upon her person, presenting a species of leprous spots, most alarming.

Meantime, the disease descended from the head to the heart of the house, and chambers, parlours, dining rooms, boudoirs, and even the culinary apartments, shared in the general derangement. Nor was this all. Passengers in the street, if not infected, were at least, invaded; for so high did the excitement rage, that water was thrown from the upper windows of the house, and made to descend in torrents upon the hats, coats, shawls, and dresses, of honest, unsuspecting passengers.

We saw, too, business friends, only on Friday, sneaking out of their own houses at an early hour, steering, with great circumspection, through defiles of blue pots, white-wash buckets, wash tubs, brushes, crabbing brooms, mops, and servants, with the mistress in the rear; and having gained the step of the door, they sprang to the centre of the street, to avoid any outpouring from above. At noon, these gentlemen took dinner at some of the hotels, omitted tea, and at a late hour got home, and found little or no hope, that the disorder in their family was abated.

Connected with the violence of this disease, we ought to mention another type of the disorder; and that is a peculiar ascerbity of temper on the part of the females, occasionally manifested by a wild swinging of the hands, not unfrequently with the broom and mop handle held fast.

So general is the operation of the disease, that we should not have made mention of it, excepting to warn those at a distance, that it is now at its height; and if they are coming to the city, they may calculate the time of visitation accordingly.

We ought to mention that the complaints are most frequent among the literary men. Libraries are daubed, and papers mislaid. But we have seen no one unwise enough to attempt to stem the torrent in his own family, or venture to oppose any obstacle to "CLEANING HOUSE."—[Philad. U. S. Gaz.]

By order of Government, the roads in Prussia are lined on each side with fruit trees. Riding from Berlin to Halle, I noticed that some of them had a wisp of straw attached to them. I inquired of the coachman what it meant. He replied, that those trees bore fruit, and the straw was notice to the public not to take fruit from those trees without special permission. "I fear," said I, "that such notice in my country, would but be an invitation to roguish boys to attack them." "Haben Sie keine Schulen?" (Have you no schools?) was his significant rejoinder.—Stower.

For the Magazine and Advocate. STRAY LEAVES.....NO. IV.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

Oh, not with fabled nymph and woodland faun
Fled the bright soul of beauty from our world!
In every blade of grass upon the lawn,
Or violet's cup, we see its light imperaled.
The beauty of God's soul, o'er earth unfurled,
Reflects its hues in founts and blue-eyed streams,
Or where the mist around the cliff is curled,
Scatters the rainbow brightness of its beams,
And light the gloom below with more than noon-tide gleams.

For the Magazine and Advocate. INQUIRIES.

BY REV. H. L. HAYWARD.

Br. Grosh—At the time of the crucifixion of our Lord, one of the Malefactors who was crucified with him, gave utterance to the following request—"Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom." What was the nature of that kingdom, to which reference is here made? Was it the spiritual kingdom, to establish which was the especial work of our Saviour? If so, how can we account satisfactorily for the circumstance, that the chosen disciples of Christ, who had been the subjects of his particular instructions, did nevertheless entertain less correct views, relative to the nature of that kingdom, than the poor Malefactor? Christ's chosen band of disciples were with him constantly during the whole period of his ministry, and listened to his public teachings and private instructions; and yet, up to the time of our Saviour's crucifixion, they clung to the erroneous notion, that he had come to deliver them from their subjection to the Romans, and establish a temporal kingdom, and reign as a temporal prince. If, then, with all these advantages, they still remained in error and darkness, is it supposable that this poor Malefactor, whose wicked habits of life could not have allowed him to attend very steadily upon the ministry of the Saviour, was, notwithstanding, so much better instructed than the disciples?

If it is said, that he, as well as the disciples, looked for the establishment of a temporal kingdom, and imagined that the Son of God would yet exert his miraculous power, to deliver himself and companion from the cross; I would still ask, if Christ knew him to be in this error, would he not have been likely to set him right on the subject, which he could easily have done by a few words?

I wish some of your numerous correspondents, would give their views on this subject through the columns of your paper—or, if you are in want of a subject for an editorial article, let this be the one.
Homer, March, 1843.

NOTE.—The inquiry is an interesting one, but I doubt whether any very positive answer can be expected to it. Will some of our correspondents please consider the subject, and furnish as satisfactory an answer as they can?

For the Magazine and Advocate. DOCTRINAL ARTICLES.....No. II. BY REV. J. H. SANFORD.

"Ho! every one that thirsteth; come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money; come ye, buy and eat.....Let the wicked forsake his way, and the righteous man his thoughts, and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon. Incline your ear and come unto me; hear and your souls shall live"....."Look unto me all ye ends of the earth and be ye saved." "And whosoever will let him take the water of life freely." "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls." Isa. lv: 6, 7, 3; xlv: 22; Rev. xxii: 18; Mat. xi: 28, 29.

"I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness and shall not return: that unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear; surely shall say in the Lord have I righteousness and strength." Isa. xlv: 23. "For as the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower and bread to the eater; so shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth; it shall not return unto me void; but it shall accomplish that which I please and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it." Isa. lv: 10, 11. "Remember the former things of old; for I am God, and there is none else; I am God, and there is none like me: Declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done saying, my counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." Isa. xlv: 9, 10. Hence we see the word is gone out of the mouth of Jehovah, according to his pleasure, that the wicked should turn from his wicked way, and come to the waters of life, and drink freely of the wine of the kingdom of God, which is righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, Rom. xiv: 17; and of the "sincere milk of the word," "without money and without price," which is able to save their souls. And we are assured that this word shall be as certain in the accomplishment of the object for which it is spoken, as the rain and snow are to assist the earth in bringing forth her fruit for the compensation of the toils of the husbandman, and the satisfaction of the appetite of the eater; and the sustenance of His dependent creatures, whose "eyes wait upon him, while He gives them their meat in due season." Ps. cxlv: 15. "Behold I give you good doctrine."

For the Magazine and Advocate. DYING DRUNK. BY MRS. LUCY HORTON.

A. Dear cousin, I am almost in despair on account of my father's death!—not so much on the account of his absence, but because of the horrible situation in which he left this world! He died in a fit of intoxication, and, according to the words of the apostle, no drunkard "hath any inheritance in the kingdom of heaven!"

B. It is true that no drunkard "hath any inheritance in the kingdom of heaven." And it is also true, that no person of "hatred, envy, malice or strife, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of heaven"—and where is the person who never possessed the passion of hatred or envy? I think it is with the drunkard, as with the murderer;—so long as they are of the spirit of murder or drunkenness, they have no "eternal life abiding in them." An apostle says, "He that hateth his brother is a murderer." So long as a man possesses the spirit of hatred, he has no love of God in his soul; and, of course, has no "inheritance in the kingdom of heaven," because Jesus said, "the kingdom of heaven is without you." "Sin is of the flesh," and when we throw off the clay tabernacle, we then throw off the "sins of the flesh." It is then that a portion of "the dragon is cast unto the earth," because "he is overcome by the spirit or blood of the lamb." It is then that "the dust returns unto the earth, and the spirit to God who gave it," and so "death is swallowed up in victory."

A. If what you say is true, I think I may take encouragement. But do not the Scriptures teach that "every man shall be rewarded according to his works?"

Yes, they do. And Solomon, who was the wisest man, says, "the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth, much more the wicked and the sinner." The drunkard, truly receives his punishment in this state of existence; and often he sincerely repents and abhors himself for his misconduct and folly! Could we hear the lamentations of his mind while in his sober moments, we should hear him groaning under the weight of his crimes in such a manner, that we should be constrained to say, "the way of the transgressor is hard."

Oh, I do sincerely pity the drunkard! How heart-rending are his groans, while in his sober moments! Oh with what inward horror he looks on his family, who are in a state of starvation, and suffering with cold for the want of clothing, and fuel, and a comfortable shelter from the blasting storms of winter! With what keen remorse he upbraids himself as the sole cause of their sufferings! Then in the anguish of his soul, he laments his folly, solemnly vows to himself, (and perhaps to his family,) that he will refrain from evil—that he will no longer pursue the road to ruin! He has now a full determination to break off from his sins of intemperance, and with full purpose of heart he resolves to amend his ways. In this frame of mind, he goes forth in pursuit of food for his suffering family. Perhaps the first man he meets accosts him with a dun for money. He has not a cent of money—nor any thing else of any value! His children are starving, and no one will trust him! He wanders about from house to house, until he is quite discouraged; and with a depressed heart, and a melancholy gloom in his countenance, he returns to his disconsolate family! The children run to him for something to eat. He has not any thing for them! His wife turns pale, with disappointment, and with tears in her eyes exclaims, "what will become of us?" He tells her, he will go again and try to engage some provision for work. He now goes forth in pursuit of work—but every body refuses to hire him; because they know he is a drunkard. They will not even give him his board for his work!—With a horror-stricken spirit, he now sees that himself and his family are outcast from society—without a mouthful of any thing to eat, and without any means of providing any thing; and surely, in this deplorable situation, he justly receives the reward of his former works. And should he again return to the intoxicating bowl, he will be visited with double vengeance on his head, and a hell within his breast. And should he die in a fit of intoxication, surely the keen pangs of death, together with his former sufferings, will be a sufficient reward for his folly. And what parent in the universe would not, if in his power, change this "son of perdition," to a son of God? What parent of love and compassion could see a near and dear child in the last moments of death, sinking into an endless hell,* and not even reach forth his hand to raise him from the abyss of woe, even should his crimes be ever so great? And what is the love of an earthly parent, to the pure and holy love of God? It is but a drop to the ocean! Then surely the God of heaven will change the vile bodies of all men, and make them like unto the glorious body of Jesus Christ.

* Should his misery never cease, then of course he would be in an endless hell.

THE MISSION OF CHRIST.

BY REV. H. H. WATSON.

"He hath done all things well." Mark. vii. 37.

The mission of our Lord Jesus Christ on earth, was "to preach the Gospel to the poor....to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised." And while we contemplate his short but eventful life, we can but truly exclaim in the language quoted at the head of our article, "He hath done all things well."

The mission that Christ came to accomplish, was "to save that which was lost." On this particular the Scriptures of divine truth are plain and positive—"For the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them. For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be saved.—And if any man hear my words and believe not, I judge him not; for I come not to judge the world, but to save the world."* "This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptance, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners." Mat. xxviii. 11; Luke ix. 56; Jno. iii. 17, xii. 47; Tim. i. 15.

The object of Christ's mission is further illustrated by the parables of the lost sheep, and lost piece of silver. As the lost sheep and lost piece of silver, are represented as belonging to their respective owners, so mankind are represented as belonging to Christ. See Jno. iii. 35. And as the respective owners of the sheep and silver are represented as searching diligently for their lost property, so Christ is represented as searching diligently, until the lost sons and daughters of Adam are found, and restored to favor. For he "came to seek and save that which was lost."

The mission of our Saviour was to redeem mankind from sin; and though this was the noble end for which he came, yet he did not hesitate to prove the divinity of his mission, by miracles and alleviating the distresses of suffering humanity. Those afflicted with the palsy were restored to feeling, strength, and action. The blind were restored to sight; the deaf were made to hear, and the dumb to speak. Again, as Christ was passing to the city of Nain, his compassion was moved at beholding a widow following her only son to the tomb, and for the loss of whom she was lamenting. And he "said unto her, weep not." And to comfort her still more, he restored the man to life and delivered him to his mother.

He is next at the grave of his friend, where he manifests the power which his Father gave him, in raising Lazarus from the dead to convince the unbelieving Jews that he was sent from God.

In the sufferings of Christ we have a perfect example of humility and resignation. His language was, "O my Father, if this cup may not pass away from me, except I drink it, thy will be done." And when he was dressed in a mock robe of royalty, a crown of thorns upon his head, and impiously hailed "king of the Jews," he submitted without a murmur. For "when he was reviled, he reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not."

And while he was on the cross suffering the most excruciating and heart-rending pain, he did not feel any malice towards his persecutors, but prayed, "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do." By the death of our divine Lord and Master the new covenant was sealed, the work which his Father sent him to do was finished.

The partition wall was broken down which had existed between the Jews and Gentiles. And as St. Paul expresses. "Having abolished in his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments contained in ordinances, for to make in himself of twain, one new man, so making peace. And that he might reconcile both unto God in one body by

* The word "world" in this, and the last two in the preceding text, are metonymical expressions; that is, they make use of the thing containing for the things contained: and it signifies the people in the world, or all mankind.

the cross, having slain the enmity thereby." Hence we can exclaim in the language of the poet—

"The anthem long and loud shall swell,
For Jesus hath done all things well."

AN IDEA OF THE UNIVERSE.....NO. I.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBEE.

There is in the Christian Keepsake for 1840, an article of the above title from the pen of Rev. Thomas Dick, D. D. It possesses much merit, especially that part which treats of the universe; but some of his reflections upon its Author, deduced, as no doubt he thinks, naturally from the character of a Being possessed of such wonder working power and wisdom, and who was able to frame such a magnificent structure, must be deemed erroneous by every reflecting Universalist—nay, I had almost said by every reflecting man. I purpose giving a few brief articles upon the same subject, in which will be embodied most of his ideas with such reflections as I may deem justly deducible. I shall make no pretensions to original ideas, though I may, and perhaps justly too, claim some honor in dressing them up to be sent abroad in the world.

Before entering directly upon the subject, I will say a few words upon the source from which all our knowledge is derived of the Author of the universe. The Deity can only be known by a manifestation of his works and perfections. Created intelligences, from the lowest to the highest order, can know nothing more of the Divinity than what is gathered from the boundless universe stretched out before them—the dispensations of his providence towards certain created orders of beings—and the special revelations he may occasionally grant, on certain emergencies, to particular worlds. The visible works of God become to man, endowed with purity of soul, and noble capacities of lofty intellect, a source from whence he can learn something of the attributes of his almighty Maker. Spread out before him is the vast creation with all its diversified wonders and beneficent tendencies, calling upon him to behold the nice adaptation of all its parts, and the harmony that attends all its movements. How vast and magnificent a structure is this, with which we are surrounded! What a field, stretching in endless continuation through immensity of space, is here, for the study and contemplation of the great Creator, by rational being!—Yet, as advantageous as this field is for becoming acquainted with our Maker, I fear, in too many instances and by too many professing Christians, it is regarded as too insignificant to claim their serious attention, or considered as of little or no importance in a religious point of view. Herein have they suffered themselves to be misguided by prejudice, or some other cause equally fatal to the truth. It forms a part of the duty of mankind, and especially of every Christian—a duty frequently inculcated, and with peculiar force and solemnity, in the volume of revealed Truth, to study the works of God; for in language like the following does it speak—"Remember that thou magnify his work which men behold"—"The works of the Lord are great, and they are investigated by all those who have pleasure therein"—"Lift up your eyes on high, and behold who hath created these orbs: that bringeth forth their hosts by number; he calleth them all by names by the greatness of his might; for he is strong in power, not one faileth."* And again, the sweet singer of Israel predicted that in latter ages the people of God should "speak of the glory of his kingdom—of the vast universe over which he presides—and shall talk of his power, to make known to the sons of men his mighty operations, and the glorious majesty of his kingdom."†

Having said this much, and in accordance with the views therein contained, I will now pass to present an idea, rude though it may be, of the universe over which God presides, as it eternal independent sovereign and upholder, in so far as I have been enabled to comprehend and catch the most distant glimpse of its all-absorbing interest, grandeur and magnificence. The natural signification of the term universe means the whole system of created things, whether material or immaterial, existing throughout the regions of illimitable space.

Now the field of labor is fairly before us. And let me begin at the most natural place of beginning—i. e., with those things with which we are most conversant, and ascend upwards. Let me commence my train of thoughts with the objects which lie immediately within our scope of vision, and gradually rise to those objects which are more distant and expansive. Take the landscape lying before us, of which we form a part of the objects it contains—the hills rising up on the right hand and the left, the extended plains, the mountains, the valleys, the forests, the rivers, the lakes, and those portions of the ocean which lie within the range of the natural eye. But how small a part is all this in comparison to the great pavement of this earth's surface upon which we and such a countless hoard of living creatures are congregated! The beautiful landscape forms a very inconsiderable speck compared with the whole range of mountains and valleys—the hills and forests, the expansive lakes, seas and oceans, and the mighty continents and islands which constitute this terraqueous globe. Were we to take one landscape for a better comparison, and a pretty extensive one too, for our present purpose, and it would be requisite that more than nine hundred thousand such as we generally behold, should pass in review, before we should be prepared to form any thing like a just comparison of the bulk of the whole earth. And I am constrained to believe that very few persons are capable of forming at one conception, an idea comprehensive enough, to take in the superficial extent of the globe on which we tread, the surface of which contains no less than one hundred and ninety-seven millions of square miles. This is truly an extended and almost inconceivable surface, spread out before our eyes.

But great as this earth's surface may appear in the eyes of those frail beings that inhabit it, when compared with some of the planetary bodies of our system, it is but an inconsiderable space. Within the ascertained dimensions of one of those bodies which float through the fields of space, nine hundred globes as large as the earth, might be placed—with in another, fourteen hundred might be laid; and were five hundred globes as large as this on which we dwell, stretched out upon the vast plain, formed by the outmost ring of the planet Saturn, which is six hundred and forty-three thousand miles in circumference, all might be contained thereon.—Such are the vast dimensions of some of those revolving bodies, which only appear to the naked eye like some small, lucid spark hung up in the concave of the sky. This earth and all the huge planets and satellites comprised within the range of the solar system, bear but a small proportion to the magnificent luminary which shines upon us from day to day. The Sun is five hundred times larger than the whole, and is capable of containing within its circumference, thirteen hundred thousand worlds as large as the earth. How inconceivable to the human mind is such a structure, considered with reference to its magnitude! Suppose we were to attempt to contemplate the variety of scenery presented, or which might be presented, by this great luminary, and although a landscape of five thousand miles in extent should pass before us in each successive hour, yet a period of more than fifty thousand years would be requisite. No adequate conception can be formed by the human mind, with all its vigorous efforts—its utmost stretch of fancy, and its boldest flight on the wings of imagination, of a globe so stupendous and expansive. It is of itself a kind of universe, and would require ten thousand years ere one half of its hidden wonders could be explored. The space which measures life to mortals here, would have to be multiplied full twenty times, ere all of its buried treasures could be revealed. What a grand idea does it present of the might of the Deity, and the amazing power of the Almighty! It is an august type of the great Creator "who dwells in light inaccessible and full of glory." In its lustre, its magnitude, its boundless influence, and its beneficent effects upon distant worlds, it exhibits, perhaps, more than any other single object, the bright display of Divine perfection, and the boundlessness of his nature.

RELIGION vs. INSANITY.

Br. Grosh—As our place has recently been visited by what the "orthodox" are pleased to term a Revival, I propose to state a few facts, that your readers may judge what kind of a revival it is. As is usual, prayer meetings were appointed throughout the bounds of the society* for the warming up of the old ones, before their Lord made the intended visit. At last all was got in readiness, the word was given and the seige commenced. In the first place, the citadel of "Universal Love" must be stormed, and the standard of ceaseless war planted upon the ruins. This was done in the usual manner, but mostly by using the 24th and 25th chapters of Matthew, and other corresponding passages, to prove a final judgment in another world.

We have had a number of preachers from adjoining societies to aid in the good (!) work, and we have had quite as many different descriptions of the location and condition of hell; some figurative and some literal. But all confessed their inability to describe the inconceivable anguish that awaited the sinner in another world. One Rev. gentleman represented it in all the glowing colors of a boundless sea of fire, where the damned spirits of the finally impenitent will topple down, down the interminable abyss of eternity, amid the horrific shouts of infernal fiends—there, while the ceaseless ages of eternity roll on, the sensual passions will be let loose, and instead of reformation, the weight of their sins will increase and sink them deeper and deeper in guilt and consequent misery, till time shall be no more. And the wail of the damned in hell, will be met by the shouts of joy from the saints in heaven, and infernal fiends will shout for joy at their reception.

Thus did this most awe-ful, holy man pour forth his strain of eloquence until his object was accomplished—the organs of superstitious fear were excited, and the minds of a part of his hearers were prepared for another speaker in a different strain, exciting the organs of veneration, benevolence, etc., until the meeting had more the appearance of Beelzebub's court than a religious meeting.

But what has all this amounted to? Why, some few new converts or proselytes have been gained among the more credulous; and they generally admit that they are almost totally ignorant of what is taught in the Bible. And a number of the old members have been "born over again," for, perhaps, the seventh time!

Here would I stop. But this is not all. I have the painful and certain knowledge of one fatal case of insanity, which these fanatics themselves acknowledge was caused by this excitement. A respectable and truly worthy citizen, named Jabez Clark, (aged 52,) became a raving maniac under the above mentioned preaching. He lingered but a few days—scarcely two weeks. I am credibly informed that he did not exhibit one rational act after the excitement. I have just returned from his funeral. The preacher said he had gone to heaven, as he had been born again. But I would ask, born of what? And as it is said there is no change after death; whither has he gone?—to heaven?—and a maniac! Oh consistency, what horrid fables have assumed thy name. JOHN A. McNEIL.

DEATHS.

In Sennett, March 19th, of consumption, Mrs. MARIA BARNES, aged 44 years. The deceased departed out of life, resigned to the will of God and strong in the faith of the Restitution. May the blessed effects of the Gospel be felt by the mourners. G. W. M.

In the town of Arcadia, on the 27th ult., Miss LUCRETIA SMITH, daughter of Mr. Jeremiah Smith, aged 21 years.

The deceased was a member of the Universalist church of this village, and partook of its communion a few days previous to her departure. To an enlarged and enlightened mind, she added a sweetness, devoutness, and amiability of disposition, rarely surpassed by her own tender sex. She was a devoted, practical Christian, loving God supremely, and adorning the beautiful graces of the Gospel. She endured her afflictions without a murmur, taking refuge amid her sufferings, in the assurance that God loved her and all mankind; that he "doth not afflict willingly,"—that he chastens us for our own profiting—and "though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies."

She was told that Universalists were very wicked people, and their doctrine delusive, heretical, corrupting, insufficient, and unfit for the dying hour. The story was told that her favorite church and society in Newark were nearly all converted at the protracted meeting of the Methodists of this village—and their Pastor under such concern of mind that hopes were entertained of his conversion to another faith. To all these representations and entreaties, she replied that she believed that all men would be pure and happy in the immortal world—that she could find no other doctrine than this taught in the Bible—that it gave her such love for God and the Saviour, and such an interest and joy in religion as she never felt before—that it sustained her in her sufferings—that her faith grew more strong, and bright, and beautiful, as she saw the grave opening to receive her;—and she could look forward with an exulting spirit to the glory that would be given her when she should stand among the angels of her Father. She died in this blessed faith, with a rejoicing and triumph, that could have put forth the mighty challenge—"O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"—Wayne Standard. D. K. L.

In Almond, Allegany county, October 10th, 1841, LOVICY, daughter of Henry and Lovicy Lewis, in the 9th year of her age. The disease that deprived our brother and sister of their only daughter, was the scrofula; after which the consumption seized and terminated her mortal being.

Her surviving friends mourn not as those without hope. As no preacher of the restitution could be obtained, the funeral sermon was not preached until Oct. 23d, 1842, when the writer tendered the consolations of the Gospel to the mourning friends and sympathetic neighbors in the Baptist church of West Almond. G. S. GOWDY.

In Mexico, March 17th, Mrs. MATILDA HAMILTON, in the 30th year of her age. By this appointment of Providence, Br. Hamilton is called to mourn his loss in the departure of the second sharer of his cup of life. He sorrows not, however, as those who have no hope; for he looks forward by an eye of steadfast faith, to that period in the designs of our God when all tears shall be wiped from all faces—when friends shall again greet each other, when "Christ's own soft hand shall wipe the tears

From every weeping eye,
And pains, and groans, and griefs, and fears,
And death itself shall die."

Sister Hamilton, though a steadfast and zealous believer in the great salvation, and since the commencement of the present year, a worthy member of our society, was retained in regular fellowship in the Methodist church in this village. Her request of a letter of dismission from that church, though it was acknowledged just and reasonable, was denied, upon the ground that: a visit from the pastor would probably supercede the necessity of writing one, till she felt it her duty to present herself for membership to our society, where she was cordially welcomed to a home.

It was her request that none of the houses of worship should be solicited for the purpose of attending her funeral services; but the one owned by the Presbyterians being asked, was denied, saying, "they could not consent that Universalism should be preached in a house dedicated to the worship of God." Hence we repaired, as usual, to the school house, which, notwithstanding the almost impassable state of the roads, was filled with attentive hearers, who listened to the writer's consolatory message, on the 19th.

It is proper to notice in this public manner, a slanderous story that has been put in circulation by a brother of the deceased, declaring that she renounced her faith in a world's salvation before her death. This story seems to be based upon a foundation even less substantial than sand. During her severe paroxysms of pain, she frequently ejaculated, as expressive of her intense pain, "mercy, mercy!"—which is now made to denote that she was troubled about her future welfare. But even this barely supposable idea is greatly robbed of its speciousness by the fact, that these expressions, upon which so much reliance is now placed, were as frequently used while she steadfastly avowed her belief in the restitution; and, also, during the evening in which she is said to have renounced, she was so far dispossessed of the proper use of her mental faculties, that she was unable to recognize her own brother and his wife! Let the candid decide whether even credulity itself could credit such a story, under such circumstances, except by the powerful aid of prejudice. H. VAN CAMPEN.

In Greenfield, March 10th, WARREN HOWE, son of Samuel and Polly Gregory, aged 12 years, 5 months and 12 days. The deceased was truly a promising child; and early gave evidence of a mind rarely possessed by one of his years. His resignation to God's will in his struggles with death, was perfect. He expressed a desire to live if it was the will of his Maker; if not, to die. And he literally repeated the sentiment contained in the prayer of our Lord—"Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not my will, but thine, be done."

He chose a particular spot for his final resting place, beside the remains of a little sister. He made his will, distributing his few effects amongst the members of the family. He told his weeping friends not to mourn for him, and with a tranquillity and resignation seldom witnessed in maturer life, he gave to all the farewell hand, the parting kiss; and with the confident assurance of a better world, his spirit fled to the fold of Heaven. "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not."

His funeral was attended in the Universalist church on 12th; sermon from St. Luke xxii: 41, 42, by

POLLY GRAY AND THE DOCTORS.

BY SEBA SMITH.

It was a dark, rainy night in June, when Deacon Gray, about ten o'clock in the evening, drove his horse and wagon up to the door, on his return from market.

"Oh dear, Mr. Gray," exclaimed his wife, as she met him at the door, "I'm dreadful glad you've come; Polly's so sick, I'm afraid she won't live 'till mornin', if something ain't done for her."

"Polly is always ailing," said the deacon deliberately; "I guess it's only some of her old aches and pains.— Jest take this box of sugar in; I've been setting on it this hour to keep the rain off."

"Well, do come right in, Mr. Gray, for you don't know what a desput case she is in; I dare n't leave her a minute."

"You are always scared half to death," said the deacon, "if anything ails Polly; but you know she always gets over it again. Here's coffee and tea and some other notions rolled up in this bag," handing her another bundle to carry into the house.

"Well, but Mr. Gray, don't pray stop for bundles nor nothin' else. You must go right over after Doctor Longley, and get him here as quick as you can."

"Oh, if it's only Doctor Longley she wants," said the deacon carelessly, "I guess she ain't so dangerous, after all."

"Now, Mr. Gray, jest because Doctor Longley is a young man, and about Polly's age, that you should make such an unfeelin' expression as that, I think is too bad."

The deacon turned away without making any reply, and began to remove the harness from the horse.

"Mr. Gray, ain't you going after the doctor?" said Mrs. Gray, with increasing impatience.

"I'm a going to turn the horse into the pasture, and then I'll come in and see about it," said the deacon.

A loud groan from Polly drew Mrs. Gray hastily into the house. The deacon led his horse a quarter of a mile to the pasture; let down the bars and turned him in; put all the bars carefully up; hunted round and found a stick to drive in as a wedge to fasten the top bar; went round the barn to see that the doors were all closed; got an armful of dry straw and threw it into the pig-pen; called the dog from his kennel, patted him on his head, and went into the house.

"I'm afraid she's dying," said Mrs. Gray, as the deacon entered.

"You are always scared half out of your wits," said the deacon, "if there's anything the matter. I'll come in as soon as I've took off my coat and boots and put on some dry ones."

Mrs. Gray ran back to attend upon Polly; but before the deacon had got ready to enter the room, Mrs. Gray screamed again with the whole strength of her lungs,

"Mr. Gray, Mr. Gray, do make haste, she's in a fit."

This was the first sound that had given the deacon any uneasiness about the matter. He had been accustomed for years to hear his wife "worry" about Polly, and had heard her predict her death so often from very slight illness, that he had come to regard such scenes and such predictions with as little attention as he did the rain that pattered against the window. But the word fit was something he had never heard applied in these cases before, and the sound of it gave him a strange feeling of apprehension. He had just thrown off his boots and put his feet into dry shoes, and held a dry coat in his hand, when this last appeal came to his ear and caused him actually to hasten into the room.

"Polly, what's the matter now?" said the deacon, beginning to be somewhat agitated, as he approached the bedside.

Polly was in violent spasms, and heeded not the inquiry. The deacon took hold of her arm, and repeated the question more earnestly and in a tender tone.

"You may as well speak to the dead," said Mrs. Gray; "she's past hearing or speaking."

The deacon's eyes look wild and his face grow very long.

"Why didn't you tell me how sick she was when I first got home?" said the deacon, with a look of rebuke.

"I did tell you when you first come home," said Mrs. Gray, sharply, "and you didn't take no notice on it."

"You didn't tell me anything about how sick she was," said the deacon; "you only spoke jest as you used to, when she wasn't hardly sick at all."

The subject here seemed to subside by mutual consent, and both stood with their eyes fixed on Polly, who was apparently struggling in the fierce agonies of death. In a few minutes however she came out of the spasms, breathed comparatively easy, and lay perfectly quiet. The deacon spoke to her again. She looked up with a wild, delirious look, but made no answer.

"I'll go for the doctor," said the deacon, "it may be he can do something for her, though she looks to me as though it was a gone goose with her."

Saying this, he put on his hat and coat and started.— Having half a mile to go, and finding the doctor in bed, it was half an hour before he returned with Dr. Longley in his company. In the meantime Mrs. Gray had called in old Mrs. Livermore who lived in the next door, and they had lifted Polly up and put a clean pillow upon the bed, and a clean cap on her head, and had been round and "slicked up" the room a little, for Mrs. Livermore said, "Doctor Longley was such a nice man, she always loved to see things look tidy where he was coming to."

The deacon came in and hung his hat up behind the door, and Doctor Longley followed with his hat in his hand and a small pair of saddle-bags on his arm. Mrs. Gray stood at one side of the bed, and Mrs. Livermore at the other, and the doctor laid his hat and saddle-bags on the table that stood by the window, and stepped immediately to the bedside.

"Miss Gray, are you sick?" said the doctor, taking the hand of the patient.

No answer or look from the patient gave any indication that she had heard the question.

"How long has she been ill?" said the doctor.

"Ever since mornin'," said Mrs. Gray. "She got up with a headache, jest after her father went away to market, and smart pains inside, and she's been growin' worse all day."

"And what have you given her?" said the doctor.

"Nothing, but arb-drink," said Mrs. Gray; "when-ever she felt worse, I made her take a good deal of arb-drink, because that, you know, is always good, doctor. And besides, when it can't do no good, it would do no hurt."

"But what sort of drinks have you given her?" said the doctor.

"Well, I gave her most all sorts, for we had a plenty of 'em in the house," said Mrs. Gray. "I give her sage, and peppermint, and sparmint, and cammermile, and pennyryal, and motherwort, and balm; you know, balm is very coolin', doctor, and sometimes she'd be very hot, and then I'd make her drink a good dose of balm."

"Give me a candle," said the doctor.

The deacon brought a candle and held it over the patient's head. The doctor opened her mouth and examined it carefully for the space of a minute. He felt her pulse another minute, and looked again into her mouth.

"Low pulse, but heavy and labored respiration," said the doctor.

"What do you think ails her?" said Mrs. Gray.

The doctor shook his head.

"Do you think you can give her any thing to help her?" said the deacon anxiously.

The doctor looked very grave, and fixed his eyes thoughtfully on the patient for a minute, but made no reply to the deacon's question.

"Why didn't you send for me sooner?" at last said the doctor, turning to Mrs. Gray.

"Because I thought may be the arb-drink would help her, and so I kept trying it all day till it got to be dark, and then she got to be so bad I didn't dare to leave her till Mr. Gray got home."

"It's a great pity," said the doctor, turning from the bed to the table and opening his saddle-bags. "Thousands and thousands of lives are lost only by delaying to send for medical advice till it is too late; thousands that might have been saved as well as not, if only taken in season."

"But, doctor, you don't think it's too late for Polly, do you?" said Mrs. Gray.

"I think her case, to say the least, is extremely doubtful," said the doctor. "Her appearance is very remarkable. Whatever her disease is, it has made such progress, and life is so nearly extinct, that it is impossible to tell what were the original symptoms, and consequently what applications are best to be made."

"Well, now doctor," said old Mrs. Livermore, "excuse me for speakin'; but I'm a good deal older than you are, and have seen a great deal of sickness in my day, and I've been here with Polly a number of times to-day, and some time this evening, and I'm satisfied, doctor, there's something the matter of her insides."

"Undoubtedly," said the doctor, looking very grave. This new hint from Mrs. Livermore seemed to give Mrs. Gray new hope, and she appealed again to the doctor.

"Well, now doctor," said she, "don't you think Mrs. Livermore has the right of it?"

"Most unquestionably," said the doctor.

"Well, then, doctor, if you should give her something that's pretty powerful to operate inwardly, don't you think it might help her?"

"It might, and it might not," said the doctor; "the powers of life are so nearly exhausted, I must tell you frankly I have very little hope of being able to rally them. There is not life enough left to indicate the disease or show the remedies that are wanted. Applications must now be made entirely in the dark, and leave the effect to chance."

At this, Mrs. Livermore took the candle and was proceeding to remove it from the room, when the doctor, perceiving her mistake, called her back. He did not mean to administer the medicine literally in a dark room, but simply in a state of darkness and ignorance as to the nature of the disease. It was a very strange case; it was certain life could hold out but a short time longer; he felt bound to do something, and therefore proceeded to prepare such applications and remedies as his best judgment dictated. These were administered without confidence, and their effect awaited with painful solicitude. They either produced no perceptible effect at all or very different from the ordinary results of such applications.

"I should like," said Doctor Longley to the deacon, "to have you call in Doctor Stubbs; this is a very extraordinary case, and I should prefer that some other medical practitioner might be present."

The deacon accordingly hastened to call Dr. Stubbs, a young man who had come into the place a short time before, with a high reputation, but not a favorite with the deacon and his family, on account of his being rather fresh from college and full of modern innovations.

After Dr. Stubbs had examined the patient, and made various inquiries of the family, he and Dr. Longley held a brief consultation. Their united wisdom, however, was not sufficient to throw any light upon the case or to afford any relief.

"Have you thought of poison?" said Dr. Longley.

"Yes," said Dr. Stubbs, "but there are certain indications in the case, which forbid that idea altogether. Indeed, I can form no satisfactory opinion about it; it is the most anomalous case I ever knew."

Before their conference was brought to a close, the deacon called them, saying he believed Polly was a going. They came into the room and hastened to the bedside.

"Yes," said Dr. Stubbs, looking at the patient, "those are dying struggles; in a short time all her troubles in this life will be over."

The patient sunk gradually and quietly away, and in the course of two hours after the arrival of Dr. Stubbs, all signs of life were gone.

"The Lord's will be done," said the deacon, as he stood by the bed and saw her chest heave for the last time.

Mrs. Gray sat in the corner of the room with her apron to her face weeping aloud. Old Mrs. Livermore and two other females, who had been called in during the night, were already busily employed in preparing for laying out the corpse.

It was about daybreak when the two doctors left the house and started for home.

"Very singular case," said Dr. Stubbs, who spoke with more ease and freedom, now that they were out of the way of the afflicted family. "We ought not to give it up so, doctor; we ought to follow this case up till we ascertain what was the cause of her death. What say you to a post mortem examination?"

"I always dislike them," said Doctor Longley; "they are ugly, uncomfortable jobs; and besides, I doubt whether the deacon's folks would consent to it."

"It is important for us, as well as for the cause of the science," said Dr. Stubbs, "that something should be done about it. We are both young, and it may have an injurious bearing upon our reputation if we are not able to give any explanation of the case. I consider my reputation at stake as well as yours, as I was called in for consultation. There will doubtless be a hundred rumors afloat, and the older physicians, who look upon us, you know, with rather an evil eye, will be pretty sure to lay hold of the matter and turn it greatly to our disadvantage, if we can not show facts for our vindication. The deacon's folks must consent, and you had better go down after breakfast and have a talk with the deacon about it."

Doctor Longley felt the force of the reasoning and consented to go. Accordingly, after breakfast, he returned to Deacon Gray's, and kindly offered his services, if there was any assistance he could render in making preparations for the funeral. The deacon felt much obliged to him, but didn't know as there was anything for which they particularly needed his assistance. The doctor then broached the subject of the very sudden and singular death of Polly, and how important it was for the living that the causes of such a sudden death should, if possible, be ascertained, and delicately hinted that the only means of obtaining this information, so desirable for the benefit of the science and so valuable for all living, was by opening and examining the body after death.

At this the deacon looked up at him with such an awful expression of holy horror, that the doctor saw at once it would be altogether useless to pursue the subject further. Accordingly after advising, on account of the warm weather and the patient dying suddenly and in full blood, not to postpone the funeral later than that afternoon, the doctor took his leave.

"Well, what is the result?" said Dr. Stubbs, as Dr. Longley entered his door.

"Oh, as I expected," said Dr. Longley. "The moment I hinted at the subject to the deacon, I saw by his looks, if it were to save his own life and the lives of all his friends, he never would consent to it."

"Well, 'tis astonishing," said Dr. Stubbs, "that people who have common sense should have so little sense on a subject of this kind. I won't be baffled so, Dr. Longley; I'll tell you what I'll do. What time is she to be buried?"

"This afternoon," said Dr. Longley.

"In the burying ground by the old meeting house up the road, I suppose," said Dr. Stubbs.

"Yes, undoubtedly," replied Dr. Longley.

"Well, I'll have that corpse taken up this night, and you may depend upon it," said Dr. Stubbs. "I'll not only ascertain the cause of her death, but I want a subject for dissection, and she having died so suddenly will make an excellent one."

Dr. Longley shuddered a little at the bold project of Dr. Stubbs. "You know, doctor, there is a law against it," said he, "and besides, the burying ground is in such a lonely place and surrounded by woods, I don't believe you can find anybody with nerve enough to go there and take a newly buried corpse in the night."

"Let me alone for that," said Dr. Stubbs. "I know a chap that would do it every night in the week if I wanted him to; a friend of mine down there in the college, in the senior class. He has nerve enough to go anywhere, and is up to a job of this kind at any time. The business is all arranged, doctor, and I shall go through with it. Joe Palmer is the man for it, and Rufus Barnes will go with him. I'd go myself, but it would be more prudent for me to be at home, for in case of accident, and the thing should be discovered, suspicion would be likely to fall on me, and it would be important for me to be able to prove where I was. Rufus must go the funeral and see whereabouts the corpse is buried, so he can find the place in a dark night, and I shall have to go down to the college the first of the evening after Joe myself, and get him started, and then come right home, and stay at home, so that I can prove an alibi in case of any question. Don't I understand it, doctor?"

"Yes, full well enough," said Dr. Longley, "but I had rather you would be in the scrape than I should."

That evening, half an hour after dark, there was a light rap at Joe Palmer's door in the third story of one of the college buildings. The door was partly open, and Joe said, "come in." No one entered, but in a few moments the rap was heard again. "Come in," said Joe. Still no one entered. Presently a figure, concealed under a cloak and with muffled face, appeared partly before the door, and said something in a low voice. Joe looked wild and agitated. Some college scrape, he thought, but what was the nature of it he could not divine. The figure looked mysterious. Presently the voice was heard again, and understood to utter the word Palmer. Joe was still more agitated, and looked at his chum most inquiringly. His chum stepped to the door and asked what was wanting. The figure drew back into the darkness of the hall, and answered in a faint voice, that he wanted Palmer. At last Palmer screwed his resolution up to the sticking point and ventured as far as the door, while his chum stepped back into the room. The figure again came forward and whispered to Palmer to come out, for he wanted to speak with him.

"But who are you?" said Palmer.

Palmer at once recognized him, and stepped back as bold as a lion, and took his hat and went out. In a few minutes he returned and told his chum, with rather a mysterious air, that he was going out with a friend to be gone two or three hours, that he need not feel uneasy about him, and might leave the door unfastened for him till he returned.

Dr. Stubbs, having given Joe and Rufus full directions how to proceed, telling them to get a large wide chaise, so that they could manage to carry the corpse conveniently, and informing them where they could find spades and shovels deposited by the side of the road for the purpose, left them and hastened home.

"Well now, Rufo," said Joe, "we'll go over to Jake Rider's and get one of his horses and chaise. But we needn't be in a hurry, for we don't want to get there much before midnight; and we'll go into the store here and get a drink of brandy to begin with, for this kind business needs a little stimulus."

Having braced their nerves with a drink of brandy, they proceeded to Jacob Rider's.

"Jake, give us a horse and chaise to take a ride three or four hours," said Joe. "You needn't mind setting up for us; we'll put the horse up when we come back, and take good care of him; we know where to put him. We don't want a nag; an old steady horse that will give us an easy pleasant ride."

"Old Tom is just the horse you want," said Jacob, "and there's a good easy going chaise."

"That chaise isn't wide enough," said Joe; "give us the widest you've got."

"But that's plenty wide enough for two to ride in," said Jacob; "I don't see what you want a wider chaise than that for."

"Oh, I like to have plenty of elbow room," said Joe.

"Maybe you are going to have a lady to ride with you," said Jacob.

Joe laughed, and whispered to Rufus that Jake had hit nearer the mark than he was aware of.

Jacob selected another chaise. "There is one," said he, "wide enough for three to ride in, and even four upon a pinch."

"That'll do," said Joe; "now put in old Tom."

The horse was soon harnessed, and Joe and Rufus jumped in the chaise and drove off.

"Confound these college chaps," said Jacob to himself as they drove out of the yard; "they are always sky-larkin' somewhere or other. There's one thing in it though, they pay me well for my horses. But these two fellows wanting such a broad chaise; they are going to have a real frolic somewhere to-night. I've a plaguy good mind to jump on one of the horses and follow, and see what sort of stuff they are up to. It's so dark I could do it just as well as not, without the least danger of their seeing me."

No sooner thought than done. Jake at once mounted one of his horses, and followed the chaise. There was no moon, and the night was cloudy and dark; but a slight rattle in one of the wheels of the chaise enabled him easily to follow it, though entirely out of sight. Having gone about two miles, the chaise stopped at the corner, about a hundred rods from the house of Doctor Stubbs. Jake got off and hitched his horse, and crept carefully along by the side of the fence, to see what was to be done there. By stooping down and looking up against a clear patch of sky, he could see one of the two leave the chaise and go to the fence by the side of the road, and return again, carrying something in his arms to the chaise. He repeated this operation twice; but what he carried Jake could not discern. Perhaps it might be some baskets of refreshments. They were going off to some house to have a frolic. The chaise moved on again, and Jake mounted his horse and followed. They went up the road till they came to the old meeting house; they passed it a little, and came against the old burying ground. The chaise stopped and Jake stopped. The chaise stood still for the space of about five minutes, and there was not the least sound to be heard in any direction. At last, from the little rattle of the chaise wheel, he perceived that they were moving at a moderate walk. They came to the corner of the burying ground, and turned a little out of the road and stopped the chaise under the shadow of a large spreading tree, where it could not be perceived by any one passing in the road, even should the clouds brush away and leave it starlight.

"It's very odd," thought Jake, "that they should stop at such a place as this in a dark night; the last place in the world I should think of stopping at."

Jake dismounted and hitched his horse a little distance, and crept carefully up to watch the movements. They took something out of the chaise, passed along by the fence, went through the little gate, and entered the burying ground. Here a new light seemed to flash upon Jake's mind.

"I hope no murder has been committed," thought he to himself; "but it's pretty clear something is to be buried here to-night that the world must know nothing about."

Jake was perplexed, and in doubt as to what he should do. He had some conscience, and felt as though he ought to investigate the matter, and put a stop to the business if anything very wicked was going on. But then there were other considerations that weighed on the other side. If murder had been committed, it was within the range of possibility, and not very unreasonable to suppose, that murder might be committed again to conceal it. There were two of them, and he was alone. It might not be entirely safe for him to interfere. He would hardly care to be thrown into a grave and buried there himself that night. And then, again, Jake was avaricious, and wouldn't care to break friends with those college fellows, for they paid him a good deal of money. On the whole, he was resolved to keep quiet and see the end of the matter.

Joe and Rufus walked two-thirds of the way across the burying ground and stopped. Jake followed at a careful distance, and when he found they had stopped, he crept slowly up on the darkest side, so near that, partly by sight and partly by sound, he could discover what took place. There was not a loud word spoken, though he occasionally heard them whisper to each other. Then he heard the sound of shovels and the moving of gravel.

"It is true," said Jake to himself, "they are digging a grave!" and the cold sweat started on his forehead.—Still he resolved to be quiet and see it all through.—Once or twice they stopped and appeared to be listening, as though they thought they heard some noise. Then he could hear them whisper to each other, but could not understand what they said. After they had been digging and throwing out gravel some time, he heard a sound like the light knock of a shovel upon the lid of a coffin.

"Take care," said Joe, in a very loud whisper, "it'll never do to make such a noise as that; it could be heard almost half a mile; do be more careful."

Again they pursued their work, and occasionally a hollow sound like a shovel scraping over a coffin was heard. At length their work of throwing out gravel seemed to be completed; and then there was a pause for some time, interrupted occasionally by sounds of screwing, and wedging, and wrenching; and at last they seemed to be lifting some heavy substance out of the grave. They carried it toward the gate. Jake was lying almost upon the ground, and as they passed near him, he could perceive they were carrying some white object about the length and size of a corpse. They went out at the gate and round to the chaise; and presently they returned again, and appeared by their motions and the sound to be filling up the grave. Jake took this opportunity to go and examine the chaise; and sure enough he found there a full-sized corpse, wrapped in a white sheet, lying in the centre of the chaise, the feet resting on the floor, the body leaning across the seat, and the head resting against the centre of the back part of the chaise.

"Only some scrape of the Doctor's, after all," said Jake to himself, who now began to breathe somewhat easier than he had done for some time past. "But it's rather shameful business, though: this must be Deacon Gray's daughter, I'm sure; and it's a shame to treat the old man in this shabby kind of way. I'll put a stop to this, anyhow. Polly Gray was too good a sort of a gal to be chopped up like a quarter of beef, according to my way of thinking, and it shan't be."

Jake then lifted the corpse out of the chaise, carried it a few rods farther from the road, laid it down, took off the winding sheet, wrapped it carefully round himself, went back and got into the chaise, and placed himself exactly in the position in which the corpse had been left. He had remained in that situation but a short time before Joe and Rufus, having filled up the grave and made all right there, came and seated themselves in the chaise, one on each side of the corpse, and drove slowly and quietly off.

"I'm glad it's over," said Rufus, fetching a long breath. "My heart's been in my mouth the whole time, I thought I heard somebody coming half a dozen times; and then it's such a dismal, gloomy place too. You wouldn't catch me there again, in such a scrape, I can tell you."

"Well, I was calm as clock-work the whole time," said Joe. "You should have such pluck as I've got, Rufus; nothing ever frightens me."

At that moment the chaise wheel struck a stone, and caused the corpse to roll suddenly against Joe. He clapped up his hand to push it a little back, and instead of a cold clammy corpse, he felt his hand pressed against a warm face of live flesh. As quick as though he had been struck by lightning, Joe dropped the reins, and with one bound sprang a rod from the chaise and ran for his life. Rufus, without knowing the cause of this strange and sudden movement, sprang from the other side with almost equal agility, and followed Joe with his utmost speed. They scarcely stopped to take breath till they had run two miles and got into Joe's room at the college, and shut the door and locked themselves in. Here, having sworn Joe's chum to secrecy, they began to discuss the matter. But concerning the very strange warmth of the corpse they could come to no satisfactory conclusion. Whether it could be, that they had not actually taken up the corpse from the grave, but before they had got down to it some evil spirit had come in the shape of the corpse and deceived them, or whether it was actually the corpse, and it had come to life, or whether it was the ghost of Polly Gray, were questions they could not decide. They agreed, however, to go the next morning by sunrise on to the ground, and see what discoveries they could make.

When Jacob Rider found himself alone in the chaise, being convinced that Joe and Rufus would not come back to trouble him that night, he turned and drove back to the burying ground.

"Now," said Jake, "I think the best thing I can do, for all concerned, is to put Polly Gray back where she belongs, and there let her rest."

Accordingly Jake went to work and opened the grave again, carried the corpse and replaced it as well as he could, and filled up the grave and rounded it off in good order. He then took his horses and chaise and returned home, well satisfied with his night's work.

The next morning, some time before sunrise, and before any one was stirring in the neighborhood, Joe and Rufus were at the old burying ground. They went round the inclosure, went to the tree where they had fastened the horse, and looked on every side, but discovered nothing. They went through the gate, and across to the grave which they opened or thought they had opened the night before. The grave looked all right, as though it had not been touched since the funeral. They could see nothing of the horse or chaise, and they concluded if the corpse, or the evil spirit, or whatever it was in the chaise, had left the horse to himself, he probably found his way directly home. They thought it best therefore immediately to go and see Jake, and make some kind of an explanation. So they went over early to Jake's stable, and found the horse safe in the stall. Presently Jake made his appearance.

"Well, your confounded old horse," said Joe, "wouldn't stay hitched last night. He left us in the lurch, and we had to come home afoot. I see he's come home, though. Chaise all right, I hope."

"Yes, all right," said Jake.

"Well, how much for the ride," said Joe, "seeing we didn't ride but one way?"

"Seeing you rode part way back," said Jake, "I shall charge you fifty dollars."

Joe started and looked round, but a knowing leer in Jake's eye convinced him it was no joke. He handed Jake the fifty dollars, at the same time placing his finger emphatically across his lips; and Jake took the fifty dollars, whispering in Joe's ear, "dead folks tell no tales." Jake then put his finger across his lips, and Joe and Rufus bade him good morning.

THE RESTITUTION....NO. I.

My object is, to consider the proof in favor of the Restitution, drawn from certain passages of Scripture; as that proof was developed to the mind of the Rev. Walter Balfour, at the time of his conversion.

Br. Balfour was a Scotch preacher, and for many years a strong believer and proclaimer of endless misery. In 1819, for the first time, his faith became shaken by the following circumstances. In that year, there was a written discussion between Professor Stuart, of Andover College, and the Rev. Doct. Channing, of the Unitarian denomination, concerning the Trinity—Professor Stuart being for it, and Doct. Channing against it. One prominent point which Professor Stuart endeavored to establish, was, that the whole universe shall render homage to the Saviour, and consequently, that to receive universal homage, the Saviour must have been, or is, God.—That universal homage will thus be rendered, he proved in this way:—After quoting Phil. ii: 9, 10, 11, he says —"Things in heaven, earth, and under the earth, is a common periphrasis of the Hebrew and New Testament writers, for the universe....What can be meant by things in heaven, i. e. beings in heaven, bowing the knee to Jesus, if spiritual worship be not meant? And if the worship of Christ in heaven be spiritual, should not that of others, who ought to be in temper united with them, be spiritual also?" After quoting Rev. v: 14, which reads thus:—"And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever"—he says:—"If this be not spiritual worship, and if Christ be not the object of it here; I am unable to produce a case, where worship can be called spiritual and divine."

He thus conclusively proved, 1. That things in heaven, on the earth, and under the earth, embrace the universe; or in other words, embrace every being in those three places; and 2. That all those beings should render spiritual worship to the Saviour.

Let us now discover how these facts affected the mind of Br. Balfour. In the first letter which he addressed to Professor Stuart, he says:—"Upon reading" (your comments,) "the following ideas rushed into my mind with much violence.—Things in heaven, earth, and under the earth, is a periphrasis for the universe; this universe worships Christ with spiritual and divine worship, and yet Mr. Stuart believes that many in this very universe, are to be punished in hell forever." Again he says:—"Neither can I, nor am I disposed to dispute that the worship spoken of in the texts quoted by you, is spiritual worship. So sure you are of this, that you say, 'if this be not spiritual worship, I am unable to produce a case, where worship can be called spiritual and divine.' Now, my dear Sir, if it be true, that things in heaven, earth, and under the earth, is a common periphrasis for the universe; and if it also be true, that this worship is spiritual and divine, you certainly have told us, that the universe is to worship Christ with spiritual and divine worship. The worship is spiritual and divine, and the universe are the worshippers." From these facts, he deduced this question:—"Is it, or can it be believed by any one, that any beings in the universe, who worship Christ, thus, shall be punished forever?"

These things he constantly reflected about, and he powerfully applied the conclusions to which Professor Stuart had arrived, to many clear passages of Scripture, and in a series of strong, argumentative letters, he presented the result of his labors to the Professor. Those letters were never answered. The end of it was, that, after a long and patient examination of the Scriptures, Br. Balfour became convinced that the doctrine of endless misery was false, and heartily embraced the Restitution, which he continues to proclaim at the present day, with a growing conviction of its truth.

The propositions advanced by Professor Stuart, are demonstrative of the reconciliation of the world. For he explains the phrase "things in heaven, earth, and under the earth," as embracing the entire universe of rational beings. He then proves, that this entire universe of rational beings will render spiritual and divine worship to the Saviour. Hence, it conclusively follows, that this universe of rational beings must ultimately be holy and happy—for can any other than a holy and happy being render spiritual and divine worship to the Saviour?—Could an individual, full of sin, disobedience and rebellion, offer true worship to the Saviour? Surely not; for worship from such a person, would be mere mockery. If the worship is spiritual and divine, the person must be sincere—and if sincere, that person must of course be in a state of reconciliation. Our Saviour quoting a prophecy from Isaiah, and applying it to the Jews, said to them:—"This people draweth nigh unto me with their mouth, and honoreth me with their lips; but their heart is far from me. But in vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." Mat. xv: 8, 9. Here the Saviour reproaches the Jews for offering a worship in which their hearts were not engaged, and which, instead of being spiritual and divine, was hypocritical. But the Professor has demonstrated, that the whole rational universe shall offer spiritual and divine worship to the Saviour, which must come from the best affections of the soul; and therefore, the entire universe must, at some future period, be holy and happy.

Let us apply these facts to certain passages of Scripture, and we shall at once discover how strongly and decidedly they sustain the doctrine of the final Reconciliation. G. W. M.

QUESTIONS ON THE RESURRECTION.

I wish to ask you a few questions, which I would like to have answered through the Magazine and Advocate.

1. Did the spirits of those who died before the resurrection of Christ, "go to God who gave them?" If so, how has Christ "become the first fruits of them that slept?" and how would they "which had fallen asleep in Christ have perished?"

2. If the spirits of those who died before the resurrection of Christ did not go to "God who gave them," how does it come that Solomon said they did? Eccl. xii: 7. And if they did not go to God who gave them, where did they go to?

Yours very respectfully, L. W.

REMARKS.—The above came appended to a business letter to Grosh and Walker—from a young man who is undoubtedly sincere in his inquiries, and apparently confused in his ideas on the subject, conceiving the two positions stated by Solomon and Paul to be contradictory. I have not time to answer the question fully, and prefer that some of our correspondents should do so; but for the present satisfaction of L. W., I would state that among all who hold to the different opinions that prevail among Universalists, there is no class that would find any difficulty in reconciling the two positions. For instance—those who hold to the sleep of the soul at death, would reconcile Solomon's declaration, by supposing that "the spirit" does not mean the conscious thinking principle in man, but the breath—and thus all apparent contradiction is harmonized. Those who hold to the conscious existence of the soul at and after death, whether in an intermediate state or not, would call Jesus the chief or principal fruits of them that slept—an interpretation which the original will well bear; for he is called "the beginning (or chief) of the creation of God," in the same sense—and would say that those who have died in hope of a resurrection from the dead by the agency of Jesus, would not be raised thus (would perish) if indeed Christ was not raised, and if the dead rise not?

From this very brief view of both sides of the subject, L. W. will see that his difficulty consists in understanding the language used by Solomon to mean the immortal conscious part of man, and then understanding Paul to declare that man would have utterly ceased to exist at death, had not Jesus been raised from the dead. The language of neither Solomon nor Paul is at fault, but his construction of them. Neither theory of a future existence acknowledges what contradicts it in the opposite theory; but resorting to a different construction of the language, both are enabled to harmonize the declarations of Solomon and Paul. Which is the correct construction, and which the more Scriptural theory, we leave to L. W. to decide; but of one thing he may rest assured, the contradictory portions of both can not both be true—while the doctrine of a future immortal existence, held by both, is undoubtedly the teaching of Revelation. "A REPLY to Rev. J. B. Walker's Short and Easy Method with Universalists." By Rev. J. A. Gurley.

This is a 12mo pamphlet of 62 pages, for which we are indebted, we suppose, to the author, the Editor of the Star in the West, of Cincinnati. It is a searching expose of the misrepresentations, slanders and sophistry of Mr. Walker's Tract, and deservedly and ingeniously turns the tables upon him and his denomination, by proving them guilty of the very things they groundlessly charge against us. As Mr. Walker's pamphlet is being extensively circulated in Ohio and the adjacent States, we hope our friends in that region will supply themselves well with this cheap and able reply to it, and send the antidote wherever the bane may circulate.

To CORRESPONDENTS.—J. C. C. sent us a letter dated "Catharine, Chemung county, N. Y., March 2d, 1843," but mailed at "Moreland, N. Y., March 8th," in which he requests our advice, but does not inform us where to address our reply. We have been unable to attend to his letter until now, and did not therefore notice the difficulty.

Br. Ozman is informed there is nothing due except on current volume. Obituary next week.

Will our friends who do not wish to preserve their papers for file or binding, return to us No. 2, dated January 13th, 1843? We are out of that No.

Consequently, in order to make out full sets of current volume to new subscribers, who may want the back numbers, we shall be obliged to replace No. 2 of current volume, with the same No. of some former volume. We think this need make but little difference, as the contents of that number, had no special connection with the preceding or following numbers, while the matter contained in the number substituted, will be new to the subscriber.

We shall hereafter send from the commencement of the second quarter, (1st of April,) to new subscribers, unless the back numbers are requested. Will our agents be particular to inform us in this respect?

REMOVAL.—Br. H. B. Soule having received and accepted an invitation to settle as the pastor of the Universalist society in this city, has removed here from Clinton, and wishes to be addressed at Utica hereafter. Br. Price will please notice. A. B. G.

PIERRE LANDAIS; or THE TAILOR OF BRITTANY. A historical tale of the fifteenth century. Translated from the French, by Miss M. E. Walley.

Seldom is there found any work of fiction, of which it can be more truly said that the interest is effectively sustained from first to last, than that of "Pierre Landais." It is full of dramatic points and situations; and there is no tragedy, having possession of the stage, which is superior in this respect. It is the story of a man, who, born in the humblest condition of life, raised himself to the highest rank in an aristocratic State; and there are few historical characters, brought into the romances of Scott, James and Bulwer, more imposing and more remarkable.

PROSPECTUS OF A NEW FAMILY PRAYER BOOK.

BY OTIS A. SKINNER.

THE value of a Prayer Book, as an aid in the devotional exercises of a family, has long been acknowledged by Christians of all sects. There are but few capable of leading in daily and religious exercises, without falling into a sameness which is tiresome, and calculated to destroy that interest necessary to make such exercises useful. Many neglect family prayer on this account. Others are wanting in the gift of prayer, and are actually incompetent to perform the service in a manner calculated to benefit the heart, or give efficacy to religion. And others are wanting in confidence, and dare not attempt the performance of a duty which they feel binding upon them, and the neglect of which is a cause of painful reflection. A Prayer Book obviates all these difficulties. But not only does it obviate these—it also aids those who feel competent to lead daily in extemporaneous family prayer. It gives a variety of topics, forms and expressions, which will greatly enrich their prayers, and be an effectual guard against sameness.

Prompted by a consideration of these advantages, and feeling deeply anxious that an altar to the Lord should be erected in every family belonging to our Israel, I have been induced to prepare a work, suited to the wants of a Christian family. I know there are many excellent books designed for family devotion, but they can not be used by the people of our denomination, in consequence of the erroneous sentiments they contain. Doctrines at variance with our faith, are quite as objectionable in a prayer as in a sermon.

The work will be somewhat different in its character from any that has come under my notice. It will contain fifty-two Sabbath morning services—one for Christmas, one for Thanksgiving, and one for Fast. Each of these will consist of a reference to select portions of the Scriptures, brief reflections suited to the Scripture references, and a prayer. It will also contain a large number of prayers suitable for morning and evening devotion. Besides, it will contain prayers suitable for families in sickness and affliction, and in every situation common in life. No exertion will be spared to render the work worthy the denomination for whose use it is designed. Prayers are expected from Brs. H. Ballou, S. Streeter, W. Balfour, H. Ballou, 2d., T. Whittemore, L. S. Everett, S. Cobb, L. Willis, L. R. Paige, T. J. Greenwood, B. Whittemore, L. C. Browne, A. P. Cleverly, T. B. Thayer, A. A. Miner, H. Bacon, M. Ballou, R. Tomlinson, G. W. Gage, T. P. Abell, D. Forbes, E. H. Chapin, E. G. Brooks, C. H. Fay, S. P. Skinner, F. F. Thayer, J. G. Adams, W. M. Fernald, H. R. Nye, H. C. Leonard, and several others. The author has conversed with most of the brethren, and they not only cordially approve of his undertaking, but promise to do what they can, to bring the proposed work into general use.

CONDITIONS.—It will contain 216 pages, 18mo., printed and bound in the neatest manner. Seven copies for $3.00. It will be ready for subscribers by the 1st of May. Prospectuses to be returned as soon as possible.

If more convenient, the work can be obtained wholesale or retail, of Rev. A. R. Gardner, Iowa City, I. T.; Grosh & Walker, Utica, N. Y.; Bass and Hutchinson, Albany, N. Y.; C. L. Stickney, New York City; Rev. J. E. Palmer, Colebrook, N. H.; Rev. Eli Ballou, Montpelier, Vt.; Rev. J. F. Witherell, Concord, N. H.; C. P. Gill, Nashua, N. H.; Powers & Bagley, Lowell, Mass.; or of the Publisher.

A PITCHER IN THE WELL.

The following lines were written by a young lady, and were sent us by a friend, with a statement of the following circumstances to explain them. A Baptist preacher named Hayward in getting up a revival meeting in Prospect village, made the following comparison: "If you saw a woman at a well, crying, screaming, and making a great ado, and went to her, and found she had dropped her pitcher into the well, you would say that this was enthusiasm—that there was no real cause for her conduct. But if she told you that her child was in the well, you would not call her conduct enthusiasm or fanaticism." So he assured his hearers that the meetings he was getting up were because there was really a child, and not merely a pitcher in the well. The young lady, after attending all the meetings came to a different conclusion, and has harmoniously versified it.

A. B. G.

I've attended the meetings which you have held here,
For the purpose of learning if you were sincere;
I have listened attentively, and now I can tell
That all I've discovered, is—"a pitcher in the well."

You have strained every nerve, with your screams of despair,

To make people think that "a child" was in there;
But many kind hearers, in truth will now tell,
That all they have found, is—"a pitcher in the well."

Your cries of despair have made some afraid,
And a few of the timid have come to your aid;
But e'en some of them, if the truth they will tell,
Will say, they've seen naught, but—"a pitcher in the well."

While some without looking, do verily believe
That the shrieks which they hear, are not meant to deceive;
They'll join in the cry, and they'll tell us of hell,
When, alas, it is nought but "a pitcher in the well."

Now, if a child was really in there, dying,
There is no one but that to its aid would be flying;
But when people know that no child there has fell,
They don't like to run, just for "a pitcher in the well."

Now, if the Almighty His children would send
To a place where there torments never could end;
We might think (when you tell us of an endless hell),
That it was something more than "a pitcher in the well."

But it is not so; for His word does declare
That all of each nation His blessing shall share;
His word has gone forth, e'en the Almighty's vow,
And shall not return, till all people shall bow.

And now, as a sister, who wishes you well,
I will ask you one question concerning this hell;
And if the answer you'll give from God's holy word,
I will thank you at least, and own I have erred.

When the world into being our Maker did call,
And all things were finished, (for then he made all),
If hell then was formed, it has ever since stood—
But was it included in the works pronounced good?

PRIVATE AND FAMILY PRAYER.

Rev. Sir—Being in the habit of reading your paper, with the desire to profit by it, I have taken my pen to ask a few questions which I trust you will faithfully and candidly answer. Do you believe prayer, family and private, as well as public, to be a duty? If so, why is not the duty more generally performed by your denomination of Christians; and why is it not more frequently and pressingly enjoined on those who read your columns, and who believe the doctrines there inculcated? I am very sure (and I am placed in a situation where I have an opportunity of knowing) that the very general neglect of this duty is a powerful weapon against Universalism; and to me it does seem most incongruous, that creatures who profess to believe in God as their Maker and Preserver—the God in whom they live, and more, and have their being, whose name is Love—to live from week to week, from month to month, the daily recipients of His bountiful care and love, and yet never recognize their dependence, seek his face, or express one grateful emotion for all His benefits. We can not deny that the precept which enjoins it is positive, and added to this we have the example of the blessed Saviour; and is it not an exalted privilege to hold communion with the Father of our spirits? How elevating the thought, that we may commune with him as children with a parent—how does it purify and define the affections, and destil upon the soul a peace and serenity that will assist us to pass smoothly and even happily through the various trials and disquietudes of this mortal life! To me it seems that we can not justly claim to be the friends of God, and expect to be partakers of his holiness, unless we manifest our love to him by our intercourse and correspondence with Him. But I forbear. I intended only to ask your views and practice, not to express my own feelings—forgive the intrusion, and let me hear from you through your paper, and you will oblige and comfort your humble

ENQUIRER AND FRIEND.

REPLY.

Universalists are agreed in the importance of prayer as a duty and a privilege—as a part of their religion, arising out of their nature and their wants. But in regard to the modes of its performance—the times, and seasons, and circumstances, in which prayer should be vocally made, there are probably some differences of opinion among us. And these differences of opinion have probably arisen, from the various circumstances under which we have been placed in previous life, more than from any investigation of the subject itself.

Some of our friends, from having been placed in circumstances, where vocal family prayer was kept up as a form—made an outside show—have become disgusted with its empty heartedness, and discarded it altogether. Others, returning from that extreme, have returned again to its occasional use, and practice it, not at set times and seasons, but when they felt in the spirit of prayer. And others still, deeming it an imperative duty which was not dependant upon their frame of mind, have persevered in its performance at set times, daily—calling on the God of heaven, morning and evening, and blessing him every time they gather around the table to feast on the food provided for them. Our friend will see, from this brief statement, the variety of opinion and practice which prevails among Universalists in regard to vocal family prayer.

My own opinion, which I give as a mere individual, is, that though vocal prayer has its benefits, yet it is not required of us as a mere form—and that it had better not be performed at all, where the spirit does not call for it, or assent to it. I differ from him, as to an express command being given for vocal prayer, in the family or in the closet. The form of words—the mere sound of the voice, is not prayer—it must come from the heart—it must breathe from the soul. And I verily believe that the Christian world needs more instruction which shall cause the soul within to commune with God, in heartfelt prayer and thanksgiving, than it does in what it commonly calls prayer. A continual spirit of confidence and trust in God's goodness—an affectionate gratitude for his love and providence, and a steady desire for his light, and grace, and guidance, is in my humble opinion, more needed among all Christians; and among few is it more needed than among the very persons who are faithful in making vocal prayer at set times and seasons. I say not this, to include all of this class—but only those who esteem the sign so highly, that they entirely overlook the thing signified—those who deem men prayerless, who do not pray statedly in uttered sounds. Perhaps this tendency of my mind to regard the thing more than the sign, has made me not a fit judge in this matter; but I have known many persons who, I am persuaded, by their life and conversation, held frequent and close communion with God; and yet who were considered as prayerless men and women by those who regarded vocal prayer as the sign of Christianity.

I am free to confess that Universalists are not as prayerful in this sense, as they should be. I wish we were more devotional in our feelings—more inclined in our moments of privacy and meditation, to dwell on thoughts of God's goodness and our unworthiness and dependence—more given to converse on such subjects in our family and social circles—that we met oftener together to engage in such peace-giving exercises—and, above all, that our lives outwardly gave more and more continual evidences that the spirit of true prayer and praise dwelt within our souls. I am perfectly satisfied that we shall never feelingly understand and enjoy all the delights of our most holy and blessed faith, nor be enabled to practice its principles, until we do cherish and cultivate more than we now do, this strengthening and purifying spirit of devotion in our hearts.

One more question answered, and I am done. Our periodicals are, probably, too much given to doctrinal and local matters—and these do, probably, cause Editors and their correspondents to neglect the inculcation of more devotional subjects and duties. But still, I do not think this is really the case to the extent implied in our correspondents inquiry. So far as I can remember, the subject of devotion and devotional exercises has been frequently urged by our periodicals generally. It is true, they have not given very great prominence to family prayer—nor to vocal prayer at stated seasons or hours in each day—for the reason, probably, that few deem that the prescribed or most necessary mode of performing our devotions—or, probably they have neglected to do so very often, because they deem other duties (which they more frequently urged instead) as more important than this form or mode of making prayer to God. Be the reason what it may, our periodicals, I believe, are about in the same condition with regard to it; and if any find their consciences condemning them, after reading these inquiries and answers, I hope, for their own sakes, they will do what they think duty requires hereafter.

N. B.—In another place will be found proposals for publishing a Prayer Book, to be compiled by Br. O. A. Skinner, of Boston—as suitable a person to make such a compilation as could probably be found in our ranks. We hope our readers will peruse the prospectus, and get the book.

DISCOURAGING TO THE PREACHER.

"The laborer is worthy of his hire," said our Saviour; thus teaching that if one individual performs a certain amount of labor for another, he is lawfully entitled to an equivalent by way of compensation. And it makes no difference what kind of labor is performed, whether physical, or mental, or both—the rule will hold equally good in either case. The principle here laid down, was recognized by the apostles, as being applicable in the case of a preacher and his society—"If we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it a great thing if we shall reap your carnal things?" Rom. ix: 11.

Now, according to the principle which our Saviour has laid down, and which the apostle has recognized in the above passage, it matters not whether there be any special definite agreement on the part of the society, to pay the preacher a certain sum as an equivalent for his services, or not. If he is permitted to labor for them, though no definite terms have been agreed upon, they are morally bound to make him a suitable compensation for his services; for "the laborer is worthy of his hire." But how much stronger is this obligation, where a society have positively pledged themselves to the preacher, to pay him a certain amount on certain specified conditions. And yet, how utterly careless and heedless are many societies, about the fulfillment of their engagements with him who labors for them!

There is nothing which tends more certainly to discourage the preacher, than this want of punctuality on the part of societies. He is usually a poor man in this world's goods, devotes his whole time to the interests of his society, and hence has no other means of feeding and clothing himself and family, (if he is so unfortunate as to have a family,) except the promised compensation for his pulpit services. How important then is it, that our societies learn to be more prompt, in discharging the obligations which they owe to their Pastor, that he may obey the apostolic injunction to "owe no man any thing but love."

MORAL INFLUENCE OF UNIVERSALISM.

BY REV. H. L. HAYWARD.

The fear is often expressed by believers in endless misery, that if the belief in Universalism should become general, sin and iniquity would increase to an alarming extent, as the consequence. They suppose, that where men have not the fear of endless torment before their eyes, to excite them to a discharge of their duty, every restraining influence is removed, and they have nothing to keep them from running headlong into the very vortex of vice and crime.

But are such fears well founded? We think they are not; and that it is a most unpardonable ignorance of the principles of our faith, which causes them to indulge such fears. In fact, these apprehensions have no foundation except in imagination; for there is nothing in the conduct of Universalists, to prove that the doctrine is naturally demoralizing. On the contrary, there is much evidence to be derived from this source, in favor of the salutary and sanctifying influence of our doctrine; for there are instances not a few in almost every neighborhood, of persons of the most dissolute and depraved characters, who have been thoroughly and effectually reformed, solely through the benign influence of Universalism.

But let us inquire, what is there in this doctrine of free grace and salvation, which is calculated to lead men on in the ways of sin and spiritual death? It teaches, that God is the Father and Friend of universal humanity—but is this calculated to render mankind sinful and rebellious? Certainly not; for an apostle has taught that it is the goodness of God which leadeth to repentance; and our own experience has taught us, that so far as our earthly parent is concerned, the more kindness and affection he displays towards us, the more carefully we strive to obey all his commands. But if he manifests a cold and unfeeling disposition, taking no interest in our welfare, nor adopting measures for the promotion of our happiness, we should feel far less affection for him than in the former case, nor should we exercise the same carefulness in obeying his requirements. It follows therefore, that the Universalist's view of the paternal character of God, is better calculated than any other, to secure the heartfelt obedience of mankind.

Again, Universalism teaches that all men are brethren, all having the same origin, equally dependant upon God's bounty and goodness, and destined to the same glorious immortality. But who will contend, that this view of the relationship which mankind sustain to each other, is calculated to remove all restraint and render them sinful and rebellious? How is it with men in the common relations of life? Do we, as a general thing, find brothers manifesting less kindness and affection for each other than for those without the limits of the family circle? Is not the opposite of this true?—Certainly. We all understand perfectly, that, as a general rule, there is more affectionate good will exhibited by children of the same family, towards each other, than can be found in the more distant relations of neighborhood and community. Suppose, then, that all mankind should be brought to believe, that they are brethren and sisters of the same family, would it not strengthen the bonds of friendship and good will, and promote a spirit of peace and unanimity among all ranks and conditions in life? Certainly, and for men to talk about such views giving loose reign to all the sinful and corrupt passions of human nature, shows a gross ignorance relative to those motives by which mankind are most easily and successfully influenced. Where is the parent who would fear to inform his children, that they stood in the relation of brothers and sisters to each other, and were each alike dear to his heart; lest this knowledge should fill their hearts with bitterness and enmity, and dispose them to do each other all the harm they could devise? On the contrary, all wise parents in imparting instruction and advice to their children, urge the relationship which exists between them, as a reason why they should be kindly affectioned toward each other.

But Universalism likewise teaches, that a just punishment for every transgression is positively certain, and can not be avoided by any possible means. It teaches, that there is no such thing as sinning with impunity, because "God will by no means clear the guilty." And is this calculated to make men sinful and vicious? Would an individual possessing common sense, be any more likely to engage in the commission of sin, with the assurance that he could not possibly escape adequate punishment; than if he had been taught and believed, that all punishment for sin was altogether uncertain, and might easily be avoided by the very simple and easy process of feeling sorry? We say, therefore, that instead of confirming mankind in vice and strengthening the bands of sin, Universalism is better calculated than any other system of religion known among men, to restrain all the baser passions of our natures, and make men truly religious and godly. And, viewing the subject in this light, we can not help expressing the joy and gratitude of our souls, as we contemplate the rapid spread of Universalism in the world. We pray that it may continue to spread, and its converts be multiplied like the drops of the morning dew, until "all shall know the Lord from the least even unto 'the greatest.'"

PROFANITY.....NO. I.

BY REV. S. J. GIBSON.

Man is a being of habit. He is influenced more or less, by the company into which he is thrown, and those actions in which he indulges himself to-day, may exert no little power over him when many years have gone by.

The truth of this position, we have illustrated by the conduct of those by whom we are surrounded. For, let the different courses pursued by different men be well observed, and it will be found that the man who has had a situation allotted him, within the circle of virtuous society, arises at a rapid rate upon the scale of moral and intellectual improvement, with seemingly but little effort for his advancement. But the man who has been so unfortunate as to be thrown among vicious and immoral people, finds it to be with the utmost difficulty that he stems the tide which there sets in against him. And if he once loses the self-command which has hitherto governed him—suffers that moral light which the Deity has placed within the mind as a guide amid the surrounding darkness—if he suffers this, we say, to become lost or bedimmed, he goes downward at a rapid rate, and it is, I had almost said a miracle, that he is enabled to disengage himself from the power which habit exercises over him. We find this beautifully expressed by the prophet, though perhaps not to be taken in its greatest latitude, when he gives us the question and answer:—"Can the Ethiopian change his skin?—or the leopard his spots?—Then may ye do good that are accustomed to do evil."

Such being the force with which habit operates upon the mind, is it not commendable in one, when he observes men indulging in those things which have a tendency to sully and degrade the faculties, to endeavor to arrest the evil in its progress? Surely, if he acts with the kindness of the Christian, and the sincerity of disinterested friendship. But if he stands out and wields the sharp and cutting sword of sarcasm—or opens upon the heads of his fellow beings, the thunders of a Sinai of vengeance, he will but strengthen and urge forward the very evil which he vainly attempts to destroy.

There is that within the human mind, which revolts at the appearance of oppressive compulsion, and acts with increased vigor the more that it is exposed to the violence; but still, there is also within that mind principles which will bend and yield to the soft voice of friendship and affection. And hence, kindness alone should characterize the efforts of those who endeavor to deliver men from their evil habits.

It being the intention of the writer to address a few brief articles to those who are in the habit of indulging in the use of profane language, he is fully persuaded that the voice of condemnation will be withheld, when the reader is assured, that the rule mentioned above shall, as far as possible, be strictly adhered to, and that it is alone the most friendly feelings that dictate his language upon the present occasion. And no one we presume will be premature in his judgment, or form his opinion hastily, but in candor should every one consider the subject, and judge only when he has duly weighed the conclusion of the whole matter.

Having thus given the reader an intimation of what is to follow, we shall in future speak more directly respecting profane men—of the causes which induce them to indulge in the habit, and endeavor as far as our humble abilities will permit, to show the evils resulting therefrom, and by so doing if possible to persuade men to forego the indulgence of profane language.

CONTRASTS.

BY REV. J. H. SANFORD.

On hearing a flaming sermon the other evening, in defence of the doctrine of endless suffering, we were told that all men were wicked, and the speaker acknowledged himself to be one of that number; and in portraying the miseries of the wicked said, "the wicked shall be turned into hell, with all the nations that forget God, and God will rain upon the wicked snares, fire and brimstone, and this shall be the portion of their cup; and though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished." And then we were told, if we would repent we should escape the punishment that we are justly deserving, and were then earnestly exhorted to repent, for fear that God would punish us!! I left,—musing on the contrast.

Again, we are told by some theologians, that "God from all eternity, elected some men and angels to everlasting life—and passed by all the rest; foreordaining them to everlasting misery, that they should be to the praise of his vindictive justice." But we are told by others, that God never has by an irrevocable decree sealed the future destiny of any man or angel; but will punish the finally impenitent with everlasting misery, and his understanding is infinite, therefore He knew from all eternity who would be saved and who would be lost.

Pshaw reader, this is no contrast. It is a perfect coincidence. Well, I have "missed it" once—but pardon me, reader, I only called it a contrast because other folks' do.

AN IDEA OF THE UNIVERSE....NO. II.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

I was last speaking of the sun—its magnitude, splendor and boundless influence on all surrounding worlds, as a bright display of the wisdom of the Allwise Creator. But were we to stop here in our contemplation, we should not take into consideration a hundredth part of the visible universe.—Great as the sun may appear to us, together with all his surrounding planets, they dwindle into an insignificant point, when we survey the starry hosts that twinkle in the firmament, and consider at what an immense distance they are from us, and consequently how great they must be to make the dwellers on this globe acquainted with them by their light.

Let us suppose, for a better conception of our subject, that we take a flight towards those shining orbs in the far off evening sky. What a space we must pass over before we could arrive at the nearest object in the firmament. Reflect what a space—it is no less than twenty billions of miles in extent, and a cannon ball, flying at its utmost velocity, would be no less than four millions of years ere it could reach the nearest object in the heavens. Here is enough for wonder and astonishment! But this is not all. Look into the firmament in a clear winter's night, and the eye may behold thousands of these shining orbs, emitting their splendor from space immeasurably distant. And bodies at such distances must be of the greatest magnitude to make us acquainted with them.

It is but reasonable to believe, that the least twinkling star that we behold, is no less than our sun in magnitude and glory, and that even some are a hundred or a thousand times larger, and that their splendor is equally proportionate. What would be a reasonable supposition as regards the use of these stupendous globes? It is but just to suppose that they have been suspended for some glorious object—as it would be, no great compliment to the Creator to suppose that bodies of such amazing magnitude could have been created for no other purpose, than to diffuse a useless splendor over the wilds of immensity. Such an idea is utterly inconsistent with the perfections of the Deity, and all we know of his glory and character from Nature and Revelation. If the earth would have been "created in vain," were it not inhabited; so likewise those starry orbs—those twinkling fires in the heavens, would be formed in vain, if myriads of worlds with countless tribes of living beings were not there to be irradiated and cheered with their glory and splendor. One consideration alone is sufficient to convince us, that those shining globes with their retinue of worlds, were created for the accommodation of intelligent creatures—and this consideration is, that wherever God displays his wisdom and power, there is a corresponding display of goodness and mercy—in fine, of every other attribute. The Deity must be considered in every action as exerting himself in the plenitude of his perfections. No one attribute can be considered as acting separately or independently of the rest. But can there be a display of wisdom and goodness where there is no sentient and intelligent being to discern it? If not, then those thousand stars which the unassisted eye can perceive in the canopy of heaven, may be considered as connected with, at least fifty thousand other worlds, compared with the amount of whose population, all the inhabitants of our globe would appear only as "the small dust of the balance." Here imagination might career on her loftiest and boldest wing for ages on ages, in the survey of this portion of our Maker's kingdom, and still be lost in contemplation and wonder at the vast extent, the immense magnitude, and the countless variety of scenes, and movements, and objects which would meet the view in every direction, Think for a moment. To our view is here presented, "not only single suns and single systems, such as that to which we belong; but suns revolving around suns, and systems around systems—systems not only double, but triple, quadruple, quintuple and multiple, all in complicated but harmonious motions—motions more rapid than the swiftest planet in our system, though some of them move a hundred thousand miles an hour—periods of revolutions which vary from thirty years to sixteen hundred—and there are suns with a blue or a green lustre revolving around suns of a white or ruddy color, both of them illuminating with contrasted colored light the same assemblage of globes."—Now, upon the supposition that these systems of worlds revolving around other systems, are inhabited—which is but reasonable—and what a scene of interest, grandeur, variety, diversity of intellect and of wonder and astonishment, were they unveiled to our sight, would we then gaze upon?

Notwithstanding we have made this extensive survey of this grand and magnificent spectacle, yet we find ourselves still standing only on the merest extreme verge of creation. The stars which the unassisted eye can discern are only a few scattered orbs on the outskirts of a cluster far more numerous. And all this variety of scenery and grandeur is but a small speck, when compared with the whole extent of the boundless firmament. New glories burst upon our sight—and the astonishing extent and grandeur of the sidereal heavens burst into full view as we advance in the survey of the more distant regions of the universe. All that the natural vision of man is able to discover, is but a mere point in comparison with the immensity of august and magnificent objects which stretch themselves through the realms of boundless space respectively towards infinity. The discoveries of modern astronomy have aided and enlarged man's conception far beyond what it possibly could even surmise—and presented a view of the universe, boundless as its Maker, where human insignificance is confounded and lost, and where man dwindle away into a mere microscopic animalculum of the bucket of water—and the whole tribes of his species are as a particle of vapor to the ocean of waters. What opens to the naked eye in the heavens are mere portals, as it were, which lead away into the interior recesses of the vast temple of creation. But let us once direct our view beyond these outer portals, by means of one of the most powerful telescopes, and we shall catch a glimpse of some of the most magnificent porches, and a faint view of some of the most splendid apartments, which, while here, we may never be permitted to explore to their full extent, but which may serve to give us a more august conception of what is concealed from the naked eye. On entering "this temple not made with hands," the splendor of its decorations, the amplitude of its scale, the awfulness with which it stretches on toward infinity, and the glory which reigns in every part, fill us with thoughts of our own insignificance, and forcibly strike our imagination with the supremacy and might of Him who reared such a stupendous frame.

Here is presented to the conception of mortal man enough to fill him with devotion—with feelings of gratitude that he is not lost in the infinitude of the Creator's works—and draw into exercise all the powers of his mind to contemplate the goodness, and mercy, and wisdom of such a wonder working God. Here is sufficient to lead us to bow down in humility and adoration before Him who called into existence this boundless and inconceivable fabric, and "whose kingdom ruleth over all."

LETTERS OF THE NEW-ENGLAND SPY.....NO. I.

—, Feb. 14th, 1843.

MY DEAR F:—For the want of better employment, I now sit down, late in the evening, pen in hand, to reply to some of your queries in your last "winged-messenger" otherwise called a letter. I say for want of "better employment," not meaning thereby that answering your communications is indifferent business; but, on the contrary, wishing you to understand by said term, that I have no other employment whatever, for the present, but to write letters to some one; and as thou art uppermost in my mind, and as I think thou art somewhat of a congenial spirit, I have determined that thou shalt be the man. I do not expect that I shall make this letter interesting to you, it being rather too soon for a formal reply. But as I know not where my lot will be cast, or what leisure I shall have after a few days, I will venture to speak to you in a somewhat informal manner. Throwing aside, then, for the time being, all attempts at high toned etiquette, I am coming to talk with you in the character of a "plain blunt rustic." I shall make no promises, nor give heed to any protests, but shall if I please write this letter and ten more to my own tried and cherished. So, get you some nerve powder, open a running account with Uncle Sam, and prepare for a general onslaught.

I am stopping in ———; a place noted abroad for its theological renown, but at home, for the anti-social habits of its citizens; a country village of some five hundred inhabitants, one hundred, and fifty of whom are, and are preparing to be, public heralds of the Cross of Christ. And yet, but a few days ago, an old man of seventy passed through this place, out of money, almost shoeless, worn out and weary, having walked over a hundred miles at the rate of ten or fifteen per day, no evidence of dissipation about him, but just buried his daughter, and was on his way home, some hundred and fifty miles then distant; and had it not been for one man in this goodly Christian village, he would not have found sympathy enough here to have secured him a ride twenty miles in one of the baggage cars upon the rail-road!

Some ten miles from this, has been built during the past season, a dwelling, at the cost of about thirty five thousand dollars. A few days since the poor laborers of said landlord were notified that on and after such a date their wages would be reduced ten per cent!

Yet this is New England—enlightened, evangelized and Christian New England! These are the blessings of our free institutions! Who would not love to labor on such terms, or be a laborer, under such a master? And then to be a preacher too,—a herald of the cross of Christ—among such a charitable and Christ-like people, how extremely pleasant that is! Seeing these things, yet dare not speak out against them! Doing these things, yet claim to be a follower of the Lord Jesus Christ! O admirable world, this! How smooth it looks! How can any one wish to dwell apart from it! It is such a pleasant thing to see honest poverty trampled upon; to see labor rendered disgusting; to see Christianity heathenized, to see one half of the world living upon the bones and sinews of the other half—that it is altogether a wonder—how any one can wish to forego the pleasure of a daily contemplation of such scenes!

But, irony aside. Do I err, my dear F——, when I say all this is emptiness? Is it right to claim for our institutions the honored epithets free and Christian, while such things are tolerated by them, and grow out of them? Do we not live under a false organization of society? Is not life already, with the poor man, an up-hill work; and is it not becoming more and more so, the longer such a state of things is countenanced? The world needs something more. The great heart of humanity is yearning for something that shall regenerate society, and place it upon a Christian basis. The Christian religion when rightly understood and interpreted, contains that something. And a few who are in advance of the age in which they live are beginning to unfold the beauties of the Christian religion in this respect.

Many will cry out, "Humbbug!" "Moonshine!" "Castle-building!" and such like. But, depend upon it, the world needs, and must have, something that will place the relative position of the rich and the poor in a different light. Man was never born to be a slave. God never created man for such a destiny. He created all men for a high and holy destiny. And nothing is plainer in the whole wide world, than that no one can accomplish that destiny while he is compelled to labor fifteen hours out of the twenty-four, for food and raiment.

I speak not against the Christian religion. I am rather pleading its cause. I would have it washed of these foul stains, realizing that it can never be loved and revered until it is. Without them, the Christian system is an attractive system, but with them, it is little wonder that so many reject it. Think not that I am an enemy to Christianity because I tell you the truth.

Yours very truly, THE SPY.

BR. W. ANDREWS

Has been spending the past winter in Buffalo, where we are very glad to hear from other sources than the following, he has been very successful in building up our cause. But the following expression of thanks of the society there will speak for itself. Br. A. has left Buffalo for Steuben county, and will probably be here in a few weeks; but where he will next fix his location we have not yet learned.

A. B. G.

At a meeting of the Trustees of the "First Church and Society of Universal Restorationists of Buffalo," held on the 11th instant, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted.

Whereas, brother William Andrews has, in compliance with circumstances beyond his control, withdrawn from his connexion with this Society, and whereas the occasion seems to be a fitting one for the expression of our feelings towards him, and our estimate of his character, and the universal approval of his services, and labors of love, by our Society. Therefore,

Resolved, That in bidding adieu to one, who, for six months, has officiated as our pastoral guide, we are actuated by sentiments of the most heartfelt sorrow and regret. That the highly exemplary character, ennobling talents, pure Christianity, and true benevolence of our late beloved pastor, entitle him, not only to our sincere esteem, but to the heartiest love and admiration of all Christian and benevolent communities, and that the memory of his sojourn with us, will ever be cherished as among the most pleasurable and endearing of recollections.

Resolved, That we humbly and devoutly invoke the blessing of Heaven upon our beloved brother, and his affectionate and highly esteemed wife, that in their future life they may be guided and protected by the favor of a Divine Providence, and in every vicissitude buoyed up and strengthened by a lively faith in the glorious Gospel of our divine Redeemer, that our brother may be restored to the full enjoyment and benefits of health, and again enabled, fully, to resume his labors in the ministry of reconciliation, which he has been obliged, partially, to suspend.

Resolved, That copies of these proceedings be furnished by our Chairman to the Rev. William Andrews, and to the Editor of the Magazine and Advocate for publication in that paper.

BENJAMIN CARYL, Chairman.

Buffalo, April 11, 1843.

SECULAR NEWS.

DISTRESS IN THE WEST.—The Rochester Democrat publishes a letter from Edwardsburg, Michigan, giving accounts of the great distress prevailing there. The severity of the winter, the scarcity of food for man, and of provender for the beasts, has created wide spread distress. The writer says:—"Inevitable famine is approaching for beast, and we fear for man. I have tried for two days to buy grain, but can not secure a bushel without money, and hardly with that, and that is out of the question—scarce, and more so, than fodder. I heard from different quarters yesterday that cattle are dying from starvation in great numbers. Many are killing off the poorest for the benefit of a few of the best. It is estimated that more than one-half of the people are entirely destitute of fodder and grain—others only enough for one or two weeks. Nothing is left for teams during spring work, and not a particle of fodder any where to be obtained, not even straw, for love or money. Oats and corn have doubled in price, within a few days. The weather is now as cold as mid-winter, and no appearance of spring—snow over two feet deep. Prospects exceedingly gloomy."

FAMINE AMONG THE BRUTES IN OHIO.—The unprecedented long and severe winter has been the cause of great suffering and death among the swine and cattle. It is estimated by well informed persons, that no less than three hundred head of cattle, and six thousand head of swine, in one county alone, have perished of actual starvation. The Editor of the Kalida Venture made a tour through a portion of Van Wert county, and the number of dead and dying hogs that met his eye along the route, exceeded any thing of the kind he ever heard of. The wild game, deer, turkeys, &c., have all suffered with the rest. The farmers' stock of hay and grain is nearly exhausted, and if the cold weather continued much longer—and there was no immediate prospect of its abatement—"the garden of Ohio" will be compelled to import her beef and pork for next year's use.

Every enlisted man of the garrison of Fort Ontario, Oswego, N. Y., commanded by Capt. E. K. Barnum, second regiment of infantry, is a member of the total abstinence society.

Two hundred and twenty deluded English Mormons arrived at St. Louis, on the 28th ult., on their way to Nauvoo.

Father Matthew is expected to visit the United States during the approaching summer.

CUTTING DOWN.—The banks of New York have passed a resolution not to receive Spanish and other foreign coin which have heretofore passed at 25 cents for more than 23 cents, 12 1-2 cent pieces for 10 cents, 6 1-4 cents for 5 cents. The U. S. Mint is said to have adopted a similar resolution, but whether before or after the banks is not stated, yet probably before. The abundance of coin in the country, the fact that most of the foreign coin is considerably worn, and the desire to infuse into circulation more coin which bears the stamp of the U. S. Mint, have led to these resolutions. Old stockings filled with these pieces will not be quite as valuable as they have been.

STATE CANALS.—At a meeting of the Board of Canal Commissioners, held at the State Hall, in the city of Albany, on the 10th day of April, 1843—present Messrs. Earl, Little, Enos, and Bissell—it was resolved that the State canals be opened for navigation on Monday, the first day of May next.

ANCIENT EGYPT. Her Monuments, Hieroglyphics, and History. By Geo. R. Glidden, late U. S. Consul at Cairo.

The publisher of the New World is happy to announce that he has now ready the above mentioned original and novel work in a double extra sheet, containing nearly Two hundred Hieroglyphics and Illustrations, accurately copied from the monuments of Egypt, and engraved expressly for this work.

This book may be well considered a curiosity in literature, as it not merely contains the only representations and translations of the once unintelligible symbols, and writings of the ancient Egyptians ever published in the United States; but presents to the American reader for the nominal price of 25 cents, a compendium of the entire discoveries of CHAMPOLION and others down to the present time, which is not elsewhere extant in the English language, and which could not be obtained in French, Italian, German, for less than two thousand and five hundred dollars, because no works on these subjects can be obtained apart from expensive plates.

It is impossible in an advertisement to give any detailed account of the contents of this work; suffice it to say, it begins at the beginning; and, after presenting fac-similes of the three hieroglyphical alphabets, showing their combinations and interpreting their historical facts; (in the course of which will be found the origin and dates of the Pyramids;) the great errors of Archbishop Usher's chronology of the Bible are demonstrated; the high cultivation, power and wealth of the ancient Egyptians proved; and the theories of modern geologists strikingly corroborated. In a word, it is not too much to aver, that a thousand vexed questions of chronology theology, archaeology, hierology, etc., about which learned divines of all denominations have been wrangling for centuries, are so conclusively settled by this work that they can never be agitated again.

Single copies 35 cents: 5 copies for $1: to Agents, Book-sellers, etc., $16 per hundred.

This important and curious work can scarcely fail to have an immense sale, and early orders, accompanied by cash, are solicited. Address J. Winchester, 30 Ann street, N. Y.

THAT FIFTY CENTS!!!

The time is approaching when our terms will require the addition of fifty cents to the subscription of all those who have not paid for the current volume. We remind our patrons of this fact, in the hopes that they will be induced to benefit themselves, and at the same time give us that assistance which we so much need at the present time. Will our agents endeavor to collect as much, and as speedily as possible, and forward the same.

THE GOSPEL FIELD.

BY JOHN A. MCNEIL.

Ho watchmen, why gaze ye here all the day long?
 Up, up, and exhibit the faith of your song;
 Let love be your motto, do good as you can,
 For man is no less than the brother of man.

Go open the eyes of the groping and blind,
 Till the light of our Gospel enlightens the mind;
 Till the dumb shout aloud, and the mourner rejoice,
 As they shall examine the faith of our choice.

Drive back superstition whose poisonous blight,
 Recedes from the truth, like the darkness of light;
 Let good news of great joy be left in its stead,
 Till the last lingering vestige of error hath fled.

Then on to the battle with weapons of Love,
 And point out the way to the haven above,
 Let the sound spread abroad to the nations afar,
 That "wisdom is better than weapons of war."

Ho, laymen in Zion, join in the fight;
 For the victory is ours at the dawning of light,
 On, on to the battle, that bigots may feel
 That truth is a weapon more mighty than steel.

"PANTOLOGY;"

Or a systematic survey of human knowledge, proposing a classification of all its branches, and illustrating their history, relations, uses and objects; with a synopsis of their leading facts and principles, and a select catalogue of books upon all subjects, &c. By Boswell Park, A. M.; Prof. of Nat. Phil. and Chem., in the University of Pennsylvania."

The title of this work clearly enough expresses its character to answer our present purpose. Pantology is from the two Greek words, pan, the neuter gender of pas, signifying all; and logos a discourse. As a treatise upon every branch of human knowledge, its classifications, illustrations and statements, are, so far as our knowledge extends, generally distinct and correct. But, unfortunately, like many other authors who are correct in almost every thing else, Mr. Park has erred on the subject of Universalism.

Under the third division of Christianity, he says—"The Universalists generally believe in the Trinity, but maintain that all mankind will be saved, however sinful their lives may have been."

Every Universalist knows the above is not true. Universalists do not "generally believe in the Trinity," as it is usually understood. On the contrary, they are almost universally Unitarians, i. e., believers in the oneness of the Godhead. Their views upon this subject are thus expressed, viz., "We believe there is one God, whose nature is love," &c. To this there may be exceptions. Some Universalists may believe in the Orthodox doctrine of the Trinity, but this does not matter. It is by no means a prominent doctrine.

Respecting Christ there are various opinions among Universalists. Some suppose him to have been merely a man—in all things like unto us, yet without sin—that he existed in the counsel of God previous to his inhabiting this earth, but not in person.

Others suppose that he existed in person with the Father, though created by and subordinate to him, and that he was manifested in the flesh to purify and sanctify the world. Others believe that he previously existed as a human spirit and was subsequently conceived by the influence of the Holy Ghost, to accomplish the work assigned him by the Father. Universalists generally regard the Holy Ghost when used in connection with the Father and Son, as the spirit of truth, or the comforter which Christ left with men.

I have been thus particular in stating the views of Universalists on this point, because they are so often misapprehended. It will be seen that they differ widely from the doctrine of three persons in the Godhead, or Trinitarianism.

In his catalogue of books, etc., the author of the Pantology refers his readers to the following "Universalist Books," viz., Ballou's writings, and Universalism as it is. Br. Ballou's works are held in very high repute by the denomination, to which he, by his masterly efforts and perseverance, has contributed such lasting benefits. I am happy the reader is referred to such valuable works. But, as they were not designed to embrace the full extent of the belief of Universalists; being mostly made up of sermons and select subjects; perhaps the author would have done his readers a little more justice if he had referred them to a few other works—the Ancient and Modern Histories of Universalism—The Universalist belief—Universalism Illustrated and Defended—The Universalist's Guide, etc., etc. Perhaps he had not room after presenting such a long list of Orthodox books.

As to Hatfield's Universalism as it is—it is the last book published, I would have one read to obtain a knowledge of Universalism. Br. Sawyer in his "Reply" has very clearly shown that it is Universalism as it is not. If the author of the Pantology knew that the work was opposed to Universalism and had been replied to, he ought to have referred to that reply.

But enough. We will not accuse the learned author unjustly. If he has mistaken our views through ignorance, he will probably correct the error in the third edition of his work. W. H. R.

MINUTES

Of the Proceedings of the Hudson River Association of Universalists—1842.

Met in Hudson, on Wednesday and Thursday, September 7th and 8th, and after uniting in prayer with Br. Bartlett, organized the council by choosing Br. A. R. Bartlett, Moderator, and Br. H. B. Soule, Clerk. Received and read the credentials of delegates. Appointed Br. C. F. Lefevre and the Trustees of the Society under his pastoral care, the committee to arrange the public services. The standing committee on discipline reported no complaint—report accepted. This committee, consisting of Brs. C. F. Lefevre, B. Hyde and B. Huling, were re-appointed for the ensuing year. Approved the labors of Brs. S. R. Smith and H. B. Soule as a part of the committee on Fellowship and Ordination, in conferring ordination on Br. C. M. Patterson. Appointed Brs. C. F. Lefevre and J. A. Aspinwall (ministerial) and J. Ogden and D. M. More (lay) delegates to represent the Association at the next State Convention, with power to appoint substitutes and fill vacancies. Appointed Brs. Lefevre, Aspinwall and E. Smith, committee to receive applications, and report a place for the next session of the Association; Committee reported Troy—report accepted. Appointed Br. H. Lyon to preach the next occasional sermon, and the Clerk to prepare the minutes for publication in the Magazine and Advocate and the Union and Messenger.

Voted that all those societies within the limits of the Association, which have not made regular statistical returns to the Standing Clerk, are most earnestly requested to do so as soon as possible.

Voted that the following Preamble and Resolution, adopted at the session of this Association in 1840, be published with the minutes of this session.

"Whereas, It is evident that the formation of Sunday Schools has had a very beneficial influence, not only in training up children to a knowledge of our principles, but also by more deeply interesting parents themselves in the promotion of our cause; therefore Resolved, That we recommend to the Societies within this Association, whenever it may be feasible, to give their diligence to the formation of Sunday Schools."

Sermons were preached by the following brethren: A. R. Bartlett, J. A. Aspinwall (occasional), C. M. Patterson, I. D. Williamson, H. B. Soule, W. J. Goss and S. R. Smith.

Preachers present.—C. F. Lefevre, S. R. Smith, I. D. Williamson, J. A. Aspinwall, A. R. Bartlett, U. Clark, C. Hollister, A. B. Manley, C. M. Patterson, W. J. Goss, H. Lyon, and H. B. Soule.

Lay delegates present.—S. Van Schaack and Chester Packard, Albany; C. Townsend and E. Smith, So. Hartford; D. Mosher and H. Peacock, Greenfield; A. Kingsley and D. Stone, West Fort Ann; J. Frink and M. H. Williams, Troy; E. Mosher and T. Dimmick, Hudson; D. M. More, Schenectady.

The above minutes have been delayed until the present time on account of inability to procure the resolutions of 1840, and an extremely perplexing pressure of business; they were made out at the time, but as I could not then obtain the resolutions, were laid aside and afterwards forgotten until a recent circumstance brought them to mind. The Association is in no way to blame for this delay; the blame, if such there be, is wholly with myself. "Better late than never," however, and so, begging the pardon of the Association, I now give them to the printer. H. B. SOULE.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

"And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars." Luke xxi: 25.

Mr. Editor:—Having been engaged much of the time during the past autumn and winter, in giving scientific, and especially astronomical lectures in various parts of this State, I have had occasion to learn that much false information has been circulated, and many erroneous opinions prevail relative to the appearances and changes in the starry heavens. In some places it is thought by many, that the whole machinery of the universe is out of joint, and that this is a certain precursor to the speedy coming of Christ in judgment. If the doctrine of Mr. Miller be true it should be propagated by truth, and not falsehood; by an appeal to common sense, and not to the superstitious fears of ignorant men.

A few weeks ago, while in the easterly part of the State, I was informed that a Baptist preacher, who has considerable rank and influence in his denomination, and who is itinerating and lecturing on Millerism, stated to his hearers, that when the extraordinary red Aurora was seen on the evening of the 25th of January, 1837, the moon was full, but was not to be seen, it having been turned to blood! I found some persons excessively terrified at this declaration; and it seemed plausible, as no one could remember to have seen the moon upon that evening, and the precise date was forgotten. I immediately calculated the moon's age for the time, and found that it was more than four days after the full, and consequently she could not have risen till about midnight. I need not inform your readers that the moon rose at the appointed hour, after furnishing its usual light to the other hemisphere.

In the Herald and Journal of March 16, 1842, the Rev. Gershom F. Cox, in a communication on the second advent and signs of the times, gave the startling intelligence that "fifteen hundred stars have recently faded from the vault of heaven." The number was in italics, indicating that it was deliberately written; and yet the statement is so grossly and monstrously inaccurate, that I supposed the reverend gentlemen had made a slip of the pen, and would correct it himself. If I mistake not it was published also in the Christian Advocate and Journal, over his signature, and since then has been republished in a pamphlet and circulated throughout the land, and read by wondering thousands as oracular truth.

During all this time Mr. Cox has given it the sanction of his silence. What are the facts?—No more than thirteen stars are recorded in the annals of astronomy as having been lost; and so far from disappearing recently, as stated by Mr. Cox, some disappeared many ages since. It is not even certain that any stars have been blotted out. There are nearly one hundred variable stars which have periods of unusual brilliancy, fade till nearly invisible, and after a short time revive again. The thirteen stars which are reckoned as lost may be of this description. These changes were observed many centuries ago. The bright star which appeared suddenly with unusual brilliancy in Cassiopea, in 1572, is supposed to be the same star which appeared in the same place with great lustre, about 300, and also about 600 years before, having a period of about 300 years, during the intervals of which it is invisible.

A friend informed me that the same gentleman who has startled the world by the above intelligence, in his public lectures gives the total eclipse of the sun, which was seen in Italy last year, as one of the signs of the times, as a fulfilling of the Scripture, that the sun shall be darkened in the last days. An eloquent and sublime description of this phenomenon appeared in the papers, written by an eye witness. Such events always impress the mind, as they should do, with ideas of the greatness and power of God. But there was nothing more remarkable in this, than is usually seen in total eclipses of the sun; and they have happened almost every year these six thousand years.

Mr. Cox, in the same article from which I have quoted, gives the Aurora Borealis, or northern lights, as another sign of the last days; and says, "Is it not remarkable that, although we may account for them on the same principles, as were in operation when the fathers fell, that no record of them appears till quite recently." In the expression, "quite recently," there is a characteristic indefiniteness. It was supposed indeed, by many who had not investigated the subject, that the Aurora was first seen in England in 1716, as no record of its appearance for many years had been made, in that country, where the atmosphere, especially in winter, is usually loaded with vapor. But on examination, I find that the Aurora is mentioned in 1560, in a scientific work, entitled, "A description of meteors," published soon after the invention of printing, subsequent to which, and before 1716, there are many accounts of the same phenomenon.

The Rev. Mr. Litch, in one of his books on the second advent, states that the night after the remarkable day in 1785, was of pitchy darkness, which was undoubtedly true; but he adds, that it did not arise from a thickening of the atmosphere, as the stars were seen! He would seem to indicate that it was therefore miraculous. There was a thickening of the atmosphere which hid the sun during the day, and the moon at night. How the same thickening should not have obscured the stars, or how a starlight night should be so pitchy black as is described, is difficult to conceive. There is an absurdity in the statement which renders it utterly incredible.

Some accounts have recently been published in the newspapers, by mischievous editors, of wonderful changes in the planets and fixed stars. This has been done to hoax the ignorant and alarm the superstitious. It should be known that hundreds of scientific men, in Europe and America, have for many years been constantly employed in exploring the heavens with the most powerful telescopes.—Many are employed by the different governments of Europe in astronomical observatories, scattered over the earth, for the express purpose of furthering the interests of science. No phenomenon escapes their notice; and should any thing extraordinary occur, it would appear before the public, vouched by names that would command universal credence. It is not necessary to add, that no such changes have been observed by them.

Many have supposed that nothing has ever before appeared, similar to the remarkable red Aurora which was witnessed on the evening of January 25th, 1837. It was truly a sublime spectacle!—Who could behold the glorious painting of the celestial vault without being struck by the thought uttered by the glorified host on the sea of glass, "Great and marvelous are thy works, Lord God Almighty!" We would not lower the sentiments legitimately inspired by so sublime a scene. Yet such spectacles have often been witnessed in the northern parts of Sweden, Lapland and Siberia; and in remote and different periods. The Aurora indeed is a great blessing in those high northern latitudes, where the sun is absent for many weeks, furnishing the inhabitants with a splendid light in the midst of their dreary winter night. Gmelin describes the Aurora Borealis of these regions as differing in color according to the states of the atmosphere, "sometimes assuming the appearance of blood." He observes that, "they frequently begin with single bright pillars rising in the north, and almost at the same time in the northeast, which gradually increasing, comprehended a large space in the heavens, rush about from place to place with incredible velocity, and finally almost cover the whole sky up to the zenith, and produce an appearance, as if a vast tent was expanded in the heavens, glittering with gold, rubies and sapphire. A more beautiful spectacle can not be painted."

The celestial appearances which more nearly correspond with a literal fulfillment of the Scripture signs, are the dark day of May 19, 1780, and meteoric showers of November 13, 1833. We will not say that these, with the Aurora Borealis are not signs of the speedy dissolution of the world. But in forming a judgment on the subject, we may surely be permitted to exercise the common sense which God has given us. To lay this aside and judge only by feeling or fancy, is to criminally reject a light which we are sure is from God, for one which may prove an ignis fatuus, and land us in the quagmire of infidelity.

If the Scripture signs, already alluded to, are to receive a literal fulfillment, we may reasonably expect that they will conform to the four following tests.

1. They will appear near the event of which they are intended as the harbinger; probably within the generation of those who will be living at the end of the world.
2. They will be witnessed in all parts of the earth; because all are alike interested.
3. They may all be expected to appear, and not a single class of phenomena without the others.
4. They will be such as will impress intelligent minds with their strangeness.

The Aurora Borealis conforms to none of these tests. It has been seen for centuries, and is confined to the northern positions of the globe: having rarely, if ever, been seen so far south as the 30th degree of north latitude. The darkness of 1780 was confined principally to New England, and was witnessed by the generation preceding the present. To judge of its extent, take a globe six inches in diameter to represent the earth; then a spot on its surface, as large as a half dime, will represent a space twice as large as New England, and more than was probably covered by the darkness. This event was deeply appalling to thousands. Yet a similar darkness has sometimes gathered over the city of London in consequence of a vast accumulation of smoke, so as to make it necessary for passengers in the streets to use lighted torches at mid-day. Immense issues of smoke from fires and volcanoes have, from time immemorial, produced similar effects in many countries.

From a careful examination of all the accounts I have been able to collect, of meteoric showers of the last and present century, the whole of them together have occupied a space on the globe, less than one eight of its surface. In this space is included nearly the whole of the North Atlantic ocean. The showers of 1799 was probably the most extensive. Its centre was near the middle of the Atlantic, its edges touching the northern parts of South America, the coast of Labrador and Greenland, and the western shores of Europe and Africa. That of 1833 may be represented on the sixth inch globe by the space occupied by a dollar. All the meteoric showers of which we have any record were sublime and beautiful beyond description. No one could view these magnificent scenes without being impressed with awe. It is not surprising that even many intelligent persons should suppose them to be precursors of the final conflagration. Yet if the simple but reasonable tests we have given be correct, they are disarmed of their character as ominous of the destruction of the world. Meteors exactly similar in appearance, sometimes single, and sometimes a few of an evening, have been of familiar occurrence from the earlier ages of the world.

In the year 472, in the month of November, a phenomenon, similar to those of more recent date, took place near Constantinople. As Theophanes relates, "the sky appeared to be on fire" with the coruscations of flying meteors.

The notion that this phenomenon betokens high winds is prevalent now, and is of high antiquity. Virgil, in the first book of Georgics, expresses the same idea.

And oft before tempestuous winds arise
The seeming stars fall headlong from the skies,
And shooting through the darkness, gild the night
With sweeping glories, and long trails of light.

Although all the phenomena alluded to in this article may be explained on philosophical principles, I forbear to enter into an explanation, as it does not follow that, if designed to fulfil the divine prediction, they should be either supernatural or unaccountable.

We can easily excuse the weakness that converts the most common occurrence into a prodigy, or exalts an eclipse into a sign of the coming of the Son of man; but we can not, Mr. Editor, so easily excuse ministers of the Gospel, who on so grave a subject, either recklessly or ignorantly publish to the world that which is untrue. Whatever may be said by way of palliation, the effect is to produce a reaction upon minds temporarily affected by their assertions, and to bring the sacred office of the ministry into contempt.

THE RESTITUTION....NO. II.

"Having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure which he hath purposed in himself: that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he might gather together in one, all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in him."

EPH. i: 9, 10.

That this passage refers to all intelligent beings, is evident from the phrase, "both which are in heaven and which are on earth." This phrase, Professor Stuart says, is a periphrasis for the universe, and means the same as the phrase "all things" in another part of the passage. This phrase "all things," Macknight says, is equivalent to the phrase "all men,"—so that the passage embraces every son and daughter of Adam. Of this there can be no doubt. In "the dispensation of the fulness of times"—or the closing up of the Gospel, when in its fulness, its object shall have been accomplished, "then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God the Father," 1 Cor. xv: 24—then will the "universe," the "all men" be gathered "together in Christ"—or, in other words, "all things" shall be made one in Christ. What is the meaning of "gather together," in this verse? Dr. Clarke says it means "to reduce to one sum; to add up; to bring different sums together." If we take a number of sums, and add them up, they are no longer separate sums, but are made one—they are gathered together in one. So all men—the great sums of the kindreds, nations, and families of the earth, are to be collected together into one body.

To evade the force of this passage, it is said, that the apostle does not refer to all men; but to those who are now in Christ, and the gathering together of these, the believers, in one body in heaven; but this view is fallacious, because the believers are represented as already being one, in this life. Hence Paul said—"There is neither Jew nor Greek; there is neither bond nor free; there is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus." Gal. iii: 28. The idea is, that in faith, feelings and conduct, there was no national or sectional difference between the believers—for they were all one in Christ.

This work takes place in this life, during the operations of the Gospel—but in the fulness of the Gospel, at its final closing up, then "all men," composing the universe, of whatever nation or condition, shall be gathered together in Christ. To be gathered in Christ, expresses a strong fact. "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." 1 Cor. xv: 22. "Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature." 2 Cor. v: 17. The nature of this "new creature," is accurately described by the apostle Paul—"That ye put on the new man, which after God, is created in righteousness and true holiness." Eph. iv: 24. Hence we learn, that to be in Christ, is to be righteous and holy. And when all men shall be gathered together in Christ, then all will be righteous and holy; and of course, there can be no such thing as endless misery for any individual whatever.

An analysis of the passage will clearly show the doctrine which it teaches.—1. "Having shewn unto us the mystery of his will"—something which had remained secret; but being revealed to the apostles, it was no longer a mystery. 2. "Which he hath purposed in himself." Not purposed in the agency of man—but in himself; according to his will and pleasure, which his power and wisdom will enable him to satisfy. 3. "In the dispensation of the fulness of times"—or in the final consummation of the Gospel plan. 4. "To gather together in one all things in Christ"—or to bring together all men, so that in Christ, they shall be holy and righteous. 5. "Both which are in heaven and on earth, even in him"—that is, the universe, as Professor Stuart declares.

Now if the universe is to be gathered in Christ—if to be in Christ is to be righteous and holy—then it inevitably follows, that the Restitution is true. G. W. M.

THE LOVE OF MAN.

Of all the apostles of our Lord, John appears to have entered most deeply into the teachings and experience of divine love. His own mild, warm and all-affectionate nature was cultivated and improved by the peculiar friendship he felt for our Saviour; and by the examples and precepts of that great lover of sinners, his own practice was ever afterwards regulated and guided. He lived to an extreme old age—and despite of the terrors by which he was beset—the wickedness which surrounded him—and the persecutions he and his fellow Christians were so often called to endure, his love for man never cooled—his energies in behalf of our race never abated, and his hope and faith in their ultimate deliverance from wickedness and misery, never grew dim.—Each succeeding year found him drinking deeper and deeper into the fulness of affection towards God and man. And when the snows of old age covered his head, and wintry desolation had removed his springtime associates, and his summer friends from his side—the sunshine of his benevolence shone as warm as ever on the new generations around him; and, like snow-crowned Etna, the fires of ever-youthful affection warmed into virtuous life the tender plants nearest to his heart.

It is related of the venerable man of God, that when the lamp of life burned low, and feebleness permitted not the long continued utterance of up-springing thoughts, he was carried into the public assemblies of the early Christians, seated in his chair—when the invariable and only instruction imparted by him, was—"Little children, love one another." This, in his opinion, was the most important—I had almost said the only important—precept he could give them; for it embraced nearly all the rest. Let it only be truly obeyed, and all else, necessary for the promotion of human happiness and virtue, will follow as a necessary consequence. We need not wonder, therefore, that the beloved disciple—whose whole life was one continuity of affection—should so earnestly and frequently endeavor to impress it on minds of those he addressed—until his epistles overflow with the spirit of benevolence, and the advocate or lover of malice, wrath and misery is sick, and deaf, and dazzled with the continued effulgence and reiterations of love—LOVE—LOVE.

How paralyzing to the influence of a wrathful theology, would be the reading of this apostle's epistles!—Go to a modern revival, just as the spirit of endless wrath is rousing the fears of the audience, and impelling them to despair and agonize in the belief of God's sternness, anger, vindictiveness and malice—and oh, how would the language of John contrast with such preaching! Hear the beloved apostle—how ably he refutes the idea of a wrathful or revengeful God—how he dissipates that fear, which is the foundation of a modern experience in religion—how he utterly destroys that hope which is based on a willingness to be damned, and on a prospect of rejoicing at the miseries of hell in eternity! "This then is the message we have heard of [Jesus], and declare unto you, that God is light, and in him is no darkness at all." "My little children, these things write unto you, that ye sin not." Mark, now, what it is to keep them from sinning. "And if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world." How different—how widely different this doctrine, from the doctrine now preached to keep people from sinning! We are told that nothing but the preaching of an angry God, and an endless hell, can restrain people from sinning (and God knows, that even it does not restrain many!)—and we are assured that Universalism is an awful doctrine, inasmuch as it encourages all manner of iniquity. But the beloved apostle, better knowing the deleterious effects of a doctrine breathing hate and anger—better acquainted with a faith that works by love and purifies the heart—assured the early Christians that a knowledge of God's universal and endless love—of Christ as a propitiation for the sins of whole world—was calculated to keep them from committing sin. And in accordance therewith he writes—"Beloved, let us love one another, for love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God. He that loveth not, knoweth not God; for God is love. In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him. Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins. Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought to love one another." Here, the love of God to us, is the only motive given why we should love God;—no endless hell—no wrathful omnipotence is held up to scare us into the love of God or of our fellow beings.

The only test given by the apostle, by which we may know whether we are born of God—that is, whether we have got a true hope—is, "every one that loveth, is born of God, and knoweth God." Not, every one that is willing to be endlessly damned himself—or reconciled to the endless damnation of his fellow beings. On the contrary, the apostle declares—"We have seen, and do testify that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world"—not to render endlessly miserable, or to condemn to endless woe, a great portion of the world.

Mark, also, how he reprobates all fear and distrust of God—and condemns the idea that God ever hated the Christian, either before or after he was converted.—"And we have known (says the apostle,) and believed the love that God hath to us. God is love, and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God and God in him." Oh, with such a test of discipleship before us, who need resort to a priest, or a conference meeting, or to an anxious seat to learn whether their hope is a true or a false one!

And again, says the apostle—"There is no fear in love, but perfect love casteth out fear; because fear hath torment." Truly has it torment, if the despairing prayers, and heavy groans, and bitter sighs and tears shed in our revival meetings are any proofs of suffering and pain. "He that feareth, is not made perfect in love," says the apostle. How far from perfection, then, is that system of doctrines, whose Alpha and Omega—whose beginning, progress and end of conversion and religion is fear—fear—and fear only?

But, to conclude our quotations from the Epistle before us—"We love Him (God,) because he first loved us"—not because we saw he was angry with sinners and intended to wreak his vengeance on them eternally.—But, "If a man say I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen? And this commandment have we from him, That he who loveth God, love his brother also."

How many are there who having "got religion," as it is called, in the modern manner, profess to manifest their greater love to God, by hating more fervently their brethren who are Unitarians, or Universalists, or non-professors, or infidels. Sad proof of loving God, this!

But you can not avoid perceiving how very—very different is the spirit and practice, continually repeated, of the beloved apostle's Epistle, from those manifested by many modern Christians—and when you reflect that such are the teachings of our Lord's particularly beloved disciple—of him who being most like the Saviour, was most particularly honored with the regard and friendship of Jesus—when this is remembered, you will doubtless agree with me, in regarding this love—so especially inculcated by the beloved John—as the very essence of Christian principle—faith—hope and practice.

UNIVERSALISM

In Canton.—Br. Waggoner writes us, "Our affairs here are in a very wholesome condition indeed. Peace, union and prosperity still continue with us. Our congregations during the winter have numbered from 300 to 600 hearers. Our Bible classes have just closed for the season, and our Sunday Schools commence their sessions again the first Sunday in May." Br. W. preaches in Canton and Potsdam, St. Lawrence county—so that Potsdam is probably included in the above.

Fort Plain.—Br. Barray writes—"Our congregations are large, and increasing interest is continually manifested. The friends are in high spirits—the slips are all rented, and for enough to defray all expenses for the ensuing year. Mighty attempts have been made to check us in our operations, but all have failed, and the pleasure of the Lord has prospered in our hands. There is a general awakening in all this section.

"At Canajoharie, where protracted meetings have been in operation throughout the winter, and spring thus far, the people are waking up." In a letter of later date, he informs us that he lectured there during the week, and the meetings were well attended. Br. D. Skinner also gave a few lectures to crowded congregations. A subscription was started to build a Universalist church, and $2000 subscribed. Time will show the full results of this awakening. May it be permanent and onward.

Little Falls.—Last fall a few friends in this romantic village resolved to awake from the deep sleep that has rested for many years on our friends in that vicinity, and have some preaching. The difficulty was to procure a place in which to hold the meetings. A few meetings were held, however, in despite of the strenuous efforts of some opposers to prevent it. Liberty Hall, a large upper room capable of holding about 800 persons, having been completed, was procured, and the writer engaged for one fourth of the time. The meetings were well attended, and Br. Hicks and Br. Skinner were procured to preach occasionally beside the Sundays on which stated meetings were held, so that nearly one half the time has been occupied. No society has yet been organized, but our friends contemplate forming one, and are considering the subject of erecting a house, which they are probably able to do. If the Universalists in that section are only faithful in practicing their principles, and united in their efforts, we have no doubt that our cause there will be more prosperous and permanent than it was many years ago.

Herkimer.—Br. Skinner has labored in this village, and in Mohawk village, for more than a year past, with good success. The congregations are large, and the friends encouraged and active. They have meetings one fourth of the time.

Frankfort.—In this place, and at Remington's corners, Br. Skinner has also labored for more than a year past, to good purpose. In Frankfort a large public school room is too small to hold the audiences, and our friends will be obliged to build a church, or buy one from some other denomination. At Remington's Corners we own a share in the Union house.

Utica.—In this city the society has long labored under pecuniary embarrassment, and probably suffered still more from the want of an able and efficient Pastor who could devote all his time and energies to their service. They have now settled Br. Soule, and he has removed here, and just commenced his pastoral labors—though he has preached here since January 1st, to good acceptance. There seems to be some moving of the waters, and we hope and pray that our friends may be awakened, and become zealous, and united, and active in carrying on the good work.

Sullivan.—Br. Skinner preaches here to large audiences, one fourth of the time. It is believed that the cause is advancing in this section, though I can not speak of it from particular information.

Annsville and Lee.—Br. Robert Queal has preached in these two towns the whole time, since May last. His congregations have kept increasing all the time, and his labors have been highly blessed in advancing a knowledge and practice of Universalism. He is young in years, and entered the ministry only about a year ago. His labors have therefore been too arduous for him; for in addition to his Sunday services, he has lectured frequently, and talked much in Washingtonian meetings. I believe it is his intention to preach but half the time during the coming year, in Lee—leaving the friends in Annsville to procure some one else—and to occupy the remainder of his time in preaching in more distant places, or in study, as circumstances may require.

Syracuse.—Circumstances of peculiar exclusiveness on the part of some who had been aided by our friends under a profession of liberality, compelled our friends in this flourishing village, in Salina, Geddes, Liverpool and vicinity, to concentrate their numbers and means, and organize a Universalist society, and support preaching in some central place. The best place is Syracuse. They have done so, and now have preaching three fourths of the time in a large public Hall. If they can sustain the position and duties they have assumed, (and it is believed they can,) they will probably settle a preacher among them next fall or winter (if not earlier,) and take measures to build a good and commodious church. God grant they may succeed; for the location is one of the best in that region.

We intend to enlarge this list, and furnish a full account, from time to time, of our cause in this region, if our ministering brethren will only give us the materials. It may be well to say here, in brief, that Millerism and protracted meetings have raged in all this region; but generally the latter have been moderate affairs and successful, compared with what they were some ten or twelve years ago. They have, also, rather aided than injured us. A. B. G.

N. B.—Ministering and other brethren in this State will please furnish us, when writing this way, with statements of the condition of our cause in all the places where they preach either statedly or occasionally.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

REMOVALS.—Br. H. E. Whitney to Rome, Bradford county, Pa.,—preaches there and in Orwell, Le Raysville and Windham. Br. W. N. Barber from Guilford Centre, to Dummerstown, Vt. Br. W. H. Griswold, we learn from a friend of his, has removed from Andover, to Dudley, Mass. Br. M. Ballou, of Portsmouth, N. H., has accepted the pastorate of the Elizabeth street church in New York city—the one lately occupied by Br. I. D. Williamson, whose health compelled a cessation of preaching. Br. Williamson is tarrying for the present in Charleston, S. C. Br. B. B. Bunker, of Alexander, has accepted an invitation to settle with the church and society in Lockport, which is prospering and growing strong. Br. Jonathan Phelps has removed from East Lebanon to Enfield, N. H. Br. S. C. Bulkeley from Lamprey river to Danvers New Mills, Mass. Br. John Nichols from Claremont, N. H., to Lynn, Mass. Br. J. J. Putnam from Lowell, Mass., to Lebanon, N. H.

DEATHS.

In Lansing, Tompkins county, on the 21st of March, in the 30th year of her age, Mrs. NANCY TILLSON, wife of Ezra Tillson. She died as she lived, an unwavering believer in God's illimitable grace; and through a protracted illness of near six months, she exhibited an extraordinary degree of Christian patience and resignation. Of her character naught could be said, other than "she was a Universalist;" and she truly adorned her profession. A sister who had recently been converted to the Methodists, said of her, that she had experienced religion, or else she could not exhibit those marks of patience and Christian resignation which she did. By her request I obtained Br. Cheeny, who conversed and prayed with her, which seemed to give her much satisfaction; she conversing with the utmost composure. I also, by her request, solicited the attendance of Br. Clark; but by unavoidable occurrences he did not arrive at my house, until the time of her death. It was her wish that a Universalist should preach her funeral sermon; but a majority of the relatives being Methodists, and holding out the idea that a house could not be obtained, and should Br. Clark preach he would have to preach in the street, (the house Br. Tillson living in being very small,) and the uncertainty of getting any one to go for Br. Clark, they obtained Br. Humphry, a Methodist, with whose preaching, as I have been informed, there could be but little fault found, all things considered. May her patience and resignation, and in short all her Christian virtues, long be remembered and duly cherished. ABRAHAM OZMAN, JR.

In Scipio, March 26, of congestive fever, Miss HELEN MARIA, eldest daughter of Dr. P. Hurd, aged 21 years and 10 months. This amiable and strong-minded young lady, was firm in the faith of the Restitution, and it enabled her to die calmly and without fear, in the hope of meeting a redeemed world in the presence of God. Great and afflictive has been the loss of her parents and friends—but what is their loss is her gain. May the abundant consolations of truth console them. G. W. M.

At his residence, in the village of Martinsburg, on Saturday, March 25th; DAVID WATERS, Esq., aged 66 years.—Mr. Waters was one of the first settlers in the town. Possessing great powers of strength and intellect—persevering in all the laudable enterprises of the day—few men have done more for the honor and advancement of the improvements of the country. Liberal in his principles, honorable and humane in his intercourse in society; virtuous in feeling and practice; truly may it be said, that he was one of those whom it is a loss to lose.

He died as he lived; in full faith and confidence in his Maker, without fear and trembling, conscious that his work upon earth was done, and that his spirit would return to the God who gave it, he quietly resigned himself to sleep.

His funeral was attended at the Presbyterian church, by Rev. J. Whitney, of Rochester, and a very large concourse of friends and citizens witnessed their esteem for their departed fellow traveller, and listened with the deepest interest to the consolations of the Holy Spirit, as recorded by John xiv: 26. Br. Whitney was assisted by the friendship of the Rev. Messrs. Barney and Graves, clergymen of the village. H. C.

At his residence in Morristown, on the 8th of February last, MARK A. CHILD, Esq., aged 72 years. With the deceased the writer had but little opportunity of gaining an acquaintance; but by information I learn that he removed to this place from Greenfield, Saratoga county, about seven years ago—that for the last forty years of his life he had been an unwavering believer in the heart-cheering and soul-sustaining doctrine of the ultimate holiness and happiness of the entire human race—that he was a friend of peace and good order, and has spent a life of usefulness, and maintained a character above reproach. He departed this life lamented by all who knew him. His funeral was attended on the 10th, by Elder Bogart, (Baptist.) B. HALL

* * Will the Trumpet, Union, and Luminary, please copy? In Columbus, March 25th, LEWIS S. WARREN, aged 19 years. A young man of much promise has thus fallen before that frightful curse of the present generation—consumption. He has left behind him a rich remembrance of virtuous affection—all that now remains of life, hope, and happiness. God comfort the mourning friends. Z. COOK.

In Brownville, Feb. 8th, of consumption, Miss ABI BARTHOLOMEW, in the 18th year of her age. The graces of character possessed by this young lady, endeared her to all with whom she was acquainted. She lived beloved, and died lamented. May the consolations of the Gospel be with and comfort the mourners. H. BOUGHTON.

In Canton, January 28th, Mrs. ROSALINDA, wife of C. Z. Botsford, aged 34 years. This was an amiable woman, and the second companion our brother has been called to part with. Yet he enjoys full confidence in God and mourns not without hope. The Lord bless him and his little son.

JAKE'S EXPERIENCE.

BY PIXLEY FIDDLETRAP, ESQ.

There was our friend Jake, that studied law in Puckerville; just the drollest fellow that ever drew the vital air. He was as pleasant and agreeable a being as the world ever saw, and a downright queer genius. Jake was a general favorite of both old and young, in the village—not an evening gathering but what he had an invitation, and so pleasant—so agreeable to the ladies, that there was not one in town with whom he was not on general good terms. He was the king at stories—he'd tell a good one, and crack the best joke of the ring, so that when we saw him poking round his quid a little out of the way, (he was a scientific chewer,) then we always looked out for a rouser—one that would do the work of shaking the fat sides and clearing the cob-webs clean out of the brain. He didn't go away "round by Robin Hood's barn" either, and tell what the man's grand-father said and did when he was a boy; but he come right to the "criterion point," and then 'twas all over—except the laughing, which occupied about half an hour.

Thus did time go on with us at Puckerville, until one

Sunday, when we were all to meeting, the preacher said there was to be a protracted meeting in the village, and that it would begin the next day. Now this took us all by surprise; for Jake, who generally got the news before it was fairly cold, or any of us, had not heard a word about it. But I went directly home, with a determination to attack Aunt Sarah, (who was a member of the church,) and learn a little of the matter. I knew I could do it by using a little "soft soap"—tickling her vanity by speaking of her beauty in her girlish days, (you know we are compelled to speak of the beauty of old maids in the past tense!) and it happened just as I had planned. Aunt Sarah evaded my question about the meeting; so, thinks I to myself, I'll hold on awhile and then assail her in another quarter. So, by and by I spoke to her of what I heard my uncle say, that at twenty she was considered by the beaux, the handsomest young lady in the village. This took like a charm!—she swallowed it right down, and immediately her eyes brightened up, while I laughed—in my sleeve! Then I poured another sentence or two into her ears, till she began to look as though she was on the right side of thirty, and then I mentioned something about the protracted meeting—

"La! yes Pixley," said she, "you spoke to me about it before, and I meant to have told you then, but some how or other I forgot it." So she went right on, and gave me the whole riddle, and I found that by the meeting folks the matter had all been "cut and dried" as the saying is, and that in the first place all means were to be employed to get Jake; and him once fast, they were pretty certain of obtaining about all the young gentlemen and ladies in the village!

Had not Aunt Sarah told me that I must say nothing about it, I should have told Jake and put him on the guard, and so he might have weathered the storm; but as it was, I could only look out for myself, which I did with fear and trembling. Yes, with trembling; for in those by-gone days, with me, "getting religion" was but another name for getting misery! Then I looked on the gloom spread all over the countenances of the meeting folks, and supposed that it was an index to the heart.—This I have since found out was a mistake, and that we can not always judge the quality of the egg by the looks of the shell.

Monday ten o'clock came, and being invited by Aunt Sarah, I went with her to the meeting house, and entered with a heavy heart, which was rendered no more joyful when I looked at the chief speaker, Elder Smashall—from a distance, of course! Now you may think this a queer name. Well, be it so—he was a queer man. The cognomen of Smashall, was not out of place in this instance in the least; for he was of a giant frame, but rather thin in flesh. He stood full six feet three, in his boots—long swinging arms, with fists at the end of them, that would have answered for beetles—coarse features, and a mouth—my stars! that would have sent a modern Jonah right off into a fit! When he stepped up into the pulpit and opened that mouth, let me tell you, the big thunder stood back, and the old church jarred and echoed again!

The sermon was handed out to us with power, and when out, I thought that there was at least one who would not be found there in the future. Tuesday morning the battle had been fairly set in array—all Puckerville was up in arms—old men, young men, and women too, drabbling through the slop, flocking to the meeting house, so there were scarcely enough left at home to do the cooking. In the evening reports began to fly, which proved my fears too true. Jake had been there all day, and he was awfully troubled. One had heard him sigh—another had seen tears upon his face, and he left the house that night with a heavy step; "he'd surely be brought out." Wednesday came, and Jake was not in the meeting, but some one had seen him, and he looked dreadfully solemn, as though he had buried his father—lost his purse—or else "obtained a hope! I couldn't stand it any longer, but determined forthwith to make Jake a visit. I went to his boarding house—knocked at his room, but all was silent. I listened at the key-hole and thought I heard sobs—I called his name; but no answer—"alas!" thought I, as I left the house, "poor Jake, there'll be no more parties in Puckerville this year; and if this don't smash all that I ever heard of! Jake Pucker! who'd 'ave thought it!" But never mind, a bad promise they say is better broken than kept; so I concluded I would go to meeting that evening, and see for myself.

The bell informed us of the hour for meeting—it sounded heavy, and with a measured step I went toward the meeting house, and entered it—things looked melancholy—Jake was there—he looked solemn—very—I felt bad. The sermon came down that night with tenfold power; there was not a dry eye in the house—among the meeting folks, I mean—it was a stirring effort. After the sermon, the preacher said, that there was an opportunity for "the mourners" to speak—my heart began to thump—Jake rose up—I looked at him—he was sorrowful—I drew a long breath—looked at him again—a tear stood in his eye—I took out my handkerchief—I did not weep, but then I could not see plain—things appeared dim. Jake moved toward the altar—the house was still as death—it was a solemn moment. Jake turned round, and with a few sobs and sighs, related the following EXPERIENCE.

"My brethren, when notice was given out for this meeting to commence, I laughed at the idea—getting religion in a whirlwind—by steam; and when I first came here, it was with a supposition that it would afford a subject for sneering. But I tell you, my brethren, I have been troubled—awfully troubled—there is power in this meeting; and for one I have felt it, and in hope that it may be of service to some unthinking people, I will relate the manner in which it was done.

"It was Tuesday evening, that I was first awakened, when we listened to the powerful sermon from Br. Smashall. It went to the bottom of heart, and awoke feelings that I did not know were there. On my way home, I resolved that I would not come here again—for if I did, I was afraid that I would have to give up my youthful pleasures, and I thought it was better to grieve away the spirit, and enjoy these a little longer. That night I retired at an early hour, but I was so much distressed, that it was a long time before I could get to sleep, and when I did, I dreamed the most dreadful dream that ever man dreamed.

"I thought that I was taken violently sick, and the doctors said there was no hope of my being better, and I could live but a few hours; and true it was, for I kept fast sinking down, and at last the folks were called in to take the parting farewell! Oh! it was a fearful sight—to see that kind father with sorrow upon his countenance—and the tears of the mother as she bent over her suffering son—and the sighs of those sisters—it even pains me now, for it does not look like a dream, it was so like life! The minister too was there, to offer his consolation, but it was of no avail—I had no hope—how shocking the thought—no hope! Oh! then did I grieve, that I so slighted the protracted meeting.

[Here Jake was interrupted by sighs and groans from every quarter of the house—it was a solemn time—every body was affected—Puckerville had never beheld such a scene before. In a few minutes Jake went on.]

"Death came and relieved me from my earthly trials; but such relief it was, as I wish not soon again to experience. I have no recollections of "the dark valley," but I found myself upon a dry and barren waste, urged onward by some invisible though resistless power. As I travelled on solitary and alone, I remarked that the ground grew still, more dry—here and there a lonely shrub appeared with withered leaves; but all else was a desert land. Soon in the hazy distance I thought I could see a cloud of smoke going upwards—onward I went, and in a moment could see the walls of something, I could not yet tell what. As I advanced the ground became more parched—I put my hand upon it—it was warm! I began to tremble, and tried to turn back, but horrible to relate, I could not turn round! But forward I passed, and smoke began to issue from the cracks in the ground—it grew hotter, and soon my shoes began to scroll up—the perspiration was pouring from my brow, and in the effort to throw off my coat, my eye caught a view of the wall I had seen before—I could see the gate plainly, and over it was placarded in large letters—"THE BOTTOMLESS PIT!" Horror of horrors! and was such to be my endless doom! It was even so, and in a moment I was at the gate, and could hear a dull, heavy rumbling within, and now and then a wild heart-rending shriek!

[Here Jake could hardly speak—his knees smote together—the whole assembly was in tears—I looked at Aunt Sarah—she looked at me; and with such a look—as much as to say, "Pixley, beware!"—Jake proceeded:]

"A bell hung there beside that dreadful gate. I seized the hammer—it hissed at the touch of my fingers, and crisped the flesh of my hand. Though it was burning hot, I could not drop it, but immediately smote the bell. The red sparks flew, and how did that bell ring in my ears; but it was only the prelude to sounds more dreadful! The gate opened on its creaking hinges—I stepped in, but the scene before me can not be described. Suffice it to say, that there was endless despair in its truth, and its reality is beyond the conception of mortals! There I stood, knee deep in the burning lava—a lurid glare went up upon the thick dark column of smoke, and the first breath that I drew, made my lungs fairly boil! I looked away across the undulating wave, and could see here and there a wretched being, with head just above the molten liquid, uttering heart-rending cries, which served but to mingle with the infernal yells of imps and dragons, and render the place more dismal! I had but little time for observation however, ere the king of that doleful abode made his appearance—with his long tail, he lashed his sides—now would he spatter the burning lava upon my flesh, which was already crisped and frying—then he would grin horribly, and finally with the greatest sung froid, thus addressed me:—

"Your name, sir?"

Jake Pucker.

"Where from, sir?"

Right from Puckerville.

"Ah! Well what's the news in Puckerville?"

Great doings there—holding a protracted meeting, and every body is getting religion.

As I said this, he turned round—somewhat agitated—waved his black flag, and gave directions for his aids to march his host, that he might repair forthwith to Puckerville, and do battle for the kingdom. Then turning to me, asked—

"But who's carrying on the meeting?"

Elder Smashall.

As I said this, he turned again—waved his black flag once more, and with a voice that resounded throughout the pit, addressed his aids:—"Marshall not the host—Elder Smashall is there—he'll do as well for me as I could do for myself—he's one of my Spartan Band!"

Poor Jake!—he had no time to say any more. Deacon Longface rose up with a pious grin on his countenance, and with a holy grip took Jake—one hand by the collar, and the other by the hinder part of his pantaloons—and put him straight through the hole made by the carpenter—right out of the synagogue; heels over head!

But I felt relieved—and appearances lie much, or there were some meeting folks felt as though a burden had been removed! Jake never darkened the doors again—there was no meeting on Thursday—Elder Smashall had gone home!

BRIEF SKETCH OF A SERMON.

BY REV. D. PICKERING.

Delivered at Butternuts, Otsego co., March 19th, noticing in a religious manner the death of Mr. Charles C. Wilcox, of Leavenworth, county of Crawford, and state of Indiana; and the death of Mrs. Minerva Yates, of Butternuts, who died March 17th, 1843.

[Published by request.]

"As we have borne the image of the earthly, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." 1 Corinthians xv: 49.

Seldom are we called to a more serious realization of the fading nature of earthly things, and the vanity of our mortal existence, than in the repeated instances of mortality in which the providence of God is passing before us. The fairest prospects are blasted as in a moment, while no rank or fortune can rescue from the cold hand of death.

Still are our affections riveted to the earth! Still we hug as a sweet morsel the contracted span, though big with disappointment, affliction and pain. Truly, our days are few and evil! And can such an existence, exclusively considered, be called a blessing? And yet we dare not challenge the wisdom or justice of God, nor question his benevolence! May it not be reasonable to expect a future and better life? Are not infinite wisdom, power and benevolence sufficient to excite the hope in us, that the storms of time and the tempests of affliction will give place to a cloudless eternity, and a deathless inheritance? The pupil, we know, must plod through the painful hours of laborious study, before he can enjoy the refinements of education; and days of toil and anxiety are allotted to the husbandman, before he is permitted to realize the bounties of a plenteous harvest. But we may add, in the language of the great apostle, "It is through much tribulation that we must enter into the kingdom of God." And for our encouragement in this vale of tears, and to silence all murmurings against the appointments of divine wisdom, an apostle, inspired by the holy spirit, hath announced—"As we have borne the image of the earthly, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly."

In the improvement of this subject, I propose to consider three things—

I. The earthly man, whose image we bear, and the inconveniences to which we are subjected thereby.

II. A brief notice will be taken of the heavenly image which we are destined to bear, and the time and place of its full and perfect allotment.

III. Offer a few remarks upon the advantages to be enjoyed from a present conformity to that image by faith.

I. I am to consider the earthly man, whose image we bear, and the inconveniences to which we are subjected thereby.

By the earthly man St. Paul doubtless meant the man that was formed of dust of the ground. The last and crowning work of the whole creation.

1. Man is formed of those elements which compose all forms, and are constantly subject to change. The infinite variety of new forms which succeed each other in the whole scenery of nature, evince the mutability of all earthly productions. Hence it is uncertain whether the blessings which he enjoys to-day, may not be placed beyond his reach to-morrow.

2. He has desires and wants, embracing the things of time, and which require a continual provision of elementary productions for their satisfaction, with every returning day. Hence the great uncertainty of human enjoyments and human pleasures.

3. He has passions which are earthly, and like the elements of nature, they wage war with his mental comforts, and often lead him into captivity to the law of sin. The best of men have been overcome, and taken up the lamentation, "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?"

4. Man in his natural state is subject to pain, sickness and distress. The laboring pulse, the throbbing temples, the aching head, the revelling fever, the chilling ague, and the slowly decaying vitals, all evince the feebleness of the human constitution. The most hale and firm, are soon enfeebled by the ragings of pale disease. Even the mediums of our earthly pleasures are often converted to avenues of pain—"As sparks fly upward, so man is born unto trouble."

5. Man in his natural state is subject to disappointment. The few and flattering forms which contribute so largely to present happiness, suddenly disappear, and call up bitter and poignant reflections to fill the place of those visionary forms of earthly bliss. On whatever object of terrestrial origin man places his hopes and affections for enjoyment, he is liable to disappointment, because every object is constantly subject to change its appearance, or to be removed from his embrace. A thousand casualties lie in the path of human enjoyment to cross the expectation of the traveller in time, and forcibly impress the mind with the sentimental acknowledgment of the wise man—"All is vanity and vexation of spirit."

6. Man in his natural state is subject to death. His constitution is mortal. Each revolving sun; each passing hour; each flying moment, and every beating pulse, hastens him onward to the grave, and urges him forward to the verge of the invisible abode. Those forms, wrought with such exquisite skill, must fade and moulder into dust. The places which now know us, must be filled with other forms in long succession, till the voice of the angel of death shall hush the tumult of the universal family in the silence of the grave.

7. Man, in his natural state, is subject to condemnation, remorse and regret. The human race were created the subjects of a moral law; and the imperfections of human nature are such, that "all have sinned," and consequently have rendered themselves obnoxious to the curse of the law: for it is written, "cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law, to do them." None are exempted from this curse, because "all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God." Nor can the merit of any human action redeem them from this state. In vain do we look to the powers of earth for relief. In vain do we appeal to the arm of flesh for comfort and support: and in vain do we enumerate acts of obedience to the law as the ground of our justification: for "by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified in his sight."

II. A brief notice will now be taken of the heavenly image which we are destined to bear, and the time and place of its full and perfect allotment.

The heavenly man here spoken of, is Jesus Christ. "The second man is the Lord from heaven—The image of the invisible God—The brightness of the Father's glory and the express image of his person."

1. All the passions of this heavenly man, centre in love. St. Paul declares that "we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is."

2. His desires were heavenly. So will ours be, when we bear that image.

3. He was spiritually minded. So shall we be: and "to be spiritually minded is life and peace."

4. The heavenly man is free from all changes. "The same yesterday, to-day and forever." "We shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is."

5. The heavenly man is free from all inconveniences. 1. From changes of fortune and character. 2. From disappointment. 3. From sin. 4. From sorrow and affliction. 5. From all misery and pain. 6. From condemnation. 7. From death—"the last enemy."

The time allotted for us to bear the fullness of this image, is at the resurrection, when we shall put off this body of sin and death. "The flesh lusteth against the spirit;" and while the tree remains, it will bear its fruit. "Lust, when it conceiveth, bringeth forth sin." But thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory over the lusts and corruptions of the earthly man.

Our text invites the welcome anticipation of impartial emancipation, and its context affords the pleasing intelligence of universal deliverance in Christ, the heavenly man. "For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." Verses 21, 22. "Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule, and all authority, and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy shall be destroyed, death." Verses 24-26.

The apostle closes this sublime and consoling anticipation in the following language—"Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood can not inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption. Behold, I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed. In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" Verses 50-55. From this sublime description we pass—

III. To offer a few remarks on the advantages to be enjoyed from a present conformity to that image, by faith.

1. Deliverance from slavish fear, which brings continual torment and vexation to the mind.

2. It brings deliverance from unreconciliation, which is a source of constant misery and wretchedness to the heart of sensibility.

3. It blunts the edge of present affliction, by its glorious prospect beyond the grave.

4. It unites our affections to the Saviour, and gives a revivifying hope, by the lively exercise of faith.

5. It gives light, and comfort, and peace. It inspires humility, by showing us that its value infinitely transcends the reach of human merit. It works by love, and purifies the heart. It gives the unspeakably happy assurance of a better life to come. In short; it imparts—

"What nothing earthly gives or can destroy;

The soul's calm sunshine and the heartfelt joy."

I shall now close with a few addresses.

And now my afflicted friends and brethren, you are called to mourn the transitory loss of the society of near, dear and affectionate kindred. But I confidently trust that you do not as those who have no hope. Every duty which kindness, affection and sympathy could prompt, has been discharged to them during their illness. But all these proved unavailing; for the unerring providence of God has called them from all the scenes of earth and time, to repose in the silent slumbers of death, and left you to look by faith beyond the vale of tears, to meet them in that blissful abode, where both you and those for whom you mourn will be clothed in garments of light, with the celestial robes of immortality and glory.

Your son, who was dear to your hearts, evinced the steadfastness of his faith in the great Redeemer, and has serenely fallen asleep in the arms of his Saviour; enjoying the full assurance of a happy life to come.

May the happy influence of his faith dwell richly in your hearts, and in the hearts of his surviving brethren and sisters, kindred and friends. And may you all be comforted under this sore affliction, cultivate the faith which cheered his dying moments, and thus rejoice in the firm and unshaken confidence of "the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began."

And my deeply afflicted friend and brother, who hath thus unexpectedly been called to experience the sudden prostration of your dearest earthly hopes, in being called to part with the much loved and prudent companion of your joys and woes, I would tender the rich and immortal consolations of the Gospel of eternal life. You have no reason to believe but that your present loss is essential gain to her departed spirit. With calm composure of mind she met the prospect of her speedy dissolution, which leaves you no room to doubt her resignation to the mind and will of her heavenly Father. O, walk, with the dear children which she has left in your charge, as she also walked, in all respects, wherein she has followed her Saviour; and cherish the confident assurance that you will soon meet in bliss, to part no more, forever.

And may the honored parents, brothers and sisters, partake of the rich consolations of grace, "which are neither few nor small," and look forward with the welcome and grateful hope of meeting her "in that house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens," to spend an immortality of mutual joy and delight, where tears shall be wiped from off all faces.

Now to this waiting congregation, I beg leave to address a few words. We are all hastening upon the level of time, to that secret bourne from which no traveller can return. Let us all improve the fleeting moments as they pass, and be in habitual readiness to meet that trying moment whenever it shall come, with calm composure of spirit, and with the strong and heart-reviving confidence, "that we have in heaven a better and enduring substance," where the sorrow of parting shall never come. And may the God of all grace sanctify us all for his immortal rest. Amen.

WHAT IS DEATH?

BY REV. IRA WASHBURN.

As we look around us on every hand, we behold the desolating ravages of time; we see that many who were with us yesterday are gone to-day; we behold our friends, one after another, departing from the shores of time to enter that world which we have not surveyed, but which lies far beyond the ken of mortal vision.

We ourselves feel that we know not the length of our own days, but that "we spend our days as a tale that is told." We may arise from our couch with a countenance beaming with health and joy; but ere the dim shades of evening fall around us, the bier and winding sheet may be our repose.

To us all is uncertainty. But all men are anxious to know their final destiny, and therefore it is that we often hear the inquiry, "What is death?" In endeavoring to answer this question we shall be forced to notice the prevailing opinions in regard to this subject. Death has been for ages styled the "king of terrors." Christians have looked upon it as such, and too often has it proved a terror to the soul that is about to bid farewell to the scenes of earth.

But why is it so? Why have many people who have led a truly Christian life, looked upon the hour of death as one big, with sorrow and anguish!—Why have they been so overwhelmed with despair, when called to close up their earthly account and lie down in the cold and silent grave?

Why has the countenance of the mother been so often shaded with the gloom of despair, as she follows the beloved child of her bosom to the final resting place of all living? To these questions we know of no answer but the fact that they have been taught to believe in a religion which leaves the future state in darkness and uncertainty.

They have believed that their friends, their children, that they themselves were exposed to the agonies of endless suffering, and they have nothing that assures them that they are either numbered among the elect, or that by their good works they have purchased a state of rest in the future world. Therefore the destiny of themselves and their friends is as a sealed volume, and the mind is left a prey to fear and uncertainty in regard to its own future destiny and that of those who are near and dear to it.

Their religion teaches them that in the future world, fathers are to be separated from mothers, children from parents, and therefore they are uncertain whether they and their friends are to be among the redeemed or the lost; and this uncertainty throws a gloom over life and renders death an object of dread and horror. This seems to be the true cause from which have arisen those fears and doubts that have rendered the death beds of many practical Christians, replete with anguish and sorrow.

But reader, does the religion of Jesus have this tendency on the Christian heart?

Does a belief in the doctrine of the universal grace and salvation of God sink the soul in despair, as it approaches the season of its departure to the "spirit land?" Methinks not; but it robs death of all its terrors and prepares the soul to welcome it as the "necessary agent" commissioned of the Father, to bear it to the abode of purity and peace.

To the believer in universal restitution, death is but the gate through which he enters into rest.—Though he mourns the departure of friends yet he mourns not as those without hope, but he looks forward with an eye of faith to the hour of his own dissolution, and when it comes he is prepared to meet it with resignation and a firm trust in the goodness of God; so that while encircled in the very arms of death, he shouts, "O death, where is thy sting?" and while standing in the portals of the tomb, "O grave, where is thy victory?"

His faith in Christ is so strong, that with Paul he declares, I "know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." He feels no fears for his future welfare, but armed with the panoply of faith he mounts the victorious chariot of redemption, which carries him safely over the dark Jordan of death to the blissful shores of immortal life and glory.

Such is the excellency of that faith which robs death of all its chilling horrors, and administers peace and consolation to the dying believer. Oh, how sweet it is to die when we are brought to realize, that

"Jesus can make a dying bed Feel soft as downy pillows are."

Reader, make this faith yours. Put your trust in Israel's God, who is both willing and able to save; and when the fleeting scenes of earth are fast receding from your view, you will enjoy its consolations. When death throws the dark mantle of the tomb around you, "faith in God" and his promises will destroy his terrors, and give you strength to meet him with triumph, and crown you with victory and endless rest.

DUTIES OF UNIVERSALISTS.

1. It is our duty to be more zealously engaged in promoting the interests of our holy cause. This will lead our opposers to think that we place some value upon the faith which we profess, and will consequently give them more confidence in our pretensions.

2. We should be careful to lead virtuous and godly lives, abstaining from even the appearance of evil. This will have a tendency to do away with the objection so common among our opposers, that the tendency of Universalism is to licentiousness and immorality; for, when they see that the professors of this doctrine are among the most moral, upright, and Christian men in the community, they can not longer contend with any show of consistency, that the natural influence of this faith is immoral. "By their fruits ye shall know them."

3. It is the duty of all parents who profess belief in Universalism, to improve every favorable opportunity, in instructing their children in all the important characteristics of their faith, that they may grow up understanding believers and advocates of the truth. Parents are far too regardless of their duty in this particular. They do not duly realize, that the impressions which the mind receives in early life, frequently remain in full force and strength during the whole period of existence. If, then, they would have their children imbibe those religious principles, which teach the final destruction of sin and the ingathering of all things in Christ, let them see that they early learn the habit of attending Universalist meetings, and have their minds well fortified against the numerous wiles and devices of the adversary. "Just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined."

4. It is the duty of Universalists to use all consistent endeavors to persuade their opposers to attend Universalist meetings, that they may thus be enabled to learn correctly the real merits of that doctrine which they oppose. In a vast majority of instances, the most violent opposition to Universalism originates from a total misapprehension of its real teachings—hence the importance of adopting all consistent measures for the removal of this ignorance, that they may behold the bright beamings of Gospel truth, unobscured by any dark shade of unbelief. Ignorance is the parent of bigotry and superstition.

5. It is also the duty of Universalists to do all in their power for the aid and support of those periodicals which are devoted to the defence and promulgation of our faith. This duty is too much neglected, to the great inconvenience of our editors and publishers, and to the detriment of our cause. It is well known, that there are hundreds in the land who dare not for their lives attend a Universalist meeting, where they can hear Universalism explained and enforced—but if they can get hold of a Universalist paper, and retire from the observation of the curious and inquisitive, they will read hour after hour, and thus gain that knowledge of our sentiments in secret, which pride, or bigotry, or the fear of "the world's dread laugh," prevented them from gaining in the public congregation on the Sabbath. Let Universalists, then, take (and pay for) one or more religious periodicals, and freely lend them to such of their neighbors, as possess courage to read them, and intelligence to comprehend their teachings.

LETTERS OF THE NEW-ENGLAND SPY.....NO. II.

—, Feb. 16th, 1843.

MY DEAR F:—You ask, "what I know of the East Roxbury community?" And you remark further, that you have "much curiosity to know something of their affairs, and what are the advantages they present;" and you continue, "I would like to know how far their Ideal is answered by the Real."

By this inquiry, I understand that you have caught somewhat of the true fire, and that it is burning within you. In my last letter I remarked, that "something more is wanted;" that the present relation of rich and poor is unsatisfactory. And in the above inquiries I think I find evidence of this fact. I think I see there the yearnings of an earnest soul after something better, more satisfactory, more in unison with that great truth of the Gospel, man's universal brotherhood.

Sorry am I that I can not give you the desired information. Concerning the Roxbury community, I know very little. I have indeed heard vague reports, but these can not be relied on, as we know not whether they originated among the enemies or friends of that community. I have, however, seen an article in the Dial that may be considered as authentic on this subject. From that article I learned that this community was as successful thus far, as could be expected of such a vast undertaking, still in its infancy, warring against prejudice and making its way against the whole tide of what is commonly denominated public opinion.—In estimating the success of such an undertaking, an undertaking whose ideal is so beautiful and which promises so much to the world in case it can be realized, we ought not to forget that the first trials must be very imperfect from the very nature of the case. To say that the Roxbury community had been entirely successful thus far,—to say that they had fully realized their ideal in so short a period—would undoubtedly be saying what is not claimed for it by its warmest and most sanguine friends. But that they have not in a measure been successful, that their condition is not better, all things considered and the future taken into account, than it would have been had they remained as they were, toiling fifteen hours of the day for food and raiment, is what I do not believe. That that system which recognizes man as a three-fold being and gives him eight hours for labor, eight hours for study and recreation, and eight hours for repose and rest, possesses decidedly superior advantages to that of our present degrading and soul-debasing system of labor, and is the true system, there can not be a particle of doubt in the mind of any one who is capable of taking a candid and disinterested survey of the two systems in connection with man's three-fold nature, physical, intellectual and moral. The East Roxbury Community purports to be an attempt to realize Christ's idea of society. That this first attempt will be improved by experience and age, and that many things will be suggested by this first trial, which other communities that may arise after them will incorporate into their beginnings, and thus profit by their experience, there is little reason to doubt. For one, I have strong faith in their eventual success. If they have not already, they will, if they persevere, in due time realize fully their true ideal; for there is no true ideal too beautiful to be realized, or that may not be realized, by patience, self-sacrifice and perseverance. I do not believe in your Utopia too sublime to be seen, and too beautiful to be possessed. There is no such world as that.

Still there are some things about the Roxbury Community, as I understand it, to which I must object, and which I could wish were otherwise. In the first place, it is a community, instead of an association. This I do not like. It takes away man's individuality too much. The system of sharehold property as advocated by Fourier and his followers, seems to me to be decidedly preferable. But then, perhaps, I err in this matter. What we want is a system that will furnish a safe and profitable investment of capital; secure to the laborer what he earns, and guarantee to him constant employment; dignify labor and make it attractive; produce unity of interests and unity of action among all classes; put an end to the competition now existing between capital and labor,—the rich and the poor; deeply respect individual liberty; emancipate and elevate the laboring class; make labor universal; and elevate every way, physically, intellectually, morally and socially, the condition of the human race. This is what is needed; this is what true and earnest souls are yearning after; and this is what the system of sharehold property, as now being advocated in England, France and the United States, promises to the world.

Now, about one third of the world are engaged in producing! Is it any wonder that they have to toil fifteen or sixteen out of the twenty four hours of the day? Now, about one third of the world work;—the rest of the world live upon their labor. Is any one prepared to say that this is Christ's idea of society? Has an all-wise Being created all men for labor, and yet ordained that two thirds of mankind shall live without it? Can man ever reach his social destiny in this way? I think not. We need and must have a change in our social organization. We may differ as to the mode in which it is to be brought about, but we must all agree in one thing, and that is, THAT A CHANGE IS NEEDED.

Yours truly, THE SPY.

A SLANDERER EXPOSED.

Cambria, Niagara co., March 7, 1843.

MR. REMMINGTON—SIR:—A man calling himself Elder Ferguson, a Freewill Baptist, has lately been assisting in the "work of the Lord" in this place, taking a part in a protracted effort, "alias excitement." On the evening of the 2d inst., I had a little talk with him; he informed me that he had lately held a discussion with one Mr. Remmington, of Boston, Erie co., a Universalist preacher. He stated that thirty five members of the Universalist church were hopefully converted by means of the discussion, and that the preacher himself was struck with conviction. Such things we are not alarmed at hearing; but I appeal to you for the truth of the matter; and I request you to publish the proceedings of the discussion in the "Evangelical Magazine and Advocate," together with the certificate of the Standing Clerk of the Society at that time; also the names of those thirty five that were converted by Elder Ferguson.

Signed, JOSHUA SABIN.

REPLY.

Dear Brother—Your favor to Br. Remmington only reached him this day. He has been over two weeks in Canada, preaching the Gospel of the grace of God to good acceptance. The contents of your letter have caused a little surprise; for although we are at all times prepared to hear of misrepresentations, yet so outrageous a falsehood we did not really expect to hear propagated. In the first place, there has been no discussion between the Rev. Slanderer, Elder Ferguson, and our esteemed Br. Remmington—nor yet a solitary individual of our society has been converted to this Rev. Slanderer's faith—or to any thing more than a stronger and more powerful conviction of the truth of the blessed doctrine of the Resurrection.—This Rev. Slanderer had been propagating the veriest vagaries through the winter in this place, mixed up with a strong decoction of Millerism; and got up quite an excitement, and has added to his church a number of persons, mostly young.—The excitement, however, is on the wane, and a reaction already is perceptible—and its effects on good morals undoubtedly will go far beyond the maximum of the excitement. A system built upon falsehood and detraction is much to be deprecated by every well wisher to the peace and happiness of society. Our worthy pastor has been laboring indefatigably in word and doctrine with us. Through the winter, our congregations have increased in numbers, and the pure seed of the incorruptible word has been scattered plentifully, we doubt not in good and honest hearts, and we are looking for an abundant harvest of faithful souls, who shall be pillars in the good cause. We last fall commenced building a house for the worship of the one only true God. The house is enclosed, and we expect by the month of July next, to have it consecrated, and that the blessed God whom we are endeavoring to serve in the Gospel of his Son, shall be glorified in the reclamation of hundreds of our wandering fellow beings who are panting for immortality and who shall be delivered from the bondage of fearful foreboding of an endless hell.

With great respect, I am,

Dear brother, yours, etc.

WM. ANDRE,

Standing Clerk of the 1st Universalist Society, Boston, Erie county.

REV. JOHN GRAY.

We are requested to call the attention of some friends Cohoes, Troy, and Attica, as well as in other places where Mr. Gray may have resided, to the following call for information respecting him—such information as may be relied upon, and publicly used if necessary.—There seems to be sufficient proof already that his character will not rise by public investigation, in public esteem. But it is possible that with all his spite, and abuse, and reckless bragging, he may not be quite as bad as Fishpoole, Littlejohn, and others of his school—though his style is rather that of Knapp, Swan, and others of that kidney.

All information may be sent to "Ely T. Marsh, Esq., Frankfort, Herkimer county, N. Y.," who is the author of the call, and has the Rev. Mr. Gray under his special watchcare at present.

SONNET—AN INVOCATION.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

I saw beside a lovely infant sleeping,
An anxious mother stoop—she bent her eye
Upon her child—her bosom heaved a sigh,
And pearly tears were from her eyelids creeping.
What grief—what deep-toned thoughts are stirred within,
To cause such wo! But stay—it is not grief
Nor wo that drinks those tears. For, hark! "To Him,
Who is the widow's God—who grants relief
And guards and governs all, in grateful prayer
I lift my trusting soul—I ask Thy smiles to rest Upon my child—unfold to him Thy word—
Make him the object of Thy tender care!
I ask but this!" The sleeper smiled. The mother's blest,
In that she thinks her prayer in heaven is heard.

[From the Italian of Metastasio.]

If ev'ry one's internal care
Were written on his brow,
How many would our pity share
Who have our envy now!
That fatal secret, if revealed,
On every aching breast,
Would show that only when concealed,
His lot appeared the best.

PROFANITY.....NO. II.

BY REV. S. J. GIBSON.

Men who are in the habit of using profane words, may be divided into three classes; or there are three causes which determine people thus to speak; and to point out these three, shall be the object of the present and two following, brief numbers. The class which we mention at the present time, is composed of those who act almost, if not wholly, from the excitement of the passions.

Some one, either with the intention or without it, insults or offends them, and immediately anger is aroused in the mind, and while burning for revenge, the first thing which engages attention, is, to discharge a volley of oaths and imprecations upon the one who has had the audacity to offend them. And perhaps for this act, they render not themselves responsible to the extent that many people would suppose; for their violent anger often renders them lost to all sober judgment for the time being, and they act partly without understanding. But there is one thing for which responsibility rests upon them to the utmost extent; and that is, for suffering their passions, in the first place, to get beyond the control of their moral powers. It is a duty which the Deity has enjoined upon the children of men, to govern and control their temper, and keep it within its proper bounds. But when they neglect to do this, and thereby call down upon the heads of their fellow beings, the imprecations of Heaven, then they become secondarily responsible for disobeying the express commandment of the Creator:—"Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord, thy God, in vain."

Reader, are you one of those who give vent to your excited passions in this manner? If so, please pause and look at the proceeding during your calm and sober moments. When the wild and desolating whirlwind of anger has spent its fury—when candor has stilled the commotion and maintains its peaceful sway within the heart, then consider the language which you have used, and the thoughts that you have harbored, and say, can you approve them?

Look once at your neighbor, and say from whence came he? Bears he no affinity to yourself?—a creature is he, of a race different from that to which you belong? No! He, like yourself, looks to the same great creative Source for his origin—by the same hand, has been placed upon the stage of life as your brother man. In what manner then have you acted? You have looked away to the throne of your common Father, and called upon him to deal out vengeance upon the head of your own brother! and I leave it for you to say, if you consider such, a commendable course to pursue, or is it acting as one individual should act toward another in this lower world where we are bound together by kindred ties?

But we wish you to look awhile at the unreasonableness as well as the sin of the proceeding. Suppose once that the Creator should hearken to your request, and comply with the same, by forthwith commencing the torture of your neighbor—bathing him in the liquid lava of a burning wo—you would be the first one to raise a voice of supplication and cry, forbear!—and why? Because the suffering of the individual, even were he your bitter enemy, would rouse up sentiments and feelings more noble than those which determined your former act, and you would behold the request in its true light, as unreasonable in the extreme—unjustly made, and consequently the compliance with it would be nothing else than cruelty!

Such must, and we trust will be the conclusion, which you will form during your reflective moments, and hence permit me in friendship to urge upon you the importance of striving to the utmost of your power, to maintain a proper command over your passions. When one has wilfully injured you, or labored for the purpose of doing so, far better to let the rude storm of anger slumber in oblivion, in preference to permitting it to arise and urge you forward to a disobedience of the commandments of the Supreme Being, by using words of profanity. In your conduct toward your foes, pattern after the example of one who suffered far more bitterness than you have ever been called to experience:—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!"—employ none but words dictated by the better sentiments of your heart, candor and sincerity; but above all things, "swear not at all."

Monroeton, Pa.

A GOOD NAME.....NO. I.

"A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches, and loving favor rather than silver and gold." SOLOMON.

Human society is a most wonderfully constructed machine; it combines innumerable interests as moving causes, and contemplates a countless variety of ends. So nice and yet powerful are its operations that every movement places its members in other relations, and imposes on them new obligations.—And how infinite is the diversity of relations!—the parent and child; the husband and wife; the brother and sister; the teacher and pupil; the ruler and citizen; the man of business and patron; the employer and employed, and thus on ad infinitum; and every one of which imposes peculiar duties, has certain rights, weighty and inalienable, involving consequences, if respected or not, of almost life-lasting weal or wo. If a man look around himself, no matter where, on every hand he meets something in the great social world that touches, somehow, his interests, either domestic, pecuniary, moral or intellectual; and his happiness, his welfare is involved. A diversity of tastes, feelings, sentiments and habits, as infinite as the shades of human physiognomy, infuse their influence through the social system, weakening, or strengthening, or multiplying the delicate, invisible fibres which link together the elements of the great body. Old views, feelings and tastes are modified, connected, or exchanged for others. Change, indeed, is visibly and perpetually going on in every part; nothing stands still, though much appears to move but slowly, if at all; yet he who will trouble himself to look to the bottom of things, will see there the elements all in motion—forming new combinations, striking out the channels of new currents, kindling new fires, which are gradually working out to glitter in the actions of daily life, and sparkle in the more peaceful stream of human joy.

In this great world of infinite duties, relations and interests, of perpetual change or transition, we find ourselves placed to work out our social destiny, and to aid in shaping the destinies of those around us, especially those connected with us.—With our little influence, with our imperfect knowledge and limited experience, we are to struggle to make ourselves respected and happy, and assist by what we do and say, in directing the social fortunes of the world. Mixed scene it is, too, where this lot is cast. On every hand duty meets us, and temptation at every turn; for where we find the one, the other is never far off;—and opposing interests conflict; dissimilar opinions, and often hostile, meet as "Greek meets Greek in the tug of war." And after all the pretty things that Sloth hath said and sung, it is no trifling engagement, this life of ours. To keep up its holy watch-fires; to meet and perform its stern and pressing duties; to gather of its wealth; to win its virtues and shun its vices; to nerve up our souls and strengthen our arms to battle with temptation, and enter manly and firm the war-field of passion and perhaps long-abused propensities; to keep the sacred flame of affection burning pure and bright on the holy altar of the heart, to make ourselves respected and esteemed; to be good, true and happy—this is no light thing, no small matter.

So society exists; and upon its relations, duties and interests, the philosopher and moralist have speculated for the last three thousand years.—Theories, perfect as Utopia, have been formed; and poets, catching their beauties, have pictured their charms with almost breathing life and sung their praises in strains that have rapt the soul in visions of the unearthly.

And theories may be well enough as such, and so may poetry, and so indeed is poetry if it paint the beautiful and the true; but it is not with the ideal, with the mere shadows of things, but with life, the stern and sober realities of life, that we all of us have the most to do. And it is lamentable, when we all know if we will but reflect a moment, that life is not a mere semblance, a mere show, a delicately attenuated gossamer which can exist only in the sunshine of an Italian summer-day—that its pilgrim-scene is not an endless velvet path, gleaming in the unbroken light of an eternity-kindled glory—but a reality, and a reality too with many encumbrances, struggling oftentimes with sharp difficulties of affliction and trial, and now and then overshadowed with dark clouds of disappointment, sometimes, almost deepening in despair—it is lamentable that there should be scattered all abroad through society, so much unreal and exaggerated fiction—so much fine-spun and transcendental but truthless sentimentalism, making life anything but what it is, a life not pleasureless and hopeless, but abounding in with pleasures and hopes that are living, palpable substances, not intangible, ever shifting shadows.

A large portion of the read literature of our book-making age represents human life as a kind of spirituality, a very clever paradise, where all is soft sunshine; or silver moonlight; or bright glittering stars; beautifully up-shooting, shimmering polar lights; ever-blooming fragrant flowers; sweet green fields; enchanted forests, shadowy vales; placid lakes, and bubbling brooks, and purling rills, and perpetual zephyrs laden with the richest perfumes; and as the soul of life, an undying but sickly and wasting love—a something which wastes the life away and is yet the highest bliss, the ne plus ultra of human joy;—than all which nothing can be farther from real life. I would not deny life its spiritualities, indeed, but I would have them real; and hence I look upon the tendency of such literature as calculated to fill the minds of the inexperienced with visions of unreal things—to create and foster hopes which in this world can never be realized, and which indeed it would be folly to realize as many of them would lead to their own destruction—to enervate both mind and body and render them so far unfit for the sober duties and weighty responsibilities of social and domestic life—and to leave the heart unprepared to meet and bear the difficulties and trials which, sooner or later, fall to the lot of every mortal. That life has its trials, and oftentimes severe trials, a few years experience will but too fully demonstrate. If not so, why that faded, furrowed cheek?—that deep meaning set in many an eye around you?—that bright smiling countenance exchanged for the sober and seriously grave?—that jocund laugh and beaming eye, for the deep drawn sigh and fast streaming tears?—Ah! indeed, life hath its trials, not as its end but as its discipline to high and holy ends, to realities made sure by experience, strength made firm by trial, and joys made dear by sorrow.

I would not be understood in what I have said, as uttering an indiscriminate condemnation of the literature of the age; no, far from it. There is much of it that breathes the spirit of noble and lofty minds and feeling hearts, and whose tendency is to impart in a most interesting style, a knowledge of the world; to promote virtue and cherish the holier affections of the heart. Such I would have read by such minds as relish it. Still I would not recommend even this at the expense of history; for history it is, that gives us a real picture, that shows us how the world has acted, and does act, and not as we would fain have it act.

In such a state it is, and in the midst of such influences, that we, whose lot has been cast where Christianity and civilization have shed their beams, are to earn those blessings which God in his wisdom has made to rest on human exertions. And among the great things, the real prizes, which, in this world are worth striving for, I reckon a good name, a spotless reputation. And let us look at this matter of a good name a little, that we may the better judge of its importance; for I fear that with too many of us it is too lightly esteemed, too poorly thought of, and that we hence indulge ourselves in conduct inconsistent with our best interests.

ADDRESS TO UNIVERSALISTS.

Brethren—The time has arrived when it becomes necessary for us, as believers in the great salvation, to act with greater precision and energy. Our enemies on all sides are awake, and using their utmost endeavors to quench those liberal principles that are beginning to prevail so extensively in our land. No exertions have been spared, no expedients left untried; yet, we find our cause onward, and our principles are beginning to pervade almost every corner of the civilized world.

This success, so encouraging to us all, may be attributed to various causes; some of which it will be well to enumerate. One great reason for the spread of our sentiments, is, that they harmonize with the most benevolent feelings of the soul; they give such an exalted idea of man, his nature, character and destiny; as comport with his nobler feelings, and all the promptings of his dignified nature. It does not, like the popular systems of the day, say, that man is placed here to be exposed to all the trials and troubles incident to this life, and finally to suffer an eternity of misery, indescribable in a future world. But on the contrary, that he is placed here for a more noble and exalted purpose; one more agreeable to the lofty faculties of the human mind, and more in agreement with the character of God as revealed in this mirror of truth.

"For though his brightness may create
All worship from the hosts above,
What most his name must elevate,
Is, that he is a God of love!
And mercy is the central sun,
Of all his glories joined in one."

Moreover, this doctrine gives such a just idea of the wisdom, power and goodness of God, and of his plans in reference to his intelligent offspring, as to draw out the benevolent mind in adoration and praise to his holy name. If such is the tendency of our faith on the hearts of its believers, does it not become indispensably necessary for all who profess it with their lips, to show by their daily walk and conversation that they have imbibed its influence, and that it is, as it were, the pole-star in their passage through life?

Another cause that contributes to the spread of the doctrine of impartial grace, may be found in the very means our opposers are using to prop up their crumbling systems. This will appear evident from a little observation. Let any one notice for a time, the efforts of a revival meeting, or "moral tornado," as Dr. Beecher terms it, and he will soon be convinced of this fact. On such occasions, the burden of the theme appears to be, to frighten men into the belief of their dogmas, by preaching the tremendous wrath of an angry God—by holding up to view, as it were, the arch fiend of hell—by uncapping the infernal regions, and exposing the raging billows of liquid lava rolling beneath. The public mind becomes excited, and the weak and credulous are often entrapped in their wily snares through fear, and ignorance of a better system; but the sober and liberal minded are led to examine the subject, and soon find a doctrine more congenial with their benevolent feelings, more consistent with the teachings of nature, and more in harmony with the uniform language of reason and revelation. A doctrine that is "as a hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest, as rivers of water in a dry place; as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land."

"When dread misfortune's tempests rise,
And roar through all the darkened skies,
Where shall the trembling pilgrim gain
A shelter from the wind and rain?
Within the covert of thy grace,
O Lord there is a hiding-place,
Where, unconcerned, we hear the sound
Though storm and tempest rage around."

They soon discover that this glorious faith presents its adherents with higher motives, to restrain them from vice and cling to virtue, than the fear of hell; and that good conduct springs not from a forced compliance to certain requisitions; but that there is something in the intrinsic character of virtue and vice, that causes them to love the one and hate the other; that there is such a thing as loving goodness for its own sake; so that it is not fear, but love which should lead them to the performance of their duties to their fellow man, to their country and to God.

Having enumerated a few of the means that contribute to the spread of the doctrine of universal grace and salvation, let us turn our attention to the other side, and consider some of the obstacles that retard its progress.

In the first place, I would mention the disgraceful conduct of some of our opposers. The time has been when our opponents shrunk not from coming out in fair and honorable combat against us, with the Scriptures of truth, and reason, as their weapons. Not succeeding in putting us down with these, to their satisfaction, they have abandoned the only true and proper ground on which to meet us; and resorted to weapons the most disgraceful of all—those of scurrility, sarcasm, and abuse. A sinking cause it must be, that will resort to such contemptible means to keep its crumbling parts from falling. Their chief object now appears to be, instead of disproving our sentiments, to misstate and misrepresent them in every possible manner; and oftentimes not content with this, they attack and abuse our moral characters, "the tie that binds us to respectability among our fellow men, the basis upon which they put confidence in us, and treat us with consideration." They generally create a phantom of their own imagination, which they call Universalism, and then turn about with all the dexterity and skill they can command, and beat this man of straw, and triumphantly exclaim, "Universalism defeated;" when, in truth, they are as ignorant of the fundamental principles of the system which they attempt to destroy, as the wandering Arab of the desert. Such conduct, no doubt, for a while tends to prejudice the minds of those ignorant of our sentiments against us, and our doctrine; but it will be of short duration, for the chariot of truth and salvation is rolling swiftly along the earth, shedding its rays upon all, and its principles are working in the hearts of the children of men the works of righteousness and peace.

The last that I shall mention, and probably the greatest impediment our cause has to encounter, may be found in the conduct of some of its professed friends and advocates. This may be to many a startling proposition. But it is no less true, that our cause has suffered more from the reckless conduct of some of its professed friends, than from its open enemies. There are some in almost every community that profess themselves Universalists when religious excitements prevail; but when these die away, their Universalism, like the zeal of the orthodox, dies along with it; they sink into a state of apathy and indifference, and their latter state is worse than the former. Others profess themselves such through opposition to the common doctrines of the day,—others again through motives of policy or gain.

Now it is evident to any one, that the influence of such professors is decidedly bad, and deleterious to the cause they have espoused. Universalism with them, is not a deep-seated religious principle, nor of abiding interest to man; but a phantom of the imagination, that glides along the surface; it affects only the head, and reaches not the heart.

Brethren—these things ought not to be so—these evils are in our power to remedy. And it remains for us to say, whether, by a conduct in agreement with the high requirements our doctrine enjoins upon us, we will go on, and endeavor to do all in our power to extend the glorious faith we profess, by a well ordered life, and godly conversation; or, by coldness and indifference, to behold our enemies disseminating in our very midst their doctrines degrading both to the character of God, and the dignity of man.

Are there any among us that profane the name of God—that break the Sabbath day—that partake of the poisonous waters? Let me say to them, that something is demanded of them; yea, something they have never done before—even the labor and experience of a deeply religious life. If you wish to sail under the banner of Universalism, let me say to you, cease to profane the name of God!—Lay aside that poisonous cup! Quell that passionate, guilty temper! Repent—pray—love God, and your neighbor as yourself; and uniting with these a true doctrinal belief, you may then be called a practical as well as a theoretical Universalist. Then from the altar of your heart will emanate a true religious spirit, which will yield the peaceful fruits of righteousness and peace.

"Then shall the reign of mind commence on earth,
And starting fresh as from a second birth,
Man, in the sunshine of the world's new spring,
Shall walk transparent, like some holy thing!"

THE RESTITUTION.... NO. III.

The next passage is Coloss. i: 19, 20,—"For it pleased the Father, that in him should all fullness dwell; and having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him, to reconcile all things unto himself; by him, whether things in heaven, or things on earth." The phrase "all things," Professor Stuart affirms, means the same as "things in heaven or things on earth"—and "things in heaven and earth" means the universe. Doct. Clark says it means the Jews and Gentiles; for it is the design of God to save the "whole human race." There can be no doubt, then, that the Apostle referred to the whole intelligent creation—this point is established by orthodox commentators themselves—and if they had not so established it, it would be none the less evident.

By the cross or the death of the Saviour, our heavenly Father established a system, by which it is his pleasure and purpose to reconcile all things in heaven and on earth, or in other words, the universe, to himself. This we must admit, unless we deny the passage itself; for it expressly speaks of the reconciliation of all things.

What is reconciliation? This is decided by the apostle:—"And you that were sometimes alienated, and enemies in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled." Coloss. i: 21. The Colossians, in consequence of their wickedness, were the enemies of God and his government—but by the mediation of the Saviour, they were saved from their wickedness, and reconciled to the divine rule, so that as they were before the enemies, now they were the friends of God. So the brethren of Joseph were reconciled—so Saul of Tarsus was reconciled—so the wandering prodigal was reconciled. And this is the view of reconciliation which Prof. Stuart gives. He says:—"By reconciling things in heaven and things on earth, seems evidently to be meant bringing into union, under one great head, i. e. Christ; by a new and special bond of intercommunication, both angels and men." So with Dr. Clark. He says:—"Reconciliation means to change thoroughly; and the grand object of the Gospel is to make a complete change in men's minds and manners." All this is very clear, and can not well be mistaken.

Place then the two facts together—viz: that "things in heaven and things on earth," means the universe, "all things," all men—and that these are to be reconciled—and to what other conclusion can we arrive, than that of universal reconciliation? Surely testimony can not be clearer and stronger. Add to it the passage in Rev. v: 14, in which the periphrasis again occurs:—"And every creature which is in heaven, and on earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, blessing, and honor, and glory and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb forever and ever." Professor Stuart has shown that the phrases in this passage, embrace the universe—consequently rational beings in heaven, earth and sea, are to offer up this homage to God and the Lamb. But it may be said, that the wicked will be compelled to yield this homage; and that their yielding it, is no evidence of their happiness. But this view is at once destroyed by what Professor Stuart asserts. He says:—"If this be not spiritual worship—and if Christ be not the object of it here, I am unable to produce a case, where worship can be called spiritual and divine." No person can contend for a moment, that people who are made endlessly miserable, can offer up spiritual and divine worship—for the soul must be reconciled before its worship can be acceptable. And when all creatures in heaven, on earth, under the earth, such as are in the sea, and all that are in them shall offer up this "spiritual and divine worship," where will the doctrine of endless sin and suffering be? Where ought it to be?—dead and buried with all the rest of human creeds and traditions. G. W. M.

PUNISHMENT.... NO. I.

"Is mortal man more just than God, is a man more pure than his Maker?" JOB iv: 17.

That God will punish for sin, is a truth taught and believed by every Christian denomination. And if we would, we could not well deny it, with the voice of experience and the voice of revelation speaking in our ears. For while the one tells that there is no peace to the wicked, the other informs us, that he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong that he hath done; and that there is wrath, tribulation, and anguish, on every soul of man that doeth evil.

These facts are confirmed by all past history. If we go back to the first transgression, we shall find the truth verified, in the day a man sins, in that day he shall die; for no sooner had the forbidden fruit been plucked and eaten, than an accusing conscience spoke within; and fear, and shame, and remorse took possession of the soul, and kindled the fires of hell there. And so in the case of Cain, whose offering found no acceptance.—No sooner had a brother's blood been spilled, than it cried unto God from the ground, and inquisition was made therefor, and the murderer went forth a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth—a punishment which he said was greater than he could bear.

In the case of the Antediluvians, too, we have decisive evidence that a whole people, as well as individuals, must receive punishment at the hand of God for their wickedness. The overthrow and destruction of the cities of the plain, together with their inhabitants, likewise furnish proof of this, and warn every nation, of the awful consequences of sin.

We have said that every denomination was agreed in the fact that God will punish for sin. But in relation to the nature of the punishment to be inflicted, there is a wide difference of opinion. For while some contend that it will be vindictive and endless, we hold that it is consequential and reformatory; and consequently is not an end—but a means for the accomplishment or the attainment of an end. "Is mortal man more just than God, is a man more pure than his Maker?"

The parent chastises his child for—what? What is the object of the chastening he bestows? Some would say the maintenance of the parental honor. But this is consulted only in filial obedience. The earthly father punishes, then, to reform—to correct the evil habits of his child, and to restrain the wayward disposition of his heart. He does not inflict stripes out of mere motives of revenge—he does not produce pain because he delights in that pain; but because the good of his child is consulted in this very thing—because he desires his reformation, and would effect his greatest good. The object of parental discipline can not be any thing else—it must have the happiness of the child as the great and ultimate end in view. To deny this, is to degrade our earthly parentage, and to ascribe characters to our fathers and mothers which they would blush to own.

We will say to a parent who reads this, that he has a son who often violates just and reasonable commands, and swerves in his waywardness, from the plain and beaten path of duty. He has been warned, time and again, but all to no purpose, and tears and entreaties have all been lost upon him. The father calls him before him, and says, "My son, you have disregarded my lawful commands, you have set at naught my counsels—you have despised my reproofs, and trampled upon my laws, and you must now expect nothing but vengeance and wrath at my hands." In the spirit of this declaration, he prepares and inflicts various tortures upon his disobedient child, and every imaginable cruelty is resorted to, in order to produce pain; the consequence of which is, that the son is rendered an object of suffering and of pity for life. Now is there a parent who reads this, who would not consider himself degraded, and villified, and insulted by such a representation as this? And should you know of one to whom it would apply, would you not say of him, that he was a tyrant and a monster, and unfit to be a father? "But is mortal man more just than God, is a man more pure than his Maker?" Will he ascribe to his heavenly Father a character which he himself does not bear, and which he would blush to own? Will he say that in punishing his child, he aims to reform; but that God has no such design in his punishments? This is certainly to make mortal man more just and pure than his Maker; for while one loves his child, and in being just would secure its happiness; the other feels no certain regard for his children, and instead of aiming to restore the sinful by his chastenings, will only perpetuate them to their endless misery and despair.

But, we have a question to ask.—Who gave the parent that love which never forsakes its object; and those feelings of affection and attachment which bind the father or the mother so strongly to the child? There is that in parental love, that distinguishes it from all earthly and mutable passions. It never casts off—never destroys. It remains true in the storm, as well as in the sunshine; and should all other friends fail, it causes one heart to beat for us, and gush with a prayer for the wandering child. But who gave this love, so warm and free? Who placed it deep in the father's heart, and the mother's soul? Did man originate it?—did earth bring it forth? No. It came from God, who himself is Love. It is a portion of his own nature—of that mighty and all prevailing principle which is seen operating every where, and spreading beauty and gladness over the face of all created things. Shall it then be said that mortal man is more just than God? or more pure than his Maker? Shall it be said that while, the one seeks the best good, of his children, even in the chastenings of his hand; the other has no such object in view; but makes all punishment an end in the economy of his grace?

Forbid it Heaven! that a character like this should be ascribed to God—a character that is infinitely beneath that of an earthly parent. Our heavenly Father is not like the ostrich of the desert—creating children without caring for them. His parental love and fatherly regard know no bounds. His glory and his honor are intimately connected with the obedience and happiness of all his creatures; and unless the latter be secured, the former are dimmed and tarnished forever. A. C. B.

REMOVALS.

After the first of May, the Magazine and Advocate Office will be found nearly opposite its present location—in the second story of No. 32, Genesee street, near the corner of Whitesborough street—where its Publishers will be glad to receive new subscribers, or payments, for the paper.

The Editor's residence (also the residence of Mrs. H. B. Soule, and W. H. Ryder) will be at No. 63, Broadway, west side, just below the Utica Female Academy—where he will be happy to see his friends, in the afternoon of each day, when that time will suit them; but if at any other time business requires them to call, he will attend to them.

N. B.—This preference of time for the calls of friends, is made out of no disrespect to any one, but from the necessity I am under of setting some portion of my time to attend to my business. I find it almost impossible to do all I have to do, and must do, without some time to do it in. My health will not allow me to labor at night—and if the days are all broken up into fragments, by frequent interruptions, my work must be hastily done by snatches, and consequently be ill-done—or not performed at all. My time is my all; but still, when I have any to spare, at any time of the day, it will be cheerfully devoted to any demands that may be made upon it by friends or strangers, at home or abroad. My former request having been misunderstood by persons unacquainted with the amount and nature of my duties, (or illiberally misconstrued by those who see in a plain necessary statement something more meant than is said.) I have deemed this repetition and explanation necessary. If any still deem my request in regard to this arrangement wrong, or discourteous, let them take my place for one week, and do my work amid constant interruptions, and they will probably wonder I ever got along without it! A. B. G.

MOVING.—If any omissions or errors are found, try and excuse them on the score that the Editor is getting ready to move—and the printers likewise—the one his household goods, the others their type, presses, &c.—The first of May is a delightful time in our city for bustle and confusion—for losing and mislaying—for mistaking and being mistaken—and for forgetting and being forgotten. But as the greater portion of our subscribers do not live in this place, it is to be hoped that they will not forget the terms of the paper—the 1st of May completes the four months of grace! A. B. G.

N. B.—This was intended to be a moving article. I can almost fancy that I see delinquents hands moving toward their pockets, and the pay moving toward the publishers, and from them to the hundred gaping mouths that are constantly calling for pay.

BR. KNEELAND TOWNSEND, one of our best sermonizers and a worthy man, is at present disengaged. We think that some of our societies at present without preaching, would do well to apply for his services. Address him at Newark, Wayne county. We certainly need more preaching in our State than our societies now enjoy—some of the societies should have double what they now have; and many places that have none, could easily organize a society and employ a preacher a considerable portion of the time.

BR. W. H. RYDER, at present in this city, has one half of his time yet disengaged. We believe he would be a means of doing much good in this vicinity, if employed by some of our friends now destitute of preaching, as he is a worthy young man, and possesses good talents and information.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

The Summer term will commence on Wednesday, April 26th, under charge of Rev. S. Strong, Principal, and B. Birdsall, Professor of Mathematics. The Female department will be conducted by Miss Harmony Luce. By order of the Ex. Com.

STATE CONVENTION.

The undersigned Committee of the Universalist society of Cooperstown, hereby extend a cordial invitation to ministering brethren and friends to meet with them at the coming session of the New York State Convention of Universalists. Come, brethren—let there be a general attendance from all parts of the State, and we will have a rich repast of love, a pure Gospel feast. You will find us, as a society, united and prosperous, and glad of an opportunity to extend to our visiting friends, those rites of hospitality which should ever characterize Universalists.

Our brethren in the vicinity of New York city, by taking the boat for Albany, on Monday, may be in Cooperstown the next afternoon. Cooperstown is 22 miles from Fort Plain, (the nearest point to it on the Rail Road and Erie Canal,) and 38 miles from Utica. A stage leaves Fort Plain daily at noon; and Utica, daily, in the forenoon, (on the arrival of the cars East and West, at each place,) for this village. Extras can also be had at either place, on moderate terms if a full load can be made up.

Friends will please call, on their arrival, at the Universalist church, where the Committee will be in attendance to receive them.

O. WHISTON, JOSEPH BENNETT, SETH DOUBLEDAY, LEVI WOOD, JAMES I. PAUL, HARVEY CLARK, HOLDEN CORY, Committee.

DEATHS.

In Brownville, March 23d, of quick consumption, Mr. ALBERT H. STEVENS, aged 25 years. In the death of this truly excellent young man, society has sustained an irreparable loss. His talents, his kind and friendly disposition, his upright and virtuous life, enlisted the admiration, and commanded the esteem of all who knew him. He was an affectionate son, a tender brother, an agreeable associate, and a worthy member of community. He died with a firm faith in the illimitable grace of God, and the consequent salvation of the whole world. His funeral was attended at the residence of his mother, on Sunday the 25th, and a discourse delivered to a very large concourse of sympathizing relatives and friends, by the writer, H. BOUGHTON.

In Philadelphia, April 3d, Mrs. MARY ADELINE, wife of Mr. Evan Strickland, and daughter of Gen. E. Fisher, of Theresa, aged 20 years. She was sick only a few days; yet she seemed conscious, from the commencement of her illness, that she should not recover. She was patient and resigned—and looked forward with confidence, to a purer and better world. She lived a devoted Universalist, and died in the faith which ever sustained her in life. Funeral on the 5th, at Theresa, sermon by H. B.

In Ogdensburg, March 12th, Mrs. MARY ANN, wife of Wm. Barny, aged 34 years. The writer never enjoyed an acquaintance with this sister, but he learned at her funeral, that she was much beloved and respected by all who knew her. She was a believer in Universalism, and found in it every needed consolation in life and in death. W. H. W.

In Middlefield, Otsego county, December 19th, 1842, Mrs. REXAVILLE, wife of Delos M. Wood, in the 26th year of her age.

Few have stronger connections and family ties to bind them to earth, than she had. Yet consumption marked her for its prey, and despite the able medical aid furnished by her father (Dr. Ashel Todd), and other medical men, she was compelled to yield herself its victim. Seldom has it taken one combining more virtues. It was only necessary to know her, in order to esteem her. She had been reared in the doctrine and precepts of Universalism, and its practice shone in her conduct as a daughter, wife, and neighbor. In this faith she lived—and it sustained her in her rapid decline. By it are sustained a doting husband now left with a cherub babe, (a boy less than a year old,)—her parents, brothers and sisters—who all hope to meet her again, with a redeemed universe, in immortal purity and bliss.

By her request, the writer performed the funeral services, on the 21st; and delivered a sermon from Rom. viii: 38, 39, to a numerous congregation of sympathizing friends.

J. POTTER

In Henderson, Jefferson county, March 13th, after a short and painful illness, Mr. JOHN WILKINSON, in the 51st year of his age.

In all the relations of life, his conduct was uniformly such as to command the respect and secure the confidence of his fellow men, and leave behind him an unspotted reputation. A widowed companion, five children, aged parents, and many relatives and friends are left to mourn their loss. He seems to have been taken away in the midst of his prosperity and usefulness, and has left many a sincere mourner. He was for several years a confirmed believer in the doctrine of a world's salvation "through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus;" and his daily deportment manifested the sincerity of his profession of the Gospel of Christ. He was one of the Trustees and also the Chorister of the First Universalist society in Henderson, and his constancy and faithfulness were proverbial. His memory will be gratefully cherished while moral excellence shall find a place in the best affections of his associates. The light of the Gospel guided him in life, cheered him in sickness and death, and we trust shall be the theme of his never-ceasing enjoyment in the presence of God. May the God of all grace sanctify this affliction to all who are called to mourn the distressing bereavement.

"Oh! for a strong, a lasting faith,
To credit what Jehovah saith,
To hear the message of his Son,
And call the joys of heaven our own." P. M.

In Hanover, Licking county, Ohio, on the morning of March 21st, ORVILLE, son of Dr. Joseph Walrath, aged 10 months and 25 days.

In Vesper, in March last, an infant child of Mr. Ansel Strong.

In Springville, Erie county, Jan. 1st, Mrs. ELIZA SEVERANCE, consort of Charles C. Severance, Esq., and second daughter of Jacob Badgley, Esq., of Cortland. Mrs. Severance endured a protracted illness with much fortitude and Christian resignation, and died in the blissful hope of meeting a redeemed universe of intelligences where parting shall be known no more. Her funeral was attended by the Baptist clergyman of Springville, who also visited her during her illness, and acknowledged that she lived and died a Christian. T. J. W.

At Tully Corners, April 10th, Mr. EDWIN BEERS, aged 58 years. Mr. Beers embraced the Christian faith in its fulness during his last illness, and died supported by his belief in the Restitution of all things. Funeral on the 11th—sermon in the church at Tully by T. J. W.

In Leavenworth, Crawford county, Ind., Feb. 22d, 1843, Mr. CHARLES C. WILCOX, aged 25 years. Mr. W. left Butternuts in the fall, hoping thereby to benefit his health. But he has fallen asleep in the arms of death, full of universal faith and hope. He has left parents, brethren and sisters in Butternuts, Otsego county, and a numerous circle of warm hearted friends, to lament his early death. D. P.

In Butternuts, Otsego county, March 17th, 1843, Mrs. MINERVA, wife of Mr. E. W. Yates, aged 35 years. She fell calmly asleep in death, without witnessing the least fear for the future. She has left an affectionate and deeply afflicted husband, five children from 1 to 12 years old, with numerous friends, to mourn her untimely adieu. D. P.

THE BURNING OF A RUSSIAN THEATRE.

The wooden theatres of the Katscheli are some of them very large. One is generally preeminent among them for its dimensions, and, considering that it is only of wood, it may be termed a gigantic structure. It is very lofty, has several galleries and tiers like the regular theatres, and is said sometimes to contain 5,000 persons. It was this theatre then in which a fire broke out behind the scenes, owing to a representation of fire works and illuminations. At first the persons behind the scenes said nothing to the public, conceiving that the flames would soon be extinguished; and when these gained the upper hand, the spectators clapped the illumination as particularly splendid. All at once the Bajazzo rushed upon the stage with a look of consternation, and cried, "we are on fire! we are on fire! save your lives who can!" The audience laughed aloud at what they considered as the admirably feigned fright of the Bajazzo. As nobody could have been heard amid the obstreperous acclamations, the director of the theatre ordered the curtain at the back of the stage to be drawn up, that every one might be aware of the imminence of the danger. Thick smoke and flames poured toward the body of the house. Laughter was turned suddenly into pallid fear, and shrieks of horror burst from the bosoms of thousands, who but now had been convulsed with mirth. Grasping what was dearest to them, all rushed toward the outlets. These were too few for the magnitude of the theatre, and it was very slowly that the foremost made way for those behind them. So much the more rapidly did the flames communicate to the resinous fireplanks, and quickly advancing from scene to scene, they soon penetrated into the body of the theatre, still swarming with people. As ill-luck would have it, one of the large folding-doors at the entrance, which opened inward, had in the confusion been accidentally pushed to, and resisted all efforts to force it either from without or within. Thus only half of the main entrance was available for escape in this critical moment, and the retreat of the audience was of course proportionably delayed. Outside the house, people assembled rather to amuse themselves with the spectacle of the blazing edifice than to render assistance; and at first little zeal for saving lives was manifested. For who could be prepared on the scene of merriment for so dreadful a visitation! "People run hastily in such a booth. If it takes fire, what then! Why, they run out again as hastily." It was not till the result was known that the public felt the real horror of the catastrophe. Meanwhile, those within, densely jammed together, passed moments fraught with more anguish than usually falls to the lot of man for years; and in vain the rear most wildly shouted, "Forward! forward!" to those in front. Imagination ventures not to picture the scenes of agony and despair, which must have followed in rapid succession among these thousands of human beings, struggling with suffocation and the most cruel of deaths.

The police would not at first suffer private individuals to render assistance, that they might keep the conduct of the business to themselves. A tradesman, nevertheless, contrived with a spade to break down a board on one side of the theatre, and to drag sixty half-suffocated persons out of this harlequin's hell through the aperture, with imminent peril of his own life. The Emperor Nicholas rewarded the worthy man with an order, and, as he was poor, with a pension of 2,000 rubles.

Meanwhile, the people in the streets, as it may be supposed, became gradually aware that the matter was no joke. The fearful tidings soon spread through the city, that Lehmann's theatre was on fire, and that thousands of persons in it were likely to perish. It is impossible to conceive the consternation and despair that seized all Petersburg. There was not a family, one or more of whose members might not be among the wretched sufferers. When the Emperor, on the first news of the fire, hastened from the Winter Palace to the spot, women ran up to him and cried, "Sir, save, save! My son is among them! And my husband is there!—My brother is not out yet!" "Children," replied the Emperor, "I will save all I can."

When the fire was over, when the flames and life were extinct, and all who were within lay in a burned and charred heap, the melancholy business of removing the dead was commenced. The sight is said to have been above all idea, harrowing and appalling, when, on clearing away the timbers which had fallen in, the mass of bodies was gradually discovered. They were pulled out one by one with hooks; some were completely carbonized, others roasted like chestnuts; and many had only the hair of the head singed; many, with glazed eyes, burned hair, and charred faces, had on their holiday clothes and decorations, which the flames had not reached, on account of the close pressure of the throng. They presented a far more repulsive spectacle than those which were entirely burned. In one part of the building which the flames had spared, were found dense masses of bodies still standing upright, like a host of shades from the nether world. A female was found with her head hanging over the gallery and holding her hand and handkerchief before her face. A gentleman who witnessed the operation of clearing away the bodies, told me that he could not touch food for three days, so frightful were the images that had excessively haunted him afterwards; and a lady who had looked in from a distance, was so shocked that she became delirious, and raved for several days, both sleeping and waking.

The number of victims was subsequently stated officially to be 300; but a person told me that he counted with his own eyes 50 carts, each of which contained from 10 to 15 bodies. People, who pretended to know from good authority, represented the number as so large that I dare not repeat it, lest others might think the amount too improbable.—[Kold.

LIFE IN MISSOURI.

The North Carolina Reporter says:—A member elect of the lower chamber of the Legislature of this State, was last year persuaded by some wags of this neighborhood, that if he did not reach the State House at ten o'clock on the day of assembly, he could not be sworn and would lose his seat. He immediately mounted with hunting frock, rifle and Bowie-knife, and spurred till he got to the door of the State House, where he hitched his nag. A crowd were in the chamber of the lower house, on the ground floor, walking about the house with hats on, and smoking cigars. These he passed, ran up stairs into the Senate chamber, set his rifle against the wall and bawled—"Strangers, whar's the man that sworns me in?" at the same time taking out his credentials. "Walk this way," said the clerk, who was at the same time lighting a real pipe, and he was sworn without an inquiry. When the teller came to count noses, he found there was one Senator too many present. The mistake was soon discovered, and the huntsman was informed that he did not belong there.

"Fool who, with your corn bread!" he roared. "You can't flunk this child no how you can fix it. I'm elected to this here legislatur, and I'll go agin all banks and eternal improvements, and if there's any of your oratory wants to get skinned, just say the word, and I'll light upon you like a slavey on a wood-chuck. My constituents sent me here, and if you want to floor this two legged animal, hop on, just as soon as you like. Though I'm from the back country, I'm a leetle smarter than any other quadruped you can turn out of this drove."

After this admirable harangue, he put his Bowie-knife between his teeth and took up his rifle with, "Come here old Suke, and stand by me!" at the same time presenting it at the chairman, who, however, had seen such people before. After some expostulation the man was persuaded that he belonged to the lower chamber, upon which he sheathed his knife, flung his gun on his shoulder, and with a profound congee, remarked, "Gentlemen, I beg your pardon, but if I didn't think that air lower room was a groggery, may I be shot."

REVOLUTIONARY HERO—A FACT.

The 4th of July, 1835, was celebrated in the usual manner, with civil and military rejoicings, in one of the most considerable towns in Eastern Pennsylvania. In the evening of the day a public festival was held within a beautiful grove at the suburbs of the town. The committee of arrangements, by request of the orator, appointed for the occasion, Mr. —, collected all the Revolutionary veterans they could find within the compass of several miles, and arranged them with fine effect on either side of the chair of the President. Every thing went off charmingly, the dinner was excellent, the wine delicious, the music was soul-cheering, and the toasts patriotic. After the Declaration of Independence was read, Mr. — rose and addressed the meeting in a strain of eloquence which called forth heartfelt and rapturous bursts of applause. He dwelt pathetically on the hardships and privations of that little band of heroes who fought by the side of our beloved Washington, through that memorable struggle which ended in the glorious achievement of our liberty. In the midst of his discourse he turned around to the old veterans whose moistened eyes showed how the chord that awoke in their recollections was touched. He suddenly questioned a silvery headed septuagenarian:

What battle have you fought in, my old friend—won't you tell us?

"I crossed the Brandywine with Washington—fought at Yorktown, and I saw the surrender of Cornwallis."

"And you?" continued the orator.

"I was at Saratoga; and I tell you it done our hearts good to see the red coats march by us with furled banners and reversed arms, fine looking fellows they were too."

"And you?"

"I was with Gen. Greene through all his Southern campaign, and I fought with him in every battle."

"And you, where were your laurels won?"

"On the sea," answered the old weather-beaten tar. "I was with Barry when he taught the proud Britons that we were as invincible on the ocean as on the land."

The cheering was tremendous.

The orator went on. "And you tell us where your honored garlands were earned? speak, old father, upon what field of blood did you behold victory perched upon our flag?"

"Vy, Joe, I vash at Trenton."

"Under Washington, gallant soldier, under Washington?"

"Oh, ya, I vash oonder Vashington, also, ven ve soorendered."

"Surrendered! what do you mean, my old hero? surrendered?"

"Vy, ya, minheer! to be sure ve soorendered oonder Shendral Vashington; I vash one of de Hessians."

Imagine, reader, the surprise of the audience, the momentary suspense, and the deafening roar of laughter, and plaudits that followed.

Here is a sentence beautifully rich in illustration, and perfectly heart-searching. It will be fun to some readers and gall to others. "A grain of carmine will tinge a gallon of water, so that in every drop the color will be perceptible, and a grain of musk will scent a room for twenty years. Just so, if a man cheats the printer, the stain will be forever visible on the minutest atom of a minute soul, and will leave a scent of rascality about an individual strong enough to make an honest man curl up his nose in disgust, and kick him out of his presence, if he can't get rid of him in any other mode."

God is love.

AN IDEA OF THE UNIVERSE.....NO. III.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

In my last I was attempting to give a conception, faint though it is, of those myriads of stars, or immense globes, which by means of powerful glasses, present themselves to our astonished sight. They stretch themselves in endless continuance towards infinity, presenting the grandest and most sublime spectacle that ever burst upon the vision of mortal man. But we are not yet done exploring this great fabric, the universe. Nay, we have but just commenced, and ages on ages might roll away in endless succession, and new wonders would still be concealed. But cast your eyes for awhile at that whitish and irregular zone that extends itself, like a girdle, around the whole heavens, and which is denominated by astronomers, the milky way. It appears brightest in the months of August, September, October and November, yet it is visible the whole year. This portion of the heavens consists entirely of stars crowded into immense clusters.—Apply a telescope of considerable power to this splendid girdle, and we are struck with astonishment at the number and variety, the beautiful configuration of those worlds which compose it. In parts of it every slight motion of the telescope brings to view new clusters and new configurations, and this splendid scene is continued over a space of many degrees in succession. "In several fields of view, occupying no more space than twice the breadth of the moon, you perceive more of those twinkling luminaries, than all of the stars visible to the naked eye throughout the whole canopy of heaven." You seem to have entered into, as it were, the "remotest boundaries of creation, and feel lost and bewildered amidst the immensity of the universe." While gazing here at these splendid objects, man may be inspired with higher ideas of grandeur and sublimity, and feel deeper devotion and reverence, than on any ordinary occasion.—Scene after scene opens before him, and systems unseen before, and "new heavens," and other firmaments, continually rise to his view, whose distance can not be measured, or even guessed at, for imagination in her utmost stretch, her loftiest flight, finds all her efforts baffled.

"The late Sir W. Herschel, in passing his telescope along a space of this zone, fifteen degrees long and two broad," saw at least fifty thousand stars large enough to be counted, and he suspected there were full twice as many more, which could not be seen, only at intervals for the want of sufficient light. This number would be fifty times more than the acutest eye can see in the whole canopy of the heavens; and this too, on a space 15 degrees long and two broad—a space 1.1375, (i. e.—one, one thousand three hundred and seventy-fifth part) of the visible sky. At another time this astronomer saw, in one field of view, and one glance with his telescope, nearly 600 stars, so that in the space of a quarter of an hour, one hundred and sixteen thousand stars passed in review before him. Upon the probable supposition that this whole belt is equally filled with stars with the space just alluded to, then there would be in the Milky Way alone, no less than twenty millions, one hundred and ninety thousand stars, or 20,000 times the number visible to the naked eye. It has been ascertained that the distance of some of the more remote fixed stars, is, at least 9,940,000,000,000,000, or nearly ten thousand billions of miles—a distance so great that light, which travels at the rate of twelve millions of miles every minute, would be 1640 years coming to our globe.

Here let us pause and reflect a moment upon this august spectacle. In the firmament appears a few whitish spaces, almost overlooked by the common observer when he casts a glance at the midnight sky. Yet in this apparently irregular belt, which seems like an accidental tinge on the face of the heavens to the unaided vision, there may be seen, by optical instruments, what appears to be an amazing boundless creation. We see not only a thousand, but millions on millions of splendid suns, where none appear to the unassisted eye.—The scenes of grandeur and magnificence connected with such august objects, are "overwhelming to such frail and finite beings as man, and perhaps even more exalted orders of intelligence may find it difficult to form even an approximate idea of objects so distant so numerous and yet so sublime. This spectacle, great and stupendous as it is, is not the universe. It is but a small corner of creation in consideration of the whole, which beings at an immensely greater distance will contemplate as an obscure and scarcely discernable speck on the borders of the firmament. So that even here "amidst this vast assemblage of material existence"—of these worlds on worlds as numerous as the sands of the sea which no eye can number, no imagination conceive, we may repeat the language of the prophet when speaking of the Almighty, even here is but "the hiding of his power."

"The Milky Way is now with good reason considered as the cluster stars in which our sun is situated; and all the stars visible to the naked eye as only a few scattered orbs," bordering on the nearest extremities of this far reaching cluster.

The creating power and wisdom of the Almighty, the farther we proceed in our survey, become more expansive and magnificent. New prospects arise and enlarge far beyond what we had before conceived at every step in our progress. The multiplicity and variety of their objects are indefinitely increased. New suns and firmaments rush upon our view, filling the mind with wonder and amazement at the immensity of creation, and impressing us with the idea, that after all our survey and research for a knowledge of the universe, we are but still standing on "the frontiers of the great Jehovah's kingdom." Turn the eye whichever way we may, in these higher regions, and infinity stretches itself before us, in its awful and inconceivable dimensions; and "countless assemblages of the most resplendent objects are every where found, diversifying the tracks of immensity." To investigate the numbers of these objects, their magnitude, motions, and the laws by which they are regulated in their movements, baffles the mathematician's skill, and sets his boasted powers of analysis at defiance, clearly demonstrating that man, with all his powers of understanding is yet in the infancy of knowledge and of being. All finite measures fail in scanning such amazing objects, in penetrating into such fathomless recesses. We can but be filled with wonder and admiration at the grandeur of the Milky Way where suns and worlds are counted by millions; but what shall we say of another part of this universe, I mean now—of the vast assemblage of starry systems to be found in the firmament called nebulae. of which there are several thousands, some perhaps even richer in stars, than any found in the Milky Way; and to which, the 20,000,000 stars of the Milky Way bear no more proportion, than the few, the naked eye can descry, to the whole sidereal heavens. We are forced to this conclusion from the discoveries made respecting the different orders of the nebulae. The nebulae are faint cloudy specks seen in various parts of the heavens. Two or three are just perceptible to the naked eye, but the greater part are only seen by the aid of a powerful telescope. Inexpressible magnitude and grandeur have been opened to our view by these late discoveries. The nearest of them are termed clusters, to convey the idea of a globular space full of stars. "It would be in vain," says Sir J. Herschel, "to attempt to count the stars in one of these clusters. They are not to be reckoned by hundreds; and on a rough calculation, grounded on the apparent intervals between them at the borders, and the angular diameter of the whole group, it would appear that many clusters of this description must contain at least ten or twenty thousand stars, compacted and wedged together in a round space, whose area is not more than a tenth part of that covered by the moon." Now let us consider that there are several thousands of these clusters stretching over the immensity of space, and that each contains as many or even more stars or worlds than are found in our nebulae or Milky Way which is about 20,000,000, and what an inconceivable magnitude—a vast and incomprehensible structure is the universe; far exceeding any thing that comes within the grasp of human computation, and setting the knowledge of man far in the back grounds, and stamping imperfection and finity upon his loftiest powers and faculties. When all this is contemplated—when we go out and endeavor to grasp in the universe—to number the worlds and systems which are outnumbered by the sands of the sea—to investigate their laws and motions—to catch the most distant glimpse of the Creator's kingdom, and find ourselves overwhelmed and astonished with the variety, and magnitude, and distances of each from us and from each other, and often feel our efforts baffled and shamed with our weakness, who can wonder that man should be awed and impressed with the feelings of devotion!

THE GOODNESS OF GOD.

BY REV. I. WASHBURN.

The goodness of God is immutable and unchanging—it remains the same yesterday, to-day and forever. How different it is from the goodness of man; one, changing and partial; the other, immutable and universal—one, short lived and weak; the other, strong and eternal.

Though we are called to pass through many trials and afflictions—though friends grow cold and forsake us, and the hand which has ever grasped ours in friendship is turned to dash our cup of earthly happiness to the ground, yet the boundless goodness of our God remains the same.

How comforting is the thought to the Christian, when bowed down by the trials and sorrows of earth—when the world turns against him with scorn and derision to know that there is a being on whose unchanging goodness he can rely for support.

The thought adds new life and energy to his soul, and he looks upon affliction as a mere shadow, which for a season covers him with darkness, but at length it is dispelled by the sunshine of God's eternal goodness. That we may duly appreciate the goodness of our heavenly Father we must have unwavering confidence therein, we must feel that it is not in the power of God to change, for he is perfect in goodness, and therefore he must be unchangeably good; and with goodness united with justice and mercy, it is impossible for him to injure any of his creatures.

A GOOD NAME.....NO. II.

"A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches, and loving favor rather than silver and gold." SOLOMON.

In this language Solomon affirms strongly, that "a good name is rather to be chosen than great riches," but it is no extravagant expression, no hyperbole. When we reflect how much, and in so many different ways, depends on the name we bear, its value must rise into unexpected importance. And, indeed, lightly as the world, if we judge from appearances alone, seems to regard it; yet the world does nevertheless prize it very highly. This you may see in the tenacity with which men cling to reputation; it is the last thing they would part with; dearer is it even than gold. For however low in society man may find himself; whatever may have befallen, or howsoever many friends may have forsaken him; every one evidently desires, and perseveringly exerts himself, to stand before the world blameless—to be regarded as an honest and true man. No thought strikes through the soul with such withering influence as that of a blasted reputation. "You may sell my goods," said one of olden times, "and confiscate my estates, and scatter my wealth to the wild winds;—this I can bear; my friends can bear it; for while my hands are left I can earn bread, and while this heart beats I can love my friends; but for my soul's sake—for the sake of my dear wife and children—in the presence of the gods, I conjure you, touch not, touch not my hard earned reputation." The great poet hath said the same thing.

"Good name, in man, and woman, dear my lord,
Is the immediate jewel of their souls;
Who steals my purse, steals trash; 'tis something, nothing;
'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands;
But he, that filches from me my good name,
Robs me of that, which neither enriches him,
But makes me poor indeed."

And who does not feel in the depths of his soul, that this sentiment was but the outspeaking of a noble feeling inwrought in the human heart?

But if we descend still further, and visit the courts of vice, where we should expect that even hope had become a stranger, we shall find the same thing true; for even there virtue commands respect, and "a dear good name is hugged as the hope of existence." Look around you and tell me where you can find the man so dishonest as to be willing to confess it, that he makes no exertion to produce the conviction that he is honest? Where the man so hypocritical, so deceptive that he does not wish to be considered as sincere? Where the man so dark a liar, that he does not labor to be received as a man of truth? Where the man, in a word, so abandonedly vicious that he has no solicitude to be regarded as virtuous by his fellow men? Does not man every where, in fact, prefer a good name to a bad one? And hence it is, that where the reality is wanting, such labored exertions as we often witness, are made to keep up the appearance of virtue. So highly is the thing itself prized, that even its image, its shadow is worshipped. Men want, they pant after the good opinion of others, their fellow beings; and if in some degree they can not have the assurance of it, peace gives them the parting hand. Happiness is a plant that will not thrive and bloom on the grave of buried reputation.

So highly is reputation valued, especially where men have made much observation in the world, or have had much experience in life.

What then, do you ask, is a good name rightly understood? The answer is, that reputation which a man builds up who cultivates in his heart those virtuous principles, drawn from the religion of Heaven, as the pure source whence flow all his outward actions, which always meet the approbation, enlist the sympathies, and draw out the expressed good opinion of the world. It must rest as its foundation, on virtue in the broad religious sense of that term. Those principles must be implanted and nurtured, which will influence to right action. The life, and the whole life must be sincere, must be true. And if I conceive rightly, Solomon makes it rest on true principles rightly cultivated and carried out—on individual and personal exertion, tempered and directed by the genius of Christian philosophy.

It is the fruit of something more than a quiescent passiveness, however innocent—no mere negative of evil, but the product of positive and active goodness. This appears from the comparison used in the passage at the head of this article; "a good name is rather to be chosen than great riches, and loving favor rather than silver and gold." Now riches are the product of no passive state, for by much labor and hard toil are they produced. In making choice of riches we are to understand, not the wish, or desire only, to obtain them, but also that this desire must be accompanied with the right use of all just means within our reach, put forth to accumulate them. The means that will operate the end, must be employed; choice must be manifested by persevering industry and virtuous economy. Likewise is it in the acquiring of a good name. The person who would obtain and preserve it must act—must pursue the upright and virtuous course of conduct, the straight path of moral integrity, which is the foundation of all true greatness. As well might a man expect increasing heaps of shining dust by indolence and dissipation, as a true good name by inaction and ease, or indulgence in every species of vice. Indeed, what industry and economy are in the acquisition of wealth, true religion and persevering right action are in the building up of a good reputation.

And this same thing we find to be true in actual life. The man, who would have a desirable reputation, must earn it—must labor and put forth much personal and vigorous effort. He may sit down and sigh for it until his head is bleached by the elements of half a century, but it will not come, and the poor man will die at last without having tasted the sweets of fruition. To build up a valuable reputation is not the work of a day or a month; but of years,—of a life. Like wealth it is susceptible of indefinite additions—and like it, too, it may be dissipated in a moment. Would to heaven, that the living conviction of this truth might be ever present with us, striking out our path of duty as with shafts of sun-light, and leading us with ever-increasing glories to walk in its beautiful way.

"—Where duty is well done there's peace;
And peace is but the shadow of Heaven's-born
And peerless glory, falling softly on The soul from off the throne of love." H. B. S.

THE GOODNESS OF GOD.

Delightful theme! Sublime and exalted thought! What words more welcome to the desponding and desolate heart, than to be assured that our heavenly Father is good, and that this goodness will remain unchanged throughout time and eternity! What powerful and convincing evidences do we see scattered through all space, in attestation of this divine truth.

We behold his goodness in yonder twinkling orb on high—and we see it in the bright moon beam that cheers the heart of many a weary wanderer. We read his surpassing goodness in yon bright orb, that dispenses its fructifying rays so indiscriminately on the evil and on the good; and we discover it exhibited in an eminent degree in the refreshing rains that fall so abundantly on the just and on the unjust. Such is the sublime and eloquent language in which nature speaks to man of the exalted goodness of the Creator of all things. These sublime truths are reiterated in the volume of inspiration.

Notwithstanding these strong and insurmountable arguments that the Creator of all things is good, there are many in the world (I am sorry to say it) that disbelieve these strong testimonials, and would fain have us believe that our Father is a tyrant. Yea, if their system is true, a crueler tyrant than ever inhabited this lower world—one who has brought into being a race of intellectual creatures of his own good will and pleasure, for the sport of devils and damned spirits to all eternity. No wonder the eloquent Saurin exclaimed in contemplating this scene, "I find in the thought a mortal poison diffusing itself into every period of my life, rendering pleasure disgusting, nourishment insipid, and life itself a cruel bitter. I cease to wonder that the fear of hell hath made some melancholy and others mad."

But such views are fast fading from the public mind, and those more congenial with the lofty desires of the human soul are beginning to dawn upon the minds of men long enslaved by creeds and traditions. The goodness of God, its nature and extent, is frequently delineated in the sacred Scriptures, and is set forth as an object of the greatest moment.

The Psalmist in discoursing upon this great attribute of God, exclaims in the overflowing gratitude of his heart, "The Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works." "For the Lord is good, his mercy is everlasting; and his truth endureth to all generations." And again, "The earth is full of the goodness of the Lord."—Thus we perceive that the Psalmist had more exalted views of the Creator of all things, and did not wish to limit, like many at this day, his goodness to a particular few, whose hearts are so narrow that they can all be confined within the compass of a very small circle. He does not merely rest here, with this sublime truth upon his lips, but goes on to declare that this goodness never ends. For says he, "Why boasteth thou thyself in mischief, O mighty man? the goodness of God endureth continually." Thus showing conclusively, if God is good to all, and is to endure forever, that this glorious attribute of the divine perfection will never change in relation to his wayward children. For says God by the prophet, "I am the Lord, I change not, therefore are ye sons of Jacob not consumed." And to the same import speaks the Apostle, "Every good gift, and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning."

With these sublime declarations recorded in nature as well as in revelation, who can pass their allotted existence on earth in a state of despondency and gloom; when this ennobling theme, aside from the other abundant evidences of the final salvation of all from sin and misery, alone is sufficient to guide them safely through the shoals and quicksands of life, and open the portals of endless day for their admiration?

O happy thought! O theme divine!
Which prophets sung in ancient time;
When all nations of earth shall be Made free from sin and misery.

PIETY.

BY REV. S. J. GIBSON.

There is nothing within the human heart, respecting which men are so liable to err while judging, as when contemplating the evidences of true and genuine piety. The pure principles of religion have, in a great measure, become dimmed to the sight of mankind, and in their stead we too frequently find the cold reserve of a studied pharisaical gloom; and so accustomed have people become to a manifestation of this, that it is looked upon as a sure indication of a truly pious and deeply religious heart. And then, they cast their eyes upon that man upon whose countenance are pictured the smiles of many joys, and immediately form the judgment, that he is a stranger to all the emotions of piety. This is the manner in which the world has long been accustomed to form an opinion, yet we would inquire if this judgment is based upon the immutable principles of truth? This we are fully persuaded is not so; but, that man, upon whose countenance at all times appear marks of that darkened gloom, occasioned by continually sighing over the sinfulness of human nature, is we believe, a being "righteous overmuch." One may, like those of olden time, enlarge the borders of his garments—make broad his phylacteries and pay tithes, of mint and annise and cummin; or he may be strict in his attendance at church—preserve the Sabbath day holy, and pay much to carry the Gospel to the poor heathen, and yet be very far from being a truly pious man.

True piety consists, not in that rigid austerity which is a characteristic of too many of those who have made a profession of religion—not in that utter aversion to the innocent pleasures and amusements of the world; but in a compliance with the teachings of conscience, a faithful discharge of the moral duties set forth in the Gospel, and, in a word, not in a superstitious fear of God, but in supreme love to him, and a benevolence unbounded to the children of humanity. The truly pious man, in his progress through life, preserves a medium course. He descends not to the commission of those vices, which have a tendency to corrupt and sully the faculties of the mind—to strengthen the passions and lead them into their wild excesses; and on the other hand we see not those indications of disdain—those marks of abhorrence of all mankind, which we often behold upon the countenance of the professed religionist; but with a dignity which raises him far above the impurities of the world, and a benevolent spirit which looks with a compassionate eye upon those by whom he is surrounded, he at once enjoys a communion with the Creator which fills his heart with the pleasing emotions of love; and when among his fellowmen he mingles—his influence exerts a beneficial tendency—a superior place is cheerfully awarded him—he keeps an eye ever upon the morals of society and spares no opportunity to improve them, and thus does he become an ornament of that religion which has descended upon man, through the instrumentality of the Saviour.

But still, though such is the influence which this man exerts in the circle in which he moves, yet, by far too many, those actions are ascribed to some other cause, than the effect which is produced upon his heart by piety. He is not so strict as some, in relation to the duties of the sanctuary—he is not seen by man, offering up his long prayers before the throne of grace, and there is not in his movements an indication of that spirit which seems to say, "Stand by, come not near, for I am holier than thou;" and consequently he is not regarded as a pious man. That this judgment is erroneous, however, fully appears by a consideration of the fact, that when the scribe declared that to love God supremely and one's neighbor as himself, was more than all burnt offerings and sacrifices, it was affirmed of him, that he was not far from the kingdom of heaven, or that spiritual reign which the Saviour was to establish over the hearts of mankind, and in the which alone, consisted the principles of a pure and genuine piety.

Would that men, and more especially those who have made an open profession of religion, would look upon this subject in its true light—that they would let the sober second thought of the mind predominate, and then would heavenly piety which has been too long neglected, assert and maintain its peaceful sway—drive away the phrensy of superstition, and open upon community the principles of pure and undefiled religion. That this will one day be accomplished, we have every reason to expect; for improvement is steadily progressing, and people are every day being brought nearer to a knowledge of the truth. The time is not far distant, when the sickly professions of those who are imbued with no little superstition, will be seen in their true colors—when that rigid austerity now so prevalent, will no longer be regarded as an indication of deep and devoted piety, and then will the deeds of the hand form, as they should, a criterion by which to judge of the principles bearing sway in the heart; and then will the beauties of piety appear in their loveliness, and one devoted love—a love that bringeth life to the sons of men, forever encircle all.

IMMORTALITY.

There is, to my mind, nothing incredible in the supposition that God, who is infinite in power, wisdom, and goodness, and before whom the past and future are as one continual and eternal now, should clothe man with immortality, and make him the recipient of his benefactions. The benevolence which is displayed by the God of nature in supplying the wants of his dependant creatures, and the numerous exhibitions of his goodness, tend to inculcate this doctrine. Take a survey of the lower order of beings—beasts, birds, fishes, insects, and reptiles—they all find ample means for the gratification of every desire in the sphere in which they are placed. You will find that the smallest insect that there exists has within its immediate reach the means for gratifying its desires. Or if you dig down into the centre of the earth to the smallest creature that the eye of man is able to discover, its wants are also supplied. In short the desires of every being of the lower orders are abundantly provided for. Now has God so far departed from the rules of his government as to give man the master piece of his hand a desire which he did not intend to gratify? Did he give him this desire—a desire, which, when compared with his every desire besides, they sink into insignificance—to tantalize him, or was it with the benevolent design of giving him here a foretaste of those joys he has in reserve for him, and will ultimately bestow upon him? This desire is not confined to any part or portion of God's heritage, but, wherever man is found, whether civilized or uncivilized, savage or barbarian, its operations are discoverable by the most superficial observers turning his mind upward and still upward in search of something better and more elevated than earth can give. There is in the mind of every man an aching void, which earth with all her treasures can not fill. This desire which is as universal as man, did not originate in the Bible; for where the sacred volume was never seen, and where a Gospel messenger was never heard proclaiming "peace on earth and good will to men," it exists in all its strength; not having been contaminated by the doctrines and creeds of men, it recognizes a higher power than man—into their minds the dark and rayless belief of the Atheist hath never entered, but "The soul uneasy and confined from home, Rests and expatiates in a world to come."

Again, when we survey the works of nature we can not fail to discover that intelligence is displayed in every thing we are permitted to behold, which indicates an intelligent Creator, an eternal self-existent Being. There are also natural laws in existence, which indicate a Law Giver, and man is the only being endowed with abilities capable of searching into, understanding, and profiting by them—the only being capable of progressing in knowledge and to an unlimited extent. Can it be possible, that this principle will ever cease to exist?—Can it be possible that it is confined to this earth, this state of existence? No, it can not be. This principle in God is infinite and immortal, therefore the stream must partake of the nature of the fountain, and

"Beyond the reign of sin and death,
Beyond the precincts of the tomb,
There is a bright and beauteous land
Where flowers perennial ever bloom."

LETTER FROM BR. WHITCOMB.

Cortlandville, April 25, 1843.

BR. GROSH—It is truly encouraging to read the accounts recently published in the "Magazine and Advocate," of the progress of the cause of Universalism, in various places, in this state. The very large congregations to which some of our ministering brethren statedly minister—viz. from "five to six hundred," and from "three to six hundred"—but are we not very liable to be deceived, by this kind of wholesale estimate? and if so, will any permanent good result from such statements being published to the world? I have always deemed it prudent to be very careful not to overrate, in regard to these matters—and I have frequently observed, that these statements are written under great excitement, and sent abroad after some great doings, and would bear from twenty-five, to fifty per cent. discount—but if the statements are not exaggerated, the news is truly cheering.

Now as you wish for information, in relation to the progress and state of the cause, in various places, I will simply say, that we have a few faithful, devoted friends in this place, who have done nobly in liquidating the debts of the Society, and endeavoring to sustain their preacher. They have had preaching every Sabbath for more than three years past—congregations from fifty to two hundred—and on some extra occasions, such as Christmas Eve, etc., we have had at least a thousand. We have a Bible Class respectable for numbers, and a weekly conference, which we find pleasant and profitable. Since my location here, (being on my fourth year,) I have lectured in various places in the vicinity, but during the past year, I have lectured every alternate Sabbath evening, at Truxton and Virgil Corners, to respectable congregations—so that we think that the cause is prospering moderately with us—and I believe Brs. Clark and Hayward are doing well.

Affectionately, THOS. J. WHITCOMB.

THE OCEAN.

BY MISS. CELIA M. TIBBITS.

Who does not love the ocean—the dark, unfathomable, boundless deep, with its waves of starry brightness, and caves of light? How awfully grand! how fearfully majestic! How gracefully over its crystal surface flies the gallant ship, like some white winged bird of paradise, poising on each gem-like wave, as if about to soar away to its native skies. Ah, dearly do I love thee, old monarch; though thy locks are gray—ay, white as the hoar frost, and thy rage most terrible. Though thousands, millions of earth's children have gone down into thy strong holds, to return unto us no more; yet do I love thee, with a fervency which even thy despotism can never subdue. Ah, in the still night how have I dreamed of thee! and the deep murmur of thy minstrelsy came over me like the memory of days that are gone. Thy bright waves have rolled beneath me, I have plunged down into thy unmeasured depths and wandered amid its coral groves and pearly halls even to the mermaid's home. Ay, well do I love thee—not only when the wild billows have rocked themselves to sleep upon thy breast, and the cerulean skies are mirrored in thy clear depths—but when the wild storms are over thee—when the winds have crowned thy hoar locks with spray, and thunders are the music of thy revelry. When dark skies lower over thee, and thy waters flee away at the breath of the tempest—when each black wave is crowned with the lightning's wreath, then, O then do I love thee best!

A world of waters—of fearful gloom and mystery—the grave of millions—a world of brightness, and starry radiance—the home of unnumbered myriads—the sure treasury of the universe—such are thy strange and unexplored domains. Be it so! well have I loved thee—may my tomb be in thy unfathomed depths—thy wild storms my requiem.

LETTER FROM BR. MACK.

I would here add, that our cause is onward in Northern Pennsylvania. Four individuals of the first standing in the Partialist ranks have within two weeks come forward, and united with our society, declaring themselves believers in the restitution. The excitement in this region is unparalleled; thousands are enquiring, and last Sabbath our meeting house was filled to overflowing. Nineteen united with the society. Truly it may be said, "The Lord is doing a great work in this region." Eighteen months ago our society only numbered 39, it now numbers 93, and I assure you we have reason to "thank God and take courage"—for the period is not far distant when the legions of darkness shall be put to flight, and the black flag of endless misery cease to flutter in the winds of fanaticism, or wave over the dilapidated walls of ceaseless damnation.

The book of life is a great work. Every year is a volume, every month is a chapter, every week a page, every day a paragraph. Study it well.

GLORIFYING GOD.

BY REV. WM. G. ANDERSON.

1st Question.—“What is man's chief end?”

Ans.—“Man's chief end is to glorify God, and to enjoy him forever.”—Westminster Catechism.

Man is a moral being whose intellectual nature is capable of degrees of progression in excellence, surpassing our comprehension. His mental powers and every other faculty which he possesses, were bestowed on him by an all-wise, and ever bountiful Creator, to the end that he should cultivate these principles, faculties, and powers in glorifying God; in benefiting himself, and in doing good to mankind. Yet how many are there even among those called by the Christian name; who utterly neglect to give those truths a place in the affections of their hearts. The feelings and desires of too many men are adverse to the expansion of benevolence, humanity, and goodness. They fail to cultivate these graces; “to give all diligence to add to their faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge; and to knowledge temperance, and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness brotherly kindness,” because they do not know their value. They have no knowledge nor understanding, that the exercise of these cardinal graces, is emphatically, “to glorify God.” Hence multitudes among us suffer intense misery from a disregard of these facts. They live, but they die daily the death of sin; pleasure (so called), excess, revelling, intemperance, fraud, deceit, hypocrisy, lying, cheating, swearing, and other heinous crimes, that swell the black catalogue of human offences, are indulged in by them, without compunction, or remorse. Instead of training their minds to habits of sobriety, morality, and religion; they give licence to their passions and appetites; they are busily occupied in the abuse (not use) of the temporal and spiritual blessings which they are favored with.

One great cause, methinks, which has led to this, is, that they have heard from certain professed teachers of the Gospel, (alias Presbyterians, alias Episcopalians, alias Trinitarians, alias, so many aliases from Mahometanism to Mormonism,) that God, the only good Being, is cruel, instead of kind; malevolent instead of benevolent. They therefore do not “glorify God”—for a good reason; they can not, so long as they retain such views of his nature and attributes? Reader, how wretched is the state of such; how miserable! They see no beauty in the moral character or government of God; their state is a state of bondage,—a state of darkness,—a state of pollution,—a state of condemnation,—a state of doubt,—a state of misery;—a state of dissatisfaction,—a state of trial and continual pain.

On the other hand, the man who sets a proper estimate on the physical and moral endowments which the Almighty in the plenitude of his love has bequeathed him, will not fail to dedicate them to his service. He will offer up, on the altar of a pure heart, his ardent thanksgivings and prayers to God for making him what he is, an heir of immortality. He will endeavor to enlarge the sphere of his own usefulness in the world, “by doing good unto all men.” If he has received only one talent, he will not bury it in the earth; he will improve it for the “glory of God,” the service of religion, and the amelioration of the condition of mankind. How important, then, is it for every one whose lot has been cast in this land hallowed to liberty, (especially all such as adhere to the belief of the plan of God's universal grace and redemption,) that they should faithfully improve their time, privileges, and opportunities—that they should be up and doing—that they should have on, not only “the helmet,” but “the whole armor of God.” How inestimably precious are the temporal and spiritual comforts here enjoyed, contrasted with those of millions of our kind, (in other lands where we have been,) who have not yet tasted the “clear water of life,” and are consequently sunk in wretchedness and moral darkness. How infinitely great they appear, when compared with those of the priest-ridden Russian, the untutored Siberian, and untamed Cossack of Europe; the ignorant Hindoo, the superstitious Chinese, the bigoted Turk, cruel Tartar, and wild Caffrarian of Asia; the uncivilized Moor, unchristianized negro, and demoralized Arab of Africa; the debased Peruvian, and vindictive Mexican of South America; together with the many wandering tribes of Indians and savages of this continent—numbers of whom drink each other's blood; drown their innocent offspring, or offer themselves as sacrifices with their dead on the burning funeral pile; are crushed beneath the ponderous wheels of Juggernaut, or immolated at the feet of the dumb shrine, to appease the wrath of some fancied deity.

NATURE AND ART.

AN EPIGRAM.

When Eve, the first of woman-kind,
 As Queen of Eden roved,
 Her thoughts were free as mountain wind,
 And all who saw her loved.
 The Eagle screamed a lofty note,
 The Lion tossed his mane,
 And e'en the Linnet's little throat
 Essay'd a flatt'ring strain.
 The eye—the lip—the soul-fraught face,
 These won the first of men,
 Each movement gave to life a grace,
 To deck the mother of our race,—
 There were no bustles then.

[OUR ANSWER.]

CIVILIZATION AND ART.

AN EPIGRAM.

When Eve through early Eden moved,
 And tuned her maiden voice,
 It was not strange that Adam loved,
 He'd only Hobson's choice.
 But when ten girls are found at home,
 With chance for scarce two men,
 Not idle grace, nor “Linnet's” hum,
 Will catch the bean: to make him come
 Each girl must “bustle then.”

We copy the following letter at the request of a subscriber, as well as for its own merits. It has lately been “going the rounds” in the paper, with the introductory remarks here annexed, and credited to the Southern Literary Messenger. But its publication is by no means so recent. I believe this is the second appearance in the Magazine and Advocate, and I remember well reading it in a Universalist periodical published as early as about 1822. If I am not mistaken it was then prefaced with the remark that it had “been recently discovered,” etc. Wonder how long the discovery may remain recently! But the letter is truly Franklinian, and is worthy of being read every two or three years until it can be recited. A. B. G.

DR. FRANKLIN.

The following is a copy of an original letter from the venerable Franklin, to a minister of the Gospel in the southern part of New Jersey, which has recently been discovered there among some old family papers. It is a composition perfectly in the manner and style of that great and worthy man:

Philadelphia June the 6th 1765.

DEAR SIR:—I received your kind letter of the 2nd inst., and am glad to hear that you increase in strength. I hope you will continue mending until you regain your former health and firmness. Let me know whether you continue the cold bath, the effect it has. As to the kindness you spoke of, I wish I could have been of more real service to you; that you would always be ready to serve any other that may need your assistance, and so let good offices go round; for, mankind are all of a family. For my own part, when I am employed in serving others, I do not look upon myself as conferring favors but as paying debts. In my travels, and since my settlement, I have received much kindness from men, to whom I shall never have an opportunity to make the least direct return, and numberless mercies from God, who is infinitely above being benefited by our services. For these kindnesses from men, I can therefore only show my gratitude to God, by a readiness to help his other children and my brethren; for I do not think that thanks and compliments though repeated weekly, can discharge our real obligations to each other, much less to our Creator.

You will see in this my notion of good works; that I do not expect to merit heaven by them. By heaven we understand a state of happiness, infinite in degree, and eternal in duration; we can do nothing to merit such a reward. He, that for giving a draught of water to a thirsty person, should expect to be paid with a great plantation, would be modest in his demands, compared with those who think they deserve heaven for the little good they do on earth. Even the mixed imperfect pleasures, we enjoy in this world, are rather from God's goodness than our merit; how much more so the happiness of heaven? For my part, I have not the vanity to think that I deserve it, the folly to expect it, or the ambition to desire it; but content myself in submitting to the disposal of that God, who made me, who has hitherto preserved and blessed me, and in whose fatherly goodness I may well confide, that he will never make me miserable, and that the afflictions, I may at any time suffer, may tend to my benefit.

The faith you mentioned has doubtless its uses in the world. I do not desire to see it diminish, nor would I desire to see it lessened in any man: but I would wish it were more productive of good works than I have seen; I mean real good works, works of kindness, charity, mercy, public spirit, no holiday keeping, sermon hearing, or reading, performing church ceremonies, or making long prayers, filled with flatteries and compliments, despised even by wise men, and much less capable of pleasing the Deity.

The worship of God is a duty, the learning and reading may be useful; but if a man rest in hearing and praying, (as too many do,) it is as if the tree valued itself on being watered, and putting forth leaves though it produce no fruit.

Our good master thought less of these outward appearances than do many of his modern disciples; He preferred the doers of the word to the hearers; the son that seemingly disobeyed his father, and yet performed his commandments, to him that professed his readiness, but neglected his work. The heretical, but charitable, but orthodox priest, and sanctified Levite, and those who gave food to the hungry, drink to the thirsty, and raiment to the naked, entertainment to the stranger, who never heard of his name, he declares, shall, in the last day, be excepted, when those who cry Lord! Lord! who value themselves on their faith, though great enough to perform miracles, but have neglected good works, shall be neglected.

He professed that he came, not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance, which implied in his modest opinion, that there were some in his time so good that they needed not to hear even for improvement; but now-a-days, we have scarcely a little person who does not think it the duty of every man within his reach to sit under his petty ministration, and that, whoever omits this, offends God. I wish to such more humility, and to you health and firmness. Being your friend and servant.

WASHINGTONIAN STATE CONVENTION.

The undersigned were appointed by the Washingtonian State Convention held at Utica, in June last, a Committee to prepare, publish, and circulate, a call for another convention, to be held in the city of Utica, on the second Wednesday in June, 1843. In pursuance of said appointment, and to carry out the declared wishes of said convention as embodied in the resolutions passed by it, we give notice that a convention of the Washingtonian temperance societies in this state will be held in the city of Utica, commencing the second Wednesday (14th) of June, 1843, at 11 o'clock, A. M., for the purpose of mutual consultation on ways and means for the furtherance of temperance on Washingtonian principles, and perfecting the organization and operations of our various societies and conferences—of hearing and communicating the progress of the reform in the various sections of the state; and of performing such other business as may be laid before the convention by its regularly appointed delegates.

We earnestly urge on each Washingtonian society at or near the county seat of each county in this state, to call a county convention in each county as early as possible, for the purpose of appointing delegates to represent said county in the state convention. Send a delegation of good men and true—who will attend, and who will faithfully represent your wishes and feelings in this gathering of the brethren, and give a new impulse to the glorious reform in this state. Be particular to request each society to send to such county convention full and correct statistics of its origin, progress and present condition and numbers, and let such reports be embodied into one full grand report of the condition of the cause in your county, and be forwarded to the state convention by your delegates. This is an important and hitherto neglected subject. May we not hope that in every county convention it will be fully attended to? We also respectfully request of each society located at or near the office of any newspaper, to procure at least one insertion of this call in such paper, that it may be generally known and attended to. We hope there are few editors in the state so unfriendly to this great and benevolent cause, as to refuse so slight a favor to our and their friends.

BRETHREN—WASHINGTONIANS—the time is near at hand, be ye therefore “instant in season,” that it may find you ready—prepared with delegations to represent you, and serve the cause. From the London of America to the City of the Lakes—from Ontario and St. Lawrence to the Pennsylvania line—come one, come all, to the gathering of the Washingtonian clans, strong in the might of clear reason and cold water, and glowing with the spirit of love and kindness. Our brethren and sisters in the Central City will give you a warm welcome, and hundreds of warm hearted Washingtonians will wait on your exhortations and cheering tidings with listening ears. Remember to send your county delegations to the state convention of Washingtonians, to be held in Utica, on the second Wednesday (14th) of June, 1843.

PUNISHMENT.... NO. II.

It was in relation to the divine dealings that the Apostle Paul wrote as follows:—“Furthermore, we have fathers of our flesh which corrected us, and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection unto the Father of spirits and live? For they verily for a few days chastened us after their own pleasure; but he for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness.” In this passage the nature of punishment is correctly defined; and we are conclusively shown, that the design of God’s chastenings is, to reform the chastened—to turn them from their evil ways, and make them partakers of the divine nature. And what other design could a wise and good Being have? What other possible object could a heavenly Father have in view in punishing his children, save the enhancement of their best and dearest interests—the bringing of the strayed ones back to innocence and joy? We have seen with what object an earthly parent punishes—it is not for the gratification of a malevolent disposition—not for the sake of producing pain—not because he delights in the suffering of his child—but because he is interested in his welfare, and would make him obedient, and turn his feet in the ways of peace. And shall mortal man be more just than God, shall a man be more pure than his Maker?

With God, as with an earthly father, punishment is only a means for the accomplishment of an ultimate object—and that object is the reformation and reconciliation of the sinner. It is an evidence of God’s mindfulness of us; “for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth.” And hence we must believe that punishment is not vindictive in its nature, but reformatory; being designed and instituted for the humbling of the proud, the conversion of the sinful—the bringing back of the wandering, and the turning away of the wicked from their evil doings.

To render the fact still more obvious that punishment is not an end in the divine economy, we may consider, that such a supposition conflicts with the will of God. The end contemplated in this is salvation—not for a few but for all. “For this,” said an apostle, when enforcing the duty of universal prayer and supplication—“For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour, who will have all men to be saved, and come unto a knowledge of the truth.” It matters not, so far as our present argument is concerned, whether the will here spoken of be expressive of determination or only of desire—the salvation of all men, and not the punishment or misery of a part, is set forth as the end contemplated by it.

This same great and benevolent end stands forth conspicuously in the revealed purpose of God, which is, “that in the dispensation of the fullness of times he might gather together in one, all things in Christ.”—The ingathering of a lost world, according to this, is the contemplated result in the determinate counsel of the Almighty, and not punishment.

And so in relation to the object of a Saviour’s mission—he came to set despairing prisoner free—to loose the bands of every captive—to destroy sin and transgression, and reconcile the whole world to God. The heathen were given him for an inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for a possession; and he was invested with the mediatorial dominion, that he might subdue all things to himself, and cause every knee to bow, and every tongue to confess him Lord to the glory of God the Father. Salvation—reconciliation and happiness, then, form the great object and the ultimate end of the reign of Christ. Punishment has no place here—it may be, and is a means for the attainment of this end—but forms no contemplated final result in the economy of divine grace.

This adds additional support to the truth, that punishment, in the government of God, is disciplinary in nature—is designed to reform, and hence must be limited in duration. If it be not an end—and we have shown that is not—then it must be a means in the hands of a good Being for the accomplishment of good in behalf of his creatures. And what this good is, which is set forth as the designed and purposed result of the just and fatherly chastisements of God, is clearly manifest—it is reformation, reconciliation, and salvation.

Endless punishment has ever seemed to me to be a contradiction in terms—for being set forth by justice for correction and amendment, when this is accomplished, punishment in the very nature of things must cease. But have we any assurance, it may be asked, that punishment will attain its designed end and object? To this we reply, that to suppose it will fail, is to call in question the wisdom of God; for being instituted by him for the purpose already named, we must either suppose that it will accomplish the object designed, or that God has erred in his choice of means. Which of the two suppositions is the most preferable and consistent you must decide for yourselves.

That the designed object of punishment will be secured, and by the co-operation of the other means of grace, the reconciliation and salvation of the world be effected, is shown by the prediction that Sodom and Samaria shall return to their former estate, together with their daughters; when Jerusalem shall be restored. The cities here referred to, and their inhabitants were swept away by the hand of the divine justice for their wickedness; and the prophecy goes forward to a time, when the judgments of God having produced their intended effects, they shall be again restored.

It was in relation to the Jews that the Saviour said: “O Jerusalem! Jerusalem! which killeth the prophets, and stoneth them that are sent unto thee; how often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen doth gather her brood under her wings, and ye would not! Behold, your house is left unto you desolate: and verily I say unto you, Ye shall not see me, until the time come when ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.” The Saviour saw the impending calamities that were about to fall upon the Hebrew people. He saw that their city and nation would be destroyed; and that they should be scattered and dispersed throughout all the world. But his vision was not interrupted here—he saw the punishment inflicted on them accomplishing its object, and as the end, he contemplated them, as coming out from the darkness of unbelief, as arising from a state of moral death, and with full hearts exclaiming—“Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.”

THE RESTITUTION.... NO. IV.

“God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name; that at the name of Jesus, every knee shall bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father.” Phil. ii: 9, 10, 11. In this passage, as in the others, Professor Stuart affirms that the phrase “things in heaven, earth, and under the earth,” mean the universe—so that it is evident the apostle was speaking of all men. Besides, notice the word “every.” That word embraces every person or thing, about which we may be writing or telling. If I say of a crowd, every person hurraed, I mean every one in that crowd. So the word every embraces all the persons about whom the apostle was writing—viz., the universe—the knee should bow and the tongue should confess—of every person in the entire family of rational beings. What were these persons to do? They were 1, To bow the knee. This expression refers to the custom of bending the knees before kings, as an act of homage, especially when favors were besought. What would a king think, if he knew that an individual who was bending before him, hated his person, despised his authority, and only wanted an opportunity to engage in rebellion?—would he not despise such hypocritical homage? And will the Saviour be pleased with the homage of millions, whom, he knows, disobey his laws and despise his government? Nay!—he will accept no other homage but that which is sincere. 2, “Every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.” Can any one seriously believe, that it would add to the glory of God, to have the Saviour tread millions beneath his feet, and force from them the acknowledgment that he is Lord? The bare statement refutes itself. That the worship will be sincere, is evident from the fact, that Professor Stuart has proved that the worship will be “spiritual and divine.” And had he not so proved, the apostle sets the question at rest, by saying, that “no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Spirit.” 1. Cor. xii: 3. Consequently, the worship is sincere; and if sincere, then those making it, must be holy and happy. And if the universe is joined in this worship, then the doctrine of the Restitution is true beyond a question.

CONFERENCE IN LITTLE YORK.

Brother Grosh—After so long a delay, I have so far conquered my inclination to silence, (as to corresponding,) that I have started my pen to communicate some notice of our Quarterly Conference in this place, (Little York,) held last January. Notwithstanding the tremendous thaw which preceded it, and swept away the snow and some bridges, which prevented several preachers who intended to have been with us, we had five—viz., Brs. Sias, Hull, Squires, Abbott and Swan—four of whom were only two years in the ministry, yet our friends here and from adjacent societies unanimously decided that the discourses were exceedingly well chosen, and well delivered. There were quite a number of Christians of other denominations who attended, and among them a Methodist and a Baptist preacher, both of whom took part in the services. Several of our brethren thought it was the best meeting they ever attended.

Our young ministering brethren are deserving praise for their chaste and liberal language in their discourses—the hateful word Partialist I believe was not made use of. Let bigots and hypocrites of other denominations call Universalists hell-redemptionists and infidels, and the like, if they will; but let not the lovers of truth and of all mankind indulge in calling their fellow Christians nicknames, or names which they do not adopt.

I will also mention with gratitude the fruits of our good meeting. A few weeks subsequently my kind friends, (here, and at Hatesborough and Gouverneur,) joined in a donation, and brought to us the substantial tokens of brotherly kindness, food and clothing with a quantity of other needed articles. May they find that it is more blessed to give than to receive. Yours truly,

A. Wood.

Fowler, April, 1843.

REPLY.

Dear Brother Wood—I am almost as loth to oppose you in your feelings and remarks, as you appear to be in regard to our Partialist brethren, as I term them; and therefore hesitated long about replying thus publicly to your otherwise very acceptable letter. But, on the whole, I have concluded that you will think none the worse of me, if I speak the truth to you in all plainness, provided it is also spoken in love.

I am much pleased to hear that our young ministering brethren succeed so well in their labors; and as I know them to be men whose feelings agree with their speech, I agree with you that they deserve praise for their chaste and liberal language—not for the language in itself, but for the feelings of which it is the sign.

But it appears that you were particularly pleased with their omission of one word—“Partialist.” I hope they did not omit the idea that word is intended to convey whenever rightly used; that is, if their subject rendered any mention necessary of those who believe in the salvation of but a part of the human race. If they omitted the idea, when necessary to be used, they were more unfaithful than I have ever known them—and if they used the idea, I can not imagine what you are so thankful for—unless you suppose the word “Partialist” to mean something very different from the meaning I have always attached to it.

This, it appears to me, you do; for you plainly intimate that those of us who use it are “bigots and hypocrites,” and use it with a meaning as wide of correctness and truth, as are the terms “hell-redemptionists” and “infidels,” when applied to us by “the bigots and hypocrites of other denominations!” I am very sorry (if this is your meaning; though I can not really believe you did mean what your words seem to insinuate,) to find you, while so pleased at the omission of one name which you deem a hard one, dealing out others that are certainly not any softer. Those who call us hell-redemptionists and infidels would rather be call “Partialists” than “bigots and hypocrites;” and most certainly I would rather be called an infidel and a hell-redemptionist by them, than have you insinuate that I am either a bigot or a hypocrite—and that, too, merely for using a name as expressive, and designed to be no less courteous and respectful to our opposers, than is the word Universalist when applied by them to us. For by “Partialist,” I mean, and only mean, “one who believes in the salvation of only a part of the human race, or, in a partial salvation of mankind”—and by “Universalist,” they mean “one who believes in the salvation of the whole human race, or, in universal salvation.” They deem our faith wrong and pernicious, and mean to designate us as believers in it; and we believe their faith to be wrong and injurious, and mean to designate them as believers in it. We use not the word Partialist as a term of opprobrium or reproach, however; but merely as a defining term; precisely as they use the word Universalist.—And the idea we intend to convey by the word, we can not do without—we want to use and express it, whenever we desire to speak of those who believe that only a part of mankind will be saved—and this idea we can not express without using one or more words which shall stand as the sign of that idea. I prefer one word to a number of words, or a circumlocutory phrase, which, after all, only means the same thing. But every one to his taste; only do not condemn me for expressing the same meaning you do, simply because I do not express it in just the same words.

In conclusion I would remark, my venerable brother, that I am willing to adopt any word which shall expressly designate all who believe in but a partial salvation of mankind. If our opposers do not like the expressive and (meant to be) respectful word “Partialist,” let them give us any other, and I will use it, and urge others to use it. But the idea I can not lay aside. As long as the dogma of endless sin and misery exists in the minds of men, I must wage uncompromising war against it, and shall want some term to denote its believers, that I may be understood—that I may distinguish between the believer and the belief in dishonesty, candor, and Christian charity for him, and fidelity in hating and opposing his error. And I am certain that every honest Partialist will appreciate my motives, and respect me the more, the less I possess of a man-pleasing, man-fearing spirit; and the more I manifest a desire to establish what I believe to be truth in doctrine, charity in feeling, and righteousness in practice among Christians of every creed and name.

With much esteem I am truly and affectionately your younger brother in the Gospel,

A. B. Grosh.

ATONEMENT.

How hard it is to reconcile human creeds with the testimony of Holy Writ—especially when the former are as directly contrary to the latter as is the popular to the scriptural doctrine of the atonement. The following instance in point is taken from an old number of the New York Watchman, a Methodist paper. It speaks for itself, as to the circumstances that produced it.

REV. L. KING'S QUESTIONS.

Quest. 1. By what Scripture is it proved that the death of Christ was designed to reconcile his Father to us? Reconciliation is to be effected in a party that is hostile to another. Man is at enmity against God, but may be reconciled through the death of Christ. But God is said to be angry with sinners—his wrath abides upon them. This must be removed, and what is this but a reconciliation? Now, Paul says expressly, Rom. v: 10, “When we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son.” Reconcile here can not refer to man, i. e. removing our enmity, for it is said to be while we were yet enemies. It can, therefore, only refer to a change in the divine regards to man, effected through the death of Christ, rendering him propitious to us. In Cor. v: 19, it is said, “God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them.” Sin must exclude us from any favorable regards from God. But this being atoned for he is reconciled, and does not impute our trespasses, but in the riches of his grace seeks to reconcile us by destroying the enmity of our hearts. For a full view of this subject see Watson on Reconciliation.

Can it be possible that the person, who answers the Rev. L. King's question, did not see and feel that he was giving a direct contradiction to the plain, obvious, and express meaning of the very passages of Scripture he quoted to prove his contradiction of them. “We [not God] were reconciled to God, [not God to us,] by the death of his Son,” this sage logician explains to mean the very reverse of what it says! And the reason he gives for his explanation is one of very sage profundity and force—“for it (the reconciliation) is said to be done while we were yet enemies.” Wonderful! Where else would this Methodist expounder have a reconciliation effected? After we had ceased to be enemies?—when we had become friends? There would then be no need of our being reconciled. But he says that for the reason (?) he gives, it must have been God, and not we, (as the apostle declares,) who was reconciled. Was God an enemy? If so, then it could not be God, “for it....was done while God was our enemy!” It is a poor rule that will not work both ways. So much for Methodist logic.

The truth is, the doctrine that the atonement consisted, in reconciling God to man, is not only contrary to the immutability of God's nature and attributes, but it is also a contradiction of the express and repeated teachings of Scripture. In every case, men are said to be reconciled to God, and not God to men, as the creed books teach. “God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself”—not himself unto the world. “By whom (Jesus) we (not God) have received the atonement,” says Paul, who was far from holding the popular dogma of reconciling God to man. “We pray you therefore, be ye reconciled to God”—not God to you, as modern divines would teach. And in accordance with this plain and positive testimony we are assured that God loved (not hated) the world while it was dead in trespasses and sins—that “God's goodness leadeth men to repentance;” not that man's repentance leads God to goodness—that “we love God because he first loved us;” not that God loves us, because we first loved him—that, “after that the love of God to man appeared....he saved us;” not that we were saved before God could love man. All these writers of the New Testament must have been sad heretics, if Methodism is the standard of Orthodoxy; and we marvel greatly that Methodist divines do not discard them utterly as leaning to Universalism, even as some of them are discarding their great Commentator Dr. Adam Clarke, because he chimes in with so many of our interpretations of Scripture.

Reader, which will you believe—the Methodist who has answered Mr. King's question by perverting Scripture as above shown; or, the Scriptures themselves? There can be no doubt that one is diametrically opposed to the other in sentiments, so that you must give up one or the other. You can not believe both, unless you can believe contradictions. Which, then, will you believe? That the atonement (or reconciliation) effects the change in God? or, that it was made to, and changes the sinner? If the latter—if you believe that "when we (not God) were enemies, we (not God) were reconciled by the death of his Son," as the Bible, and reason, both declare, then, look out! one prop that holds up the fabric of popular error on the sandy foundation, is taken away in your mind, and vicarious atonement, infinite satisfaction, the deity of Christ, the doctrine of the trinity, and a host of other popular absurdities, paradoxes, mystical moonshine, and Babylonian jargon will fade away after it, as wreaths of smoke and fog before the light of the sun. Stand firm under! for the whole fabric of error must fall before awakened reason, when it receives and is guided by the plain teachings of God's word.

THE CENTRAL NEW YORK WASHINGTONIAN; a temperance newspaper in folio form, some weeks since entered on its second volume, somewhat enlarged in size, with a handsomely engraved title (or head,) and Wm. It is published every Friday, in Rome and Utica simultaneously, by J. P. Fitch, Esq., of Rome, at only one dollar per annum in advance. We wish it great prosperity, and abundant success in its labors of love and reason. ## AN AWFUL THOUGHT.

To think that a portion of our fellow creatures—creatures susceptible of almost infinite happiness or misery—creatures of a moment, destined to live but for an hour in the fleeting and transitory world—to think that such are to suffer through a long and never ending eternity, is a thought fraught with something awful beyond the power of language to express. Ceaseless anguish! endless woe! Black despair, where no gleam of hope or mercy can ever come. O who can bear the thought? Who can say in view of such a doctrine, "Lord, it is enough. I am satisfied with the dispensation of thy providence?" Who can say, and feel what he says "Thy will, O God, be done." But awful as it is, how many, yes, alas! how many there are who expect to be wailed to the fair climes of endless bliss above, while others are to wail with ghosts and damned spirits world without end.—With another, I have long ceased to wonder that the fear of hell hath made some mad and others melancholy. If any one cause has a tendency to dethrone reason, and deprive the mind of all hope, it is this sad sickening thought. It is this that has rendered this world to many, truly, a "wilderness of woe—a vale of tears." It is this that has filled our world with weeping, mourning, and lamentation. How many kind mothers and doting fathers have taken the last sad farewell of the dearest objects of their affection, with the thought lingering about the recesses of the soul, my child has gone to hell. But glory be the name of God, that "news from the regions of the skies" declares the doctrine as false as it is wicked.

DEATHS.

In Florida, near Braman's Corners, April 12th, Mrs. SARAH ANN LYON, wife of Rev. H. Lyon, aged 27 years.

In the death of sister Lyon, a husband has been deprived of an affectionate companion, three small children of a kind mother, and a wide circle of friends of one greatly endeared to them by her many virtues. Firm in the faith of the ultimate salvation of a world from sin and death, and the reunion of friends in the spirit-land, she was prepared to die; and bidding her weeping friends be of good cheer, she fell sweetly asleep in Jesus. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

Sister Weeden was a member of the Universalist society at Middleville; and she gave ample testimony, as she declined in death, of the sustaining principle of her religion, and of its sufficiency to cheer the soul in the dark hour of dissolving nature. Near Magnolia, Putnam county, Ills., March 20th, Mrs. SYLVIA GAYLORD, consort of Lemuel Gaylord, aged 74 years.

Mrs. Gaylord suffered much from ill health for several years previous to her death, yet she bore it with that fortitude and resignation that becometh the Christian. She was a firm believer in that free salvation so fully taught in the Gospel, having embraced this faith in her earliest years. The consideration that God is immutable, that he is "good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works," she observed to her friends, was to her a source of unflinching dependence, the prop on which she leaned for support, a present help in every time of need. These views of the character of God enabled her in her last moment to triumph over the king of terrors, and to resign her spirit without fear into the hands of him who gave it. Truly may it be said that these views, and this faith only, "can make a dying bed as soft as downy pillows are," and enable the dying one to exclaim in the words of the apostle, "O death, where is thy sting! O grave, where is thy victory!"

Our community sustain in the death of sister Gaylord, the loss of an exemplary Christian, and the Universalist society here, of a valuable member. The friends and relatives were addressed on the occasion, by the writer, from Luke ii: 29, 30.

SONNET—TO MY MOTHER.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

Long ere my eyes beheld the light of day,
Or infant lips could lip thy tender name,
Or I knew aught from whence my being came,
I was beloved of thee. And while I lay,
All cradled on thy bosom soft to rest,
Like some lone bird within its downy nest,—
If e'er my restless breathing caught thy eye,
Maternal care and love sought out relief,
And watched my growing years. And ever nigh,
To keep me from the snares of life—its grief,
And image Heaven on my tender heart,
My mother stood. And thus to what I was to be
I grew beneath a parent's fostering art,
And what I am, or e'er shall be, I owe to thee.

YOUR FATHER IS A MAN AGAIN.

BY JOHN NEAL.

Oh, mother! mother! tell me pray,
What mean the people when they say,
Dear father is a man again!
We heard them while we were at play,
And brother, as he turned away,
Grew pale, as if with pain.
And dearest mother, tell me why
You look so happy when you cry?
And why you don't complain?
And why to-day, your pleasant eyes
Are just the color of the skies,
After a pleasant rain?
Hush, mother! hush! what's that I hear?
Sweet music answering thee, my dear;
The tread of happy men!
The Washingtonians are out!
In all their strength!—I hear a shout,
Your father is a man again!

A TALE OF HORROR.

A recent traveller gives the following as one of his experiences of foreign enjoyments. He had gone to sleep in one of his Indian tents, and continues:

"I might have slept perhaps for some four or five hours, and a dreamless and satisfying sleep it was; but certain it is—let Sciolists say what they will, and skeptics throw doubts by handsfull on the assertions of metaphysicians—that before I awoke, and in my dreamless slumber, I had a visible perception of danger—a helpless cognizance of being bed-fellowed by peril—a consciousness of the hovering presence of death.

"How to describe my feelings I know not; but as we have all read and heard that if the eyes of a watcher are steadily fixed on the countenance of a sleeper for a certain length of time, the slumberer will be sure to start up, wakened by the mysterious magnetism of a recondite principle of vision; so was it, that with shut eyes and drowsed up senses, an inward ability was conferred upon me to see, though blind, the formless shape of a mysterious horror crouching beside me; and, as if peril that was my night mate was of a nature to be quickened into activity by any movement on my part, I felt in my very stupor the critical necessity of lying quite still; so that when I awoke, and felt that as I lay with my face towards the roof, there was a thick, heavy cloud, creeping then upon my chest, I stirred not, nor uttered a word of panic. Danger and fear may occasionally dull the senses and paralyse the faculties, but they generally sharpen both; and ere I could twice wink my eyes, I was broad aware that, coiling and coiling itself up into a circle of twists, a huge serpent was on my chest.—When I felt you that the whole of my breast, and even the pit of my stomach, were covered with the cold scaly proportions of the reptile, you will own that it must have been one of a considerable size.

"What my thoughts were—so made up of abhorrence, dread, and the expectation, nay, assurance of speedy death that must follow any movement on my part—I can never tell in language sufficiently vivid to convey their full force. It was evident the loathsome creature had at length settled itself to sleep, and I felt thankful that, attracted by my breath, it had not approached the upper part of my throat. It became quite still, and its weighty pressure—its clammy chillness at first becoming gradually (as it seemed to me) of a burning heat—and the odious indescribable odour which was exhaled from its body and pervaded the whole air, so overwhelmed me, that it was only by a fierce struggle that I prevented myself from shrieking. As it was, a cold sweat burst from every pore—I could hear the beating of my heart—and I felt, to my dismay, that the palsy of terror had begun to agitate my limbs. 'I will awake,' thought I, 'and all is over.'

"At this juncture something—it might be a wall lizard, or a large beetle—fell from the ceiling right upon my left arm, which lay stretched beside me. The snake, uncoiling its head, raised it with a low hiss, and then, for the first time, I saw its head, the fearful crest glittering in the faint light—it was a cobra di cappello!

"Shutting my eyes to exclude the dreadful spectacle, I lay almost fainting, until all was again quiet. Had its fiery glances met mine, all would have been over; but apparently it was once more asleep, and presently I heard the Lascar moving about, undoing the fastenings of the tent and striking a light. A sudden thought struck me, and with an impulse I could then ascribe to nothing short of desperation, though its effects were so providential. I uttered in a loud but sepulchral tone, Kulassi! (Lascar.)

"'Sahib!' was the instantaneous response, and my heart beat quicker at the success of my attempt. I lay still again, for the reptile, as evidently aroused, made a movement, and its head, as I suppose, fell on my naked arm. O, God! the agony of the moment, when suppressed tremor almost gave way to madness.

"I debated with myself whether I should again endeavor to attract the attention of the kulassi, or remain perfectly quiet; whether it would not be better than either to start up at once, and shake the hideous burden from me. But the latter suggestion was at once abandoned by the assurance I felt that it would prove fatal. Impeded by the coils of the creature, and weak and nerveless from excitement, I could not escape its fangs.—Again, therefore, I spoke in the low but distinct tone which arise from the throat when the speaker is afraid to move a muscle—'Kulassi, chiragh!'—'Lascar, a lantern.'

"Again the cobra moved, and again, thank God! the ready Lascar replied—

"'Lata hou, sahib!'—'I am bringing it, Sir.'

"There was then a sound of clanging metal; light advancing flashed across the roof of the verandah; and at the noise of quick coming feet, lo! one after one its horrible coils unwinding, the glistly monster glided away from my body, and the last sounds that struck my sense of hearing were the 'Ya illahi samp'—'O God! a snake!'—of the Lascar, for I fainted away for the first time in my life."

CREDULITY OF "MILLERITES" IN 1712.

In the year 1712, Mr. Whiston having calculated the return of a comet, which was to make its appearance on Wednesday, the 14th of October, at 5 minutes after 5 in the morning, he gave notice to the public accordingly, with this terrifying addition: that a total dissolution of the world by fire, was to take place on the Friday following. The reputation that Mr. W. had long maintained both as a divine and a philosopher, left little or no doubt with the populace of the truth of his prediction. Several ludicrous events took place in consequence. A number of persons in and about London, seized all the barges and boats they could lay their hands on in the Thames, very rationally concluding that when the conflagration took place, there would be more safety on the water. A gentleman, who had neglected family prayer more than five years, informed his wife that he was determined to resume that laudable practice the same evening, but she having engaged a ball at her house, persuaded her husband to put it off till they saw whether the comet appeared or not. The South Sea stock immediately fell to 5 per cent, and the India stock to 11. The captain of a Dutch ship threw all his powder into the river, that the ship might not be endangered.

The next morning the comet appeared, according to prediction, and before noon the belief was universal that the day of judgment was at hand. About this time of the day, 123 clergymen were ferried over to Lambeth, it was said, to petition that a short prayer might be penned and ordered—there being none in the church service on that occasion. Three maids of honor burned their collection of novels and plays, and sent to a bookseller to buy each of them a Bible, and Taylor's Holy Living and Dying. The run upon the Bank was so prodigious, that all hands were employed from morning till night in discounting notes and handing out specie. On Thursday, considerable more than 7000 mistresses were legally married, in the face of several congregations. And, to crown the whole, Sir Gilbert Heathcote, at that time head director of the bank, issued orders to all the fire offices in London, requiring them to keep a good lookout, and have a particular eye on the Bank of England.

A SCHOOL IN THE TREADMILL.

The Boston Transcript says that a jailor in England has devised an improvement in the treadmill. The prisoners, at every step they take, call up to view a letter or word, and are thus taught the alphabet and reading whilst they are at work. In this way they, by degrees, become able to read a chapter in the Bible.

We do not know who is the ingenious inventor of the Tread Mill School, but whoever he may be, he deserves the reward which the fellow got who invented the brass bull, for the convenience of roasting prisoners, so that their groans might issue from the mouth of the image, and sound like the roaring of a real bull. He was complimented for his ingenuity, and rewarded by being placed inside, while the executioner built a clear fire below the bull.

A man upon the "treadmill," learning to read the Scriptures, is a poor illustration of the doctrines of the holy book. Better, by far, to renew the whipping post, and marking iron, than to mingle the acquisition of religious knowledge with such infernal machinery. Let the culprit be punished. We entertain no morbid sensibilities for the scoundrel who disturbs society by his thefts, his libels, or his forgeries; but do not bring contempt upon the word of inspiration, by making its acquisition depend upon a renewed turn of the rack, and tighter twist of the cord, or another revolution of the wheel.

Let the man be punished—let him endure the severities of the law's penalties; but when he sinks away in solitude and anguish, and the "flesh quivers where the pincers tear," then let the ministrations of that word come with healings on its wings. The literary knowledge acquired by the treadmill, must be so associated in the mind as to create disgust; and the heart would be hardened against every precept and promise of the Gospel, that would be opened by a small increase of horizon, acquired by mounting a new step on the revolving torture machine.

It is the light of religion that brings comfort. Its healings are to be applied to the bruised and crushed, and not unfixed with the wounded. It is the acceptance, too, and not the knowledge, that gives efficacy to biblical truths. It is not personal torments that make us receive. Men do not gain by threatening. The wise man who would win souls, knowing the terrors, persuades men.

Let us hear, then, no more of treadmill Scripture learning. It is a mockery. It is an almost blasphemous misapplication of that sacred remark, "I was sick, and in prison, and ye came and ministered unto me."—[U. S. Gazette.

AN IDEA OF THE UNIVERSE....NO. IV.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

We were last speaking of the nebulae found in the heavens, the number of stars and magnitude of each contained in one of them. We are not yet through contemplating these. As I said, by the aid of powerful glasses there have several thousands of these clusters been discovered, and it is a probable supposition that each contains at least as many, if not more stars than our nebulae or Milky Way, which are computed at 20,000,000. Then, what an inconceivable number would these 20,000,000 make multiplied by the several thousand nebulae, and then consider that each of these starry worlds from their immense distance from us, must be many thousand times larger than the sun. From the observations made by Sir J. Herschel of some of the more distant nebulae, he is of the opinion that our nebulae, or the Milky Way is not the most considerable in the universe; and he points out some very remarkable nebulae which can not be less but are probably much larger than that of which our sun and system form a part.

"Now, upon these grounds, let us consider what must be the extent and magnitude of only the visible universe." There have been more than three thousand of these nebulae discovered. Suppose, for instance, that the number of stars of the Milky Way be only ten thousand (half the number before stated) and that each of these nebulae, at an average, contains the same number; suppose farther that two of the three thousand nebulae only can be resolved into stars, and that the other thousand are only shining fluid not yet condensed by the fiat of the Almighty into luminous worlds—then the number of these stars or suns comprehended in that portion of the firmament alone within the reach of the telescope, would be twenty thousand millions, that is, twenty millions of times the number which the naked eye can grasp. Now add to this number those which are visible to the naked eye, and to this, the probable millions on millions which the most powerful glasses ever constructed are not able to reach and what an overwhelming idea we have of the extent, magnificence and grandeur of the creation. But great and overwhelming as all this is, yet, we should not forget that these vast assemblages of systems may be no more than one nebulae to the whole creation; or even as a particle of sand to the whole earth, when compared with what lies beyond the range of finite powers to explore, extending inconceivably onward and upward far into the unexplored and boundless regions of space immeasurable, where is still but the hiding place of the Creator's supremacy and might. Beyond the confines of all that will ever be visible to the inhabitants of earth, an infinite region exists, in which it is not unreasonable to believe that the Deity sits enthroned amidst his own glory and all the grandeur of his overflowing benevolence and omnipotence, presiding over systems on systems of worlds far exceeding the magnificence of what the "eye hath seen" or the most brilliant faculties of mind can conceive. We should not forget that it would not be paying either the Almighty, or our own minds, a very great compliment to suppose that the powers of the Creator are "exhausted at the very point where the efforts of human genius and art can no longer afford us assistance in tracing the footsteps of the Almighty through the mysterious regions of infinitude;" nor should we ever harbor the idea that man placed on this diminutive ball, comparatively speaking, and with such finite and limited powers, "will ever be able to grasp the dominion of Him who fills immensity with his presence, and 'whose ways are past finding out.'"

We will continue our survey a little farther, and then come to a close. There is an other species of nebulae called the planetary nebulae, which are said to be round, compact bodies, like planetary disks when viewed through a telescope. What the nature or destination of these bodies may be, it is difficult to conjecture, but the magnitude of some of them is prodigious. One of these nebulae, it is said, situated in the constellation of Andromeda, is so large that according to the computation of Sir J. Herschel, "it would more than fill the whole orbit of Uranus," which is "three thousand six hundred millions of miles in diameter." Such a body would contain more than twenty four quartillions of solid miles, being sixty-eight thousand four hundred millions of times more than the cubical contents of the sun. And we are told that there are hundreds of these nebulae which the most powerful glasses invented can not resolve into stars. It is thought by some that these may justly be considered as species of luminous matter gradually condensing into solid globes. For they are found to all appearance to be undergoing the various stages of condensation. Some have the appearance of obscure homogeneous masses of matter in a kind of chaotic state—others of a gradual condensation and superior intensity of light about the central part—and others still, so condensed and brilliant at the center as to present the appearance of a star surrounded with a faint nebulosity. One of the largest of this class of nebulae, and which is almost visible to the naked eye, is found in the sword of the constellation Orion.—This extraordinary object, which has never been resolved into stars, is computed to be, two millions, two hundred thousand billions of times larger than the sun. What an immense computation is here! It would require more than 300,000,000 (three hundred millions) of years for light, which flies at the rate of twelve millions of miles every minute, to pass from one side of this nebulae to the other.—This may serve to give us some idea which should be attached to the peculiar expression found in the book of Job and the prophecy of Amos, where the Almighty is represented as "making the seven stars of Orion." It is by no means inconsistent with any thing we know of the perfections of the Creator, to suppose that these immense masses of matter, according to certain fixed and immutable laws, are gradually progressing, under the superintendence of the great Jehovah, towards the formation of new systems for filling up the voids of space, for displaying his boundless wisdom and perfections to beings which may hereafter be brought into existence—and that this condensation of matter from dark chaos up through the various stages to solid systems, may continue to progress forward for replenishing the infinite fields of space, through-out the successive revolutions of eternity.

Such are a few rude ideas respecting the universe. "In the present state of the moral world, when every thing appears to be converging towards some grand consummation, it appears that God in the course of his providence, beginning to unveil the glories of his nature, and the grandeur of his empire, by the discoveries which he has led the human mind to achieve; and future generations may acquire still more ample views of his infinite attributes, and the unbounded splendor and 'glory of his kingdom.'" But all the grand and overwhelming objects to which you have been adverted, numerous, magnificent, inconceivable as they are in extent, and overpowering as they are, are by no means the great universe. They are, at best, but a few detached portions of it, and perhaps bear no more comparison to its whole extent, than does a single twinkling star in the midnight sky, to the whole myriads of stars that may be grasped in the whole range of telescopic view. It can not be expected that the universe in all its extent, as it really exists—in all its grandeur and magnificence as it does appear to the higher orders of intelligences, will ever come within the reach of finite man, so that he will ever be able to form an adequate conception of—a conception which would reflect due honor upon—its Maker. Nay, it is not at all improbable to suppose that even of the highest order of created beings, there is not one acquainted with the whole region of universal nature, and the objects its contains; and that none are acquainted with but a little portion of creation, its scenery, movements and various inhabitants, while the rest is known only to Him who formed it—fills it with his presence—and rules it with the uncontrollable energies of his physical, moral and spiritual omnipotence, if I may thus express myself.

There might much more be said in reference to the universe—the motions of these suns revolving around suns, and systems around systems—motions, too, which in every instance are several thousand miles every minute, but I have extended these articles to considerable length already, and in my next I will make such reflections as I think the nature of the subject suggests.

PROFANITY....NO. III.

BY REV. S. J. GIBSON.

The class of people who indulge in the use of profane language which we shall mention at this time, is composed of those who consider the habit an evidence of true gentility. Surprising as it may seem to some, yet it is nevertheless true, that many use profane words, because they consider such a proceeding a characteristic of the gentleman! An oath to them, gives a kind of sounding turn to a period, and conveys to the minds of others, an idea that the speakers are men of consequence. And to a certain extent this may be true; for the practice may induce people with minds like their own, to believe them in possession of high standing; but to the man of good sound sense, it comes with a far different import.

Let a young man set out in the world with a determination to swear himself into consequence, and he will find at last that he has failed—if not from a lack of stock, it will be for the want of the right kind, which must render his situation still worse. He may indeed satisfy people that he is an adept in his art, but they will look upon him as being deficient in other and more essential qualities. They will look upon him as the subject of a delusive idea, which even he might behold, were he to reflect soberly awhile.

There is within the mind of such a one, a strong desire to be considered a gentleman—a man of importance—and that others should regard him in this light, he stands out and violates the commandments of his Maker—takes the name of the Deity in vain, and then rests from his labors and persuades himself, that he has ascended somewhat in the estimation of the public! But do others award him the praise which he vainly supposes himself entitled to? No! The very means which he employs, defeats that purpose which he would wish accomplished. The candid part of the community will regard him as one wanting in perception, and one that might accomplish more, even with his present abilities, were he to abandon the habit, and speak alone the words of sobriety.

There may be, however, nothing very vicious in the intention of the individual who acts upon such motives; or at least not so much so, as there is in that of him who uses profane language to satisfy his desire for revenge, but still he will receive an adequate reward for the pains which he has taken, and that reward will be his losing, to no small extent, the good opinion of the candid and virtuous, which he otherwise might possess. For let that man who would be considered a gentleman, and who would secure the good opinion of others, set out with a determination to use no language but that of candor and sincerity, and he may rest assured that mankind are not so far lost to the beauties of virtue, that they will neglect to bestow upon him the honor of being in this respect, a gentleman!

Such being the opinion which we think every one must form, during his reflective moments, the reader will permit us (if he is one who practices this habit, because he considers it an evidence of gentility) to urge him as a friend to abandon it, for he may be fully certified that if he does not, it will be long ere he will rise in the estimation of the public, like the man who is a stranger to profanity.

LETTERS OF THE NEW-ENGLAND SPY.....NO. III.

—, Feb., 18, 1843.

MY DEAR F.—In my last letter I stated that humanity in its progress needed something more—that the world was yearning for something better. And by the world in this connection, I mean the best hearts in it. In my second epistle I spoke more directly to the question propounded by you relative to the Roxbury Community. And in that letter it was intimated where, in a social point of view, and in the opinion of your humble correspondent, we are to look for this something for which the purest hearts are longing, and after which the loftiest souls are yearning. To the suggestions there thrown out, a hundred objections perhaps would arise in the mind at once, every one of which would seem at first thought to condemn it as impracticable. At least such was the case with me when I first began to read upon this subject. And a large number whom I have conversed with on the subject, I have found labored under the same misapprehensions with myself, until they became acquainted with the real doctrines of Association as advocated by the friends of Attractive Industry at the present day. Owenism, Fanny Wrightism, and all the other isms founded on the entire depravity or eventual nothingness of human nature, have immediately risen up in the mind and condemned it. And then again, the Quaker communities, with all their eccentricities and alleged want of success, have been urged as evidence palpable and strong that the thing, if not entirely visionary, is at least entirely impracticable. And then again, all other communities, whether of ancient or modern times, (except it be that of the primitive Christians;) and indeed every thing that has borne the name of community, whether honorably or other wise, has been adverted to as evidence of failure, should an attempt be made to establish its practicability.

Now I do not pretend to be well versed in all of the doctrines of Fourier and his followers, or the doctrines of Association as at present advocated; yet I have examined into them far enough to satisfy my mind, sceptical as it was on this subject, that Fourierism and Owenism are as far apart as the East is from the West, or as two doctrines can well be; and that the doctrines of communities of this age or any other, (always excepting the one above named,) are far, very far from being identical with the common doctrines of Association as I understand them. For instance, Owenism was founded upon nothing, and ended in the destiny it held out to man, in absolute nothingness. It made man a brute, and his destiny dust and ashes. Whereas, Association is based upon the innate divinity of human nature, and its infinite and endless progress in the career of goodness and knowledge. It makes man of noble origin, his soul of immense value, and his destiny a godlike one. Thus far of Owenism.

And communities in any sense, differ very materially in their details from Association as I understand it. Hence their failure is no evidence of the impracticability of the doctrines of Association.

But I must not dwell in detail. Suffice it to say, that I believe there are no real and substantial objections against the system here adverted to. If there are I should be pleased to be made acquainted with them. For one, I have exalted views of man's ultimate destiny, both as a social and religious being. And as the destiny of man determines his duty, I can not but think that the duty of man is a high and holy one. I have undoubted faith in human nature; and as certain as human nature is any thing,—as certain as it can be trusted, and as certain as it can not be redeemed without trusting in it and having faith in it, in short, as certain as man's origin is a noble one and his destiny a high and holy one, so certain is it to me, that the fundamental doctrines of Association are in the highest sense practicable and true. The great error of the ages past has been, their low views of human nature. Mankind have had no faith in human nature; they have not trusted it; they have based their views and their actions to a great extent upon the entire depravity of human nature; they have not sought to wake up its latent energies; they have not appealed to the divinity within; they have not sought to touch its silken chords; and not only religious systems but social systems have been based, and are now based upon this absolute depravity and entire worthlessness of poor, despised and down-trodden human nature.

Hence our systems of soulless competition and heartless antagonism. Hence, too, the maxim that seems to govern trade at the present day; to-wit: You have cheated me, and I will cheat you; or you will cheat me if you can, and I will cheat you if I can. Now what we want, and must have to hold the world together, is ATTRACTION. Every thing should be made attractive. Religion should be made attractive; and industry must be made attractive. God has been feared long enough, it is time he were now loved. And mankind have labored for fear of starving and freezing to death, quite too long. It is time labor were dignified and made attractive. It is time men worked because they love to, and because labor is honorable, and because God made them to labor a reasonable portion of the time. In a word, it is time people come out from all this antagonism and repulsion that now make up our social system, and associate themselves together for mutual protection and benefit, and establish of themselves a social system that shall have at least some attractive features about it. Do not, then, my dear F—, entertain for a moment the thought that men can not associate themselves together for social purposes as well as religious.—Rather let us look upon the doctrine of Association somewhat as we do upon a church well united and connected together in love, for mutual benefit and religious profit; and rather than believe in this impracticability, let us look forward to the time when Associations for social purposes shall be as plenty as the churches are now among the hills and valleys of their own much loved New England!

Thine truly,

THE SPY.

P. S.—In my next I will endeavor to show you what a jewel consistency is. I shall pursue the same general subject; but shall perhaps speak no more of Association as a distinct system, unless at your request. If you have any inquiries to make, I will endeavor to answer as well as my information will permit. I have a great many things to say to you yet. This world is a large one, and there are a great many "spots" on our philanthropy as well as our "feasts of charity." So adieu till we meet again.

THE SPY.

CONFERENCE AT EAST CAMBRIDGE.

Conference holden in the Methodist Meeting-House; profitable meeting; Rev. S. W. Wilson (Methodist clergyman) present; his excellent spirit; Orthodox and Methodist church members addressed the meeting; Rev. Mr. Lambert (Unitarian) addressed the meeting; the spirit of his remarks.

On Tuesday of last week, a joy-inspiring and profitable Conference meeting was holden at East Cambridge in the forenoon, afternoon and evening. Believing from the beginning that the Universalist Chapel in that place would not be large enough to contain the people, the brethren made application for the use of the Methodist meeting house, which was at once cheerfully granted. For this act of Christian kindness and liberality, the Methodists of that village are worthy of our gratitude; and we trust their example will be followed by many others, and especially by Universalists, whenever their houses are asked for by the members of other denominations.

When we entered the house in the morning, Br. Brooks, the resident pastor, was opening the meeting with an address. (Some brother had previously prayed.) Br. Brooks welcomed the congregation to that place. They had been induced to obtain this house, because they knew the Universalist Chapel would not contain the people. The Methodists, moved by Christian love, had granted their request. And now he wished to say that he welcomed them to that house. He wished them to feel at home in that place. He had been there before; he had worshipped God at that shrine; it was a place of prayer and praise; and he prayed that the same spirit which had blessed them aforesaid might bless them now. He desired that this might not be a meeting of controversy. We did not come for such a purpose. Christians of different denominations were present, he said; let every thing be done in charity. Let there be nothing that could wound the feelings of any believer in Christ. At the close of his remarks, we sung a few verses of the hymn on "loving kindness," (Conference Hymns, p. 50,) and the sentiment of this hymn seemed to give a character to the whole service.—A layman from Boston offered a few remarks on the same subject, and then came another verse of the hymn. Br. Whittemore, of Cambridgeport, hoped the whole spirit of the meeting would be "loving kindness." He referred to the remarks of Br. Brooks; he also hoped nothing would be said or done, that would give just cause of offence to any believer in Christ. He spoke of our late Br. Fuller, of Philadelphia, and of his happy death.—The last words he pronounced in this world, were a verse of the very hymn we had been singing:

"Soon shall I pass the gloomy vale,
Soon all my mortal powers must fail;
O! may my last expiring breath
His loving kindness sing in death."

Another verse of this hymn was sung, and then Br. Manning (layman,) made an address. (Singing.) After him Father Ballou spoke. He carried out this principle of loving kindness, and dwelt richly on that theme. He was in favor of permitting loving kindness to do its full work in the soul, in spite of all creeds and prejudices. (Singing.) Br. Partridge, of Watertown, addressed us. (Singing.) Br. Adams, of Malden, invited our attention to the same great subject of "loving kindness." This love, in our hearts, was the truest sign that we had been born of God. He related a conversation he had with a Methodist brother on this point. The Methodist wished to know his views of the new birth. "Well," said he, "that I may not be suspected of being governed by the wisdom of this world, I will give you the answer in the very words of God's book:—'Every one that loveth is born of God and knoweth God. He that loveth not, knoweth not God, for God is love.' Those, (said Br. A. to his friend) are my views of the new birth." "Amen," said the Methodist, "I am with you." How then could we refrain from singing a few verses of that excellent hymn, by Rev. S. Lovell, entitled "God is love," on the 57th page of Conference Hymns?

But we are appropriating too much room to this forenoon meeting. Br. Willis, of Cambridgeport, addressed us. (Singing.) And then a prayer; (singing;) then an address from Br. Strickland; (singing;) then an address from Br. L. R. Paige; (singing;) then Br. B. Whittemore addressed us; (singing;) then Br. Rust (layman) again; and then Br. W. Hastings (layman.) So passed the forenoon. The meeting was truly good and profitable.

But if the forenoon meeting was good, what shall we say of the services of the afternoon? On entering the house (a few minutes after service commenced) we found Br. Chapin leading in fervent prayer. We were happy to see Br. Wilson (the Methodist preacher) in the chancel, with several of our clergy. Br. Brooks made the opening address, repeating in part the remarks made by him in the morning. (Singing.) Father Ballou followed, and expatiated upon the words of Jesus, "If any man thirst, let him come to me and drink." If any man thirst, no matter who he may be, let him come to Jesus. Let him not go to any other source; let him not go to any human means; but come to Jesus. He showed what it was to come to Jesus; and he showed what is the water of life. (Singing.) He was followed by Br. Chapin, on the proper way of living in Christ—and the spiritual nature of his religion. (Singing.) A layman then spoke; (singing;) and then Br. Streeter, of Boston, on the power we have to fix our attention on divine things, and also on the socializing tendency of meetings of this kind. He spoke too of the purifying and sanctifying influence of such meetings. (Singing.) Here Br. Wilson of the Methodist denomination arose. He was in feeble health; (on the previous Sabbath, as we had been told, it was with difficulty he got through the services.) There was languishing in his looks. He desired to add his testimony to what had been said of the great importance of religion. He had been brought to acknowledge all men as Christians who showed the spirit of the Master. Formerly he had some doubts on this point. There were certain signs or Shibboleths once, which if not pronounced just to suit his ear, were regarded as radical defects. But his mind was now different. Wherever he saw the spirit of Christ he must own it. He expected to meet the good of all denominations in heaven. So all Christians said; but some were not willing to meet the good of all denominations on earth. For his part, he wanted to try and see if he could not find out what heaven is, while here on earth. Just try it a little; let us have the communion of saints here. He wanted a taste of it, before he went over Jordan. What harm can it do to have heaven below—a heaven to go to heaven in? Let us then all strive for the spirit of our Master; and think less of the Shibboleths, and more of the image of Christ. These ties of Christian love were very strong; they were the strongest of all ties. He hoped love would continue to grow, and banish wrath and strife; and then we should have even here on the earth, a prelibation of eternal joys. (Singing.) The sentiments of Br. Wilson were responded to in a very affectionate manner by Father Ballou and Br. Chapin. (Singing.) Here a Methodist lay brother made a very appropriate, discreet and fervent prayer. Br. Willis, of Cambridgeport, addressed us; and after him a gentleman, standing in the aisle, commenced to speak. He had accidentally heard of this meeting and come in. After some general and excellent remarks, on the subject of religion, he said some would be surprised to learn that he was a member of an Orthodox Congregational Church in Boston. He did not know of this meeting in the morning, but he heard of it at noon. He was glad he had come; he had never attended exactly such a meeting before. He bore his testimony fully, that the spirit of Christ was there. "Why (said he) how little my Orthodox brethren know of Universalism. If this is Universalism, let it spread; I say Amen to it. You have here the spirit we all ought to have; and the spirit which is to convert the world," etc. etc. This address produced a great effect. (Singing.) Br. Whittemore, of Cambridgeport, addressed the audience; (singing;) and after him Br. Otis A. Skinner, on the tests of Christian discipleship—how a man shall know he is a Christian, and how the world shall know he is a Christian. The test is LOVE; and he spoke at large on the power and tendency of love. (Singing.)

Here an aged Methodist brother arose in the gallery, and addressed us with good effect. He spoke first of the excellence of religion; and he was glad to see so much of it here. He did not see why it wasn't a happy meeting, bless the Lord. He was happy; he knew the spirit of Christ was here. So far the meeting would do good. This spirit was fast converting men, bless the Lord. And now, said he, let us go on trying to convert men to holiness; and let every Christian do his duty, and the time will come, soon, bless the Lord, when we shall not say one to another, know the Lord, for all shall know him from the least to the greatest. (Singing.) Br. Randolph, from Alstead, N. H. was present, and made some very forcible and profitable remarks. Several of the speakers mentioned the fear, some had expressed, that these meetings might result in extravagance. But it was allowed, there was no danger now; there had been, however, danger from indifference. We know we have been too indifferent; but we do not know that there is any danger to apprehend from our present course. We know that certain good results follow these meetings. We were particularly pleased with the remarks of Mrs. L. Willis, W. B. Randolph, and W. Hastings (layman,) on this point. On the layman being called upon, a very impressive address was made by Br. J. Howlett, of Cambridgeport. Br. Johnson, of Lynn, and others, also addressed us in profitable exhortation. The meeting was closed by a fervent prayer from Br. Wilson, the Methodist pastor, and by singing Lenox, "Let earth and heaven agree."

The house had been well filled through the day; but in the evening it was crowded full, aisles, singing gallery and every part. We commenced with the excellent hymn from the Methodist Hymn Book, by Charles Wesley—

"I want a principle within,
Of jealous, godly fear," etc.

Br. Henry Jewell prayed, and Br. Brooks made the opening address; (singing;) and after him Br. Whittemore, of Cambridgeport, spoke at length; (singing;) then Br. Eaton (layman,) of East Cambridge, gave us profitable admonition. (Singing.) After him we were addressed again by the Orthodox church-member who had spoken in the afternoon, and who had brought with him this evening a brother of similar faith. They spoke of M. H. Smith's book, which they had read, but never could believe; and now they knew it was false.—They had regarded Universalists as robbers and pirates; their prejudices had been very strong, but they repented of their evil sayings and doings, and wished us God speed in all that is good. (Singing.) The Methodist brother spoke who addressed us in the afternoon from the gallery. He said Universalists had by some been regarded as robbers; we are all robbers. We have robbed God—we have robbed him of his glory, of the obedience which is his due; and he spoke with feeling on this subject. We have not room for a sketch. (Singing.) Br. Sherman, who has been a Christian Baptist clergyman, addressed us. (Singing.) Br. Lemuel Willis addressed us again, (singing,) and then a stranger spoke well. He said he had "looked round the verdant earth, for unfading joy," but had never found it, till he found the Gospel. Br. Locke, (layman of East Boston,) spoke of the great importance of religion. He quoted several verses of the hymn, "Religion is the chief concern;" and illustrated its excellence by a striking anecdote.—Br. W. B. Randolph spoke again; and after him Br. Smith, a member of the Fifth Universalist Church in this city; and after him our Rev. friend and brother, Mr. Lambert, pastor of the Unitarian Church and Society at East Cambridge. He made a proper distinction between faith in mere theology, and true Christian feeling. To be religious there must be feeling. He was happy to be present, and to show his sympathy in the object of the assembly. He spoke in a kind spirit; and his remarks were received with devout attention. At the close he led the meeting in prayer; and asked the divine blessing on all the exercises.

It was announced, at the close, that the next Social Conference Meeting will be holden at the Second Universalist meeting house in Boston, on Tuesday the 4th of April.—Trumpet.

☞ We wish our friends at the West, especially in Ohio, would not send us Michigan money, as the best of it, (viz., "Bank of St. Clair" and "Farmers and Mechanics" of Detroit) is 10 per cent discount, and notes on all other Banks are good for nothing here, as nobody will take them at any price. Some of them send us small Pennsylvania notes, which are from 12 1-2 to 20 per cent discount. Those who send us such money, when they can send better, will be charged with the discount. Good Ohio notes we can get rid of at a loss of 5 per cent. Send Ohio then, when you can not obtain New York or New England money in place of Michigan or Pennsylvania.

THE MOST CELEBRATED HISTORICAL WORK EVER PUBLISHED.

Now in press, and will be published in ten consecutive double extra numbers of the New World, at twenty-five cents a number, or two dollars for the complete work.—SIR JOHN FROISSART'S Chronicles of England, France, Spain, and the adjoining countries, the most rare, valuable, interesting and celebrated work ever published in the world—elegantly printed on extra superfine white paper, and splendidly illustrated with over one hundred and twenty engravings, representing the scenes, costumes, sieges, battles, naval engagements and tournaments of the middle ages, engraved at a cost of one thousand dollars. The works of SIR JOHN FROISSART have been celebrated by poets, historians and novelists, for more than four centuries. For many years after their first publication they were circulated only through the medium of manuscripts, and they were deemed presents worthy of kings and princes.

The language in this edition will be found perfectly modernized, and therefore easily understood by all readers. In quaintness and simplicity of style, it is almost scriptural.—The interest of the story increases greatly as you read; it is the very romance of history.

The Chronicles extend from 1326 to 1400. They comprehend every considerable affair, which happened during that period in France, England, Scotland, Ireland and Flanders. They include also a vast number of particulars relative to the affairs of Rome and Avignon; of Spain, Germany, Italy; even of Russia, Hungary, Turkey, Africa—in short, of almost the whole known world.

The first number, consisting of 64 pages and numerous engravings will be issued in the month of May, after which nine more numbers, similar in size and embellishment, will appear at intervals of a fortnight. The cost of the ten numbers, if taken as they are issued, will be $2.50, but if paid for in advance, $2. Readers both in city and country will do well to pay for the work in advance, and receive the numbers as they successively appear. They can be forwarded to any part of the United States at a cost only of newspaper postage. The "Chronicles" will be printed on the finest and most expensive book-paper, far superior to that used by American book publishers in general. All orders must enclose cash, post paid, and be addressed to

SONNET—TO THE SABBATH.

BY REV. J. S. KIRKE.

Blessed Sabbath day—thrice welcome thou again
To this glad heart! With thy first moments rich begin To shed thy holy calm down deep my soul within—
Let no delusion dark as false, and vain,
Intrude upon thy sacred time of rest.
But let my soul at Heaven's high behest
Lift up itself in humble prayer to meet its God,
And crave of Him a blessing—and a light
To beam upon the path where holy feet have trod,
Which leads to realms all fair, and ever bright.
Then round my life up to its latest breath,
Shall circle there a Spirit all divine,
Imparting peace and joy—and yet in death,
Shall seek my whole existence to refine.

A GOOD NAME.....NO. III.

"A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches, and loving favor rather than silver and gold." SOLOMON.

A good name is necessary to personal influence. It is the conviction that a man is upright, true and honest—that he is what he professes and appears to be, that induces us to repose confidence in him; without which no man can gain upon us, even for an hour. Talent may have its weight, by itself considered; and personal beauty its charms; but neither of them when associated with a false heart, when desecrated by a lying tongue, when darkened and disfigured and rendered "hugely ugly" by vice; can excite our sympathies, warm our souls into friendship, or command our esteem. On the contrary, indeed, we rather dread talents when under the dominion of vice; we fear the exercise of that power when it may be brought to bear against our interests and our happiness.

"Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
That to be hated needs but to be seen."

Mark that business man yonder; with bright prospects he begins; flattering hopes glitter, rainbow like, on the front of his future heaven—a reputed good name, "by vice not touch'd nor falsehood dimmed," gains for him the confidence of the community, and secures a generous and increasing patronage. Friendships are contracted and associations formed, which, like the cords of being, bind him to society. But anon—in an unexpected, unthought-of hour—truth, which "confined however strong will burst the bars," breaks its way through the smothering folds, and the man proves to have been a wretch, a vile-hearted hypocrite, whose seeming honesty was a stolen garb, and whose professions a false light which, like the ignis fatuus, flickered but to deceive. From some distant corner of the land, the place of his nativity or his late home, the ever tell-tale winds bring the sad history of vile deeds and dark crimes. How suddenly, and what a change comes over the spirit of that poor man's dreams! Friends vanish from his presence like morning mist from the presence of the sun. Support disappears almost in a night; and shunned and hated, he is left alone like the prisoner in his dark and iron-grated cell, to struggle with infamy. This is no tale of fiction—the man yet lives, and is vainly and madly endeavoring to drown his woe in the intoxicating bowl. Nor is his a solitary case—the names of thousands are festering in corruption, and will die only when they shall be lost amid the rubbish of the past. I am not here saying whether the course generally pursued by society in such cases, is right; but so it is—as soon as a man is suspected of dishonesty or crime, that part of the world whose good opinion he most desires, begin to shun him, to look coldly, freezingly upon him.

It is vice, after all, that men chiefly dread; and hence though they may be vicious themselves, they demand virtue in others. Nor can outward circumstances entirely change our estimate of character. It is said, I know, that we tolerate, nay even respect vices and follies in rich men which we loudly and unmercifully condemn when met with in the vale of poverty. It were nearer the truth to say that, though we love the wealth of the rich man, yet we despise, we hate his vices—though we pity the poor man's poverty, yet we love his virtues and covet his good name.

As then you would secure social influence, that which involves your temporal welfare and peace of mind, look well to the virtue of your ways and the sacred uprightness of your life; for "a good name is rather to be chosen than great riches, and loving favor rather than silver and gold."

Again:—reputation, the good opinion of mankind, social esteem is necessary to the perfection of human happiness. And there is nothing save religion which can be substituted in its stead; but religion is implied in the possession of a good name.—Wealth which is generally thought to come the nearest of anything, will not meet the great and urgent wants of the human heart. We may possess wealth; in massive heaps of golden glitter, or in broad stretching lands, we may behold our earthly treasures; but they meet only a part of the wants of this ever wanting being. They possess in themselves no attribute of intellectual or moral character—they have no sympathy with mind or affection. True, and far be it from me to detract from their positive value, they may feed and clothe the body, and as a means may serve us in a thousand ways—still there is a region beyond them, and elevation above them which they can not reach. And dead must be that soul to all the nobler and loftier aspirations of mind, that can wrap itself in a garment of gold, though sparkling with jewels, and sit down in the dusky gloom of solitude, where bloom no fragrant flowers of affection—where flow no living, refreshing streams of heart-inspiring, social joy—where no bright, hope-kindling star lights up with its mellow beams, the vast and lonely firmament of the mind. Envy not that man the refinement and elevated purity of his pleasures. No; the truth is, the soul pants after the sweet, almost angelic music of social good will. The voice of friendship has a music in it which "the gingle of yellow metal" can never reach, and touches a cord deep in the heart, thrilling the soul with emotions of indefinable pleasure. And hence we would have every eye that meets us, look kindly on us, and every face beam with affectionate regard. To be friendless, is to be miserable. To be alone, ah, who that hath felt its power; that, though in the midst of infinite systems of beauty and grandeur, there is no kindred spirit near that feels for his woe, does not shrink back from the thought as from the gulf of annihilation, exclaiming in the wild accents of an anguished spirit, Oh God! whatever else must go, leave me my friends! As then you love your happiness, live worthy the esteem and affectionate regard of mankind—so live as to secure and preserve a true good name; for it "is rather to be chosen than great riches, and loving favor rather than silver and gold."

PRAYER.

BY MRS. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

Is there one in all Christendom, that has ever heard of and believed in the existence of the "One, ever living and true God," who has not at some time, asked through the medium of prayer, for His guidance, protection, or benediction? It may be true that there are many who have never been seen bowing at the public or private altar, or been heard lifting their voices in petition to "our Father in Heaven"—and it may indeed be true, that there are many who have never bowed the knee to him in any place, yet we dare hazard the opinion, that there "is not one, however vile, who has not at some time in his life, sent forth from the deepest and silent recesses of his heart, the sincere and devout whisperings of prayer.

Indeed, an inclination to pray seems to be a part of man's nature, and though prosperity, a course of transgression, or some other external cause, may for a time check its yearning aspirations, yet when trials, difficulties, and perplexities, from which the puny arm of flesh can not redeem them, are placed on every hand, they will turn and ask aid from Him who is mighty to save. And there are none we believe, who have experienced the kindly influence which such a heartfelt devotion ever exerts—none who have ever known the childlike confidence which an earnest and sincere prayer ever inspires, will ask a labored argument to prove that it is an indulgence conducive to happiness and purity.

But it is not my intention to pen, at this time, a long dissertation on the use and object of prayer, but to notice in particular one passage in that perfect example—the Lord's prayer, namely, "forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors;" or, in other words, forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us. This seems to be nothing more than a different mode of expressing that one great principle which our Saviour inculcated throughout his whole doctrine—the forgiving of our enemies, and dealing by others as we wish to be dealt by.

But when we take this petition upon our lips—when we ask our Father in heaven, to deal by us as we deal with those by whom we are surrounded, do we ask it in all sincerity and earnestness? Let us examine ourselves and see. Have we at all times been kind and affectionate to our friends, ever willing to participate in their toils, and sympathize with them in afflictions—have we done all in our power to assist the needy, relieve the necessities of the poor, and to alleviate the pains of the sick—have we fed the hungry stranger, visited the widow and orphan in their affliction, and endeavored to pour the oil of consolation into their bereaved and sorrowing hearts—in short, have we done by our fellow men, all that the Gospel of Jesus requires of us? Happy mortals are those who can conscientiously answer these questions in the affirmative; and thrice happy are those who in faith and sincerity can say, "deal with us, O our Father, as we deal with those by whom we are surrounded!"

There are those, however, who by their conduct, have shown themselves to be our enemies—those who have trespassed on our rights, and on many occasions sought to do us harm, and those towards whom it may be hard for us to quell the angry feelings of resentment. But let us reflect a moment—have not we, too, gone many times contrary to the just requirements and holy commandments of God—have we not trespassed "many times and oft," by stepping aside into forbidden paths? Yes, we have all sinned and gone out of the way; and can we ask for kindness, when we are so unwilling to bestow it upon those who have sinned against us? Let us then keep this sentiment forever within our minds—let us strive to practice in its light, that when we ask for forgiveness of our many trespasses and manifold transgressions, we may in all sincerity and fervency pray, "Our Father," to forgive them "as we forgive those who trespass against us."

VIRTUE.

While reading a secular paper a few days since, we came across the following; "Virtue is a rare plant; it seldom blooms in the garden of civilization, and whenever found, it is as soon as possible destroyed." We know not the author of the above sentiment, nor have we any right to tell his character; but if we might be allowed the remark, should say that one giving utterance to such a sentiment must be either the cold misanthropist, who is wrapped in the narrow sheet of selfishness and destitute of all the pure feelings so bountifully lavished by kind nature, or just debased enough to cruelly trample down the few tender twigs of virtue that lie along his pathway.

He must have known only the vicious of our race; never have seen the outgushing of a full heart in sympathy for others' woe; or the gentle hand extended to relieve the distressed: must never have experienced the joys arising from the possession of true and valued friends, or heard the simple but earnest "God bless you" of the tearful eye and grateful heart pronounced upon himself; and if such is his character, if he has lived regardless of all the beauties of earth and sky, or without ever devoting a moment to the worship of his Maker, he might well say there is no virtue in our land. We well know there are many, very many who assume the garb of virtue, and under its fair, alluring guise will practice the vilest of deeds; and those who judge on a superficial view of things might conclude that all wearing a similar garb belonged to the same family, and we have to regret that too many affect the virtuous not for its own sake, but as a passport to what they would call "good society." May we not hope that such will learn to love it for its own sake, and that those who think it "a rare plant" will cherish it with untiring solicitude—will transplant it from soil to soil, and from clime to clime, until it shall not only bloom in the "garden of civilization," but where ever there is a hand to act, a voice to speak, or a heart to feel.

But no virtue say you? Hast thou seen that young man, God-like in form, with rosy health upon his cheek, eyes that reflect the pure soul and noble intellect, with a countenance in all its forms bespeaking energy and activity, and an arm which would bid defiance to every approach of foes, leave the rougher duties of life to attend at the bed-side of a sick and dying mother? See how gently he smooths the fevered pillow, administers the soothing cordial, or holds the aching head? So well is it done, that even the most experienced nurse could not do it better, and certainly could not so effectually; and when the last word is spoken, when the big tear rolls down his manly cheek at the final adieu, and as the cold clods fall over her last remains, he feels to still love her, to remember her counsels and instructions, and that all earth's treasures or alluring guise will never be sufficient to efface her memory, there is no virtue there? If there is no virtue, there is religion there—religion, such as angels might embrace and the God of heaven sanction.

But the very virtues of that mother are to be the young man's guide o'er the rugged path of life; and whenever any of the thousand vices attempt to entice his inexperienced feet, her voice like a guardian angel, silent though powerful with kindness and entreaty, speaks to him, "do not thus, my son." Who can tell how many have been turned from the debasing scenes of vice, and induced to learn wisdom's ways, and to walk therein by the recollection of the virtuous dead!

Poor fellow, who ever thou art, go warm thy cold heart with the feelings of philanthropy, drink a little of the milk of human kindness, pour the oil of consolation o'er a wounded spirit, and assist with a cheerful hand thy needy, suffering fellow mortals; then shalt thou no longer have occasion to utter a sentiment like the above; then shalt thou find that the few "rare plants" of virtue which "bloom in the garden of civilization," are to be transplanted from this uncongenial soil to a fairer clime, to where flowers never fade or fruit never withers."

SALVATION FROM SIN....NO. II.

BY O. WILCOX.

"Thou shalt call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins."

It has been shown that Jesus' people were sinners, and that his work was to save them and make Christians of them. It has been also shown that all are his by purchase, and that when the text is fulfilled they will all be his by practice. But I wish to take a different course with this subject, in order to reach the different capacities of all before whom this may come.

It will be admitted that God had a design in sending his Son into the world. To deny this, would be to charge God with folly, and destroy the foundation of all gratitude to God for the gift of his Son. For if he did not design it for our good, then if it accidentally terminates in good, we can not feel grateful to God for the result, but must attribute it to our good luck, independent of the design of God, or to our wisdom in turning it to our advantage. And in either case, we should have no reason to be grateful to God for the good result of what he never designed should take place. But it will be admitted that God did design good in sending his Son into the world and that his design was to save man, as the text says, from sin. It will also be admitted that he designed to save all from the same evil, or only a part. If he designed to save a part only, when he could as well save the whole, then he was limited in this good design, and richly deserves the name of a partial God. And his partiality is only feebly represented by a father that had a family of children all in the same state of poverty and starvation, while he has in store an abundant supply for all, but he selects a few, and feeds and pampers them; but leaves the rest to perish while he, rather than bestow the remainder of his provisions upon them, suffers it to lie in his storehouse till it becomes mouldy, and then throws it away. My God! what folly will people swallow if it comes from a man in black, standing, (shall I say?) where he ought not! Do not our spiritual guides tell us, that the store house of God's mercy and goodness is abundantly sufficient for all his children who are famishing for that bread which alone can give life to their souls? And will they still say, that he never designed that the whole should be benefited by this grace which they so much need? But what will they do with the remainder? will these elect ones devour the whole, or will it be entirely lost? But perhaps it will be denied that God's grace and goodness are sufficient for all, by those that would say that he never designed that all should be saved by them. If this is the case, they have as good reason to be offended when we tell them that the last prodigal shall be admitted to the table of their God, as the elder brother of the prodigal would have had, when he was informed that his brother was sitting at his father's table, if he had really believed that there was no more provisions in his father's storehouse than would satisfy his hunger. But by the most of our Christian friends it will be admitted that God designed that Christ should benefit all by his mission, for they will wish to avoid the cruel partiality of the opposite supposition. And they will see that if God did not design to have pity on all by the gift of his Son, then those whom he did not design to benefit, are under no obligations of gratitude to God for this gift to others, which he unfeelingly withheld from them.

But let us examine the doctrine that admits that God designed to save or bless all, by saving them from (not endless misery, but) sin. Did he design to save those that he knew from all eternity he himself should deliver over to the devil, to serve him eternally? This is impossible; for it supposes that God can design to do the opposite of what he knows absolutely he shall do. Hence we must come to the conclusion, that if God designed to save all, he did not know that he should not accomplish it. And if he did not know this, he could not make a revelation of what he himself did not know.—Hence those who admit that God designed to save all, must acknowledge, that if they have found out that he will not, they have found it out independent of the revelation of God, and that they know more upon this subject than God did when he sent his Son with a design to have him save all from sin. Our opposers can choose which of the false and ridiculous systems they please; but I must say that if I was determined to cling to either with the grasp of a drowning man, I would take the one that held forth the barefaced partiality of a partial design, but gave God power and decision enough to have him carry into effect his own will and purpose?

It is too late to say, he came to make it possible for them to save themselves on conditions; for the declaration of the angel is positive, "he shall save them from their sins." And to talk of God's making a thing possible, is a contradiction; for that which was once impossible, can never become possible; hence if it is now possible, it was never impossible with God. But if God designed to save all by delivering them from the last enemy, and fails at last, it must be because he did not sufficiently count the cost when he laid the foundation, to see whether he was able to finish the work on so broad a plan. And his building can not be the one spoken of by Paul in Eph. xi: 21, which is "finely framed together," but this will be lacking in studs, braces, posts, plates and rafters—and the builder will probably be mocked eternally by that subtle serpent who has defeated him, saying, you "began to build, but was not able to finish." But I must close this article by saying, that I believe in and worship a God that will carry into effect and accomplish all his will and pleasure, which is, to "have all men to be saved" by bringing them to the knowledge of that truth which maketh free indeed.

STEBEN ASSOCIATION.

BR. GROSH—Since the appearance of the address to the societies and friends in the bounds of the Steuben Association, published in the Magazine and Advocate, No. 35, Vol. 13, I have seen no notice of any proceedings of this body. Our Conference met at Howard, according to appointment, of which I expect you have been informed. I never witnessed a more interesting season, especially during our consultations in council. Several resolutions were passed, and every movement in devising ways and means, after social, friendly and earnest deliberation, was unanimously agreed to.

Some time previous to the above mentioned meeting, I made up my mind to have the Conference adjourn to the village of Hornellsville. This was a place, by the bye, where preaching of our order had seldom been heard, the people were unacquainted with our doctrine, and also with our manners and customs when assembled at our two-day meetings. There was high probability that something might be done here if we could bring things about so as to get an appointment. Under these circumstances, you know, Br. Grosh, what my first business would be. I was acquainted with several persons in that place, anti-Partialists, but not Universalists. There were some two or three, however, to whom the latter name would apply. The residue of my acquaintance in that place would come under the names of Presbyterians and Methodists, each church owning a meeting house. Of the latter I know some to be of a liberal mind, and as the greatest share of their house was built by Universalists, anti-partialists, and nothing-arians, I presumed it would be no hard matter to secure the use of the house for two days.

The promise of the house was obtained, and other matters standing all in sunlight for the time being, the meeting was appointed at Hornellsville, on the 11th and 12th days of January, 1843.

The time arrived, but to our disappointment the great thaw that occurred at that time, had rendered roads, bridges, etc., in many directions totally impassable; so that the meeting was not attended by friends from a distance as we expected. Information had reached me for two or three weeks previous to the time of meeting, from all quarters, and to the distance of more than 30 miles in some instances, that they were coming by sleigh loads. I informed the few liberal friends of these things, gave them to understand what our visiting friends would expect, urged them to make the necessary preparations, get as many as they could to assist, of their relations and friends, and if they were like to fail, let me know, and I would procure the additional assistance from our society, about 10 miles distant. (That is, to the centre, or place where we usually meet for worship.)

O, Br. Grosh, you can hardly imagine how highly I was gratified in this case. There were provisions for hundreds more than came to the meeting. The providential occurrence was a general disappointment and regret—not regret at the dealings of our heavenly Father, but, that our meeting had not been a week sooner.

It would have been amusing to you, brother, I am sure, had you been there. You would have witnessed something new to you. Did you ever attend a Universalist Conference, where there was no society of our order? In the first place, I did not know of more than two or three, to whom I thought proper to communicate my plan. But when the time so long anticipated arrived, I found many liberal friends. The villagers, of both sexes, exhibited such a friendly and earnest anxiety for somebody to go with them. "I want you to go with me"—"You must go home along with me"—"Mr. U. can not you send somebody to our house; I am really afraid I shall be wholly disappointed after all." These expressions would be heard from a dozen at once. It did not disturb me, but in your place it would probably be called confusion. Well, our friends would not be satisfied until we agreed to appoint another Conference before the annual meeting of the Association. This done, our Conference adjourned. Particulars will be noticed in another place.

But my story is not all told. It appears that some of our ministering brethren heard our cry for help, and came along to see what it all meant. Br. T. C. Eaton preached at the village of Hornellsville, about the middle of December, and left an appointment for Christmas Eve. The Methodist house was illuminated, and what was still better, it was filled to overflowing. Br. Whitney of Rochester, tarried a few days after the Conference meeting, preached in the village—also in adjoining towns, Canisteo, Howard and Dansville. Br. Eaton passed along again in the latter part of January—preached several times in the village and around about, and so the chapter ends.

At the Conference in Howard, where we met to mature measures for supplying destitute places with preaching in the Steuben Association, we received a satisfactory evidence, from many places, of an interest in our cause. But to gain a more full information, we appointed a travelling committee to visit the different parts of the Association, and report thereon at our Conference in Hornellsville, or, as soon thereafter as may be. I have received no report yet. I have heard that Br. Cheney has been preaching in the section assigned to him, but have heard nothing of the result. From Mrs. Roberts and Bullard, the other two members of the committee, I have heard nothing. I hope we shall hear something on the side of prosperity, by the time our next Conference or Association shall meet.

The Dansville society, as usual, small but steadfast. Sixteen members—enjoy occasional, but support no stated preaching.

The Conesus society, received into fellowship last summer, I can give no information of it, pro or con. The remaining societies—those that have been in fellowship with this Association, have not yet re-organized to my knowledge.

Thus, Br. Grosh, I have given you all the information I can, of the standing, prospects, and progress of our cause in the Steuben Association. Hardly worth noticing, you will think, in your list of statistical information.

PUNISHMENT... NO. III.

Whatever the course of discipline through which we may be called to pass—whatever the punishments God may see fit to inflict on his sinful children,—whatever the chastisement or correction they may receive at his hand—we have every assurance that all shall finally eventuate in the accomplishment of the greatest possible good—the salvation of the erring and the lost.—No punishment or pain is to be final—for death is to be swallowed up in victory, and tears are to be wiped from off all faces.

The end as contemplated in all the plans and purposes of God is thus beautifully set forth by an apostle: "Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule, and all authority and power. For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet.....And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto Him that put all things under him, that God may be all."

In this eloquent passage, we have the grand consummation—the final result—the ultimate end, set forth. The object of punishment, and of the mediatorial reign accomplished, and all the means of divine grace proving effectual, we have as the winding up—the triumphant termination, a world of human intelligences subdued unto Christ—he made subject unto the Father—and God all in all! There is no misery here, for its cause is removed—sin is destroyed—death has lost its sting and the grave its victory. Punishment hath ceased, because no longer needed—justice is satisfied with the perfect obedience of every heart—and mercy rejoices that all the lost have been found, and that the last tear of sorrow has been wiped away!

The same closing scene in the great drama of human redemption, was beheld by the Revelator, in his vision on the solitary ocean isle. He saw the whole purchased possession of the Redeemer gathered in one vast assembly; and he heard them all saying, "Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever!" Oh, where will be pain!—where will be tears, when this vision comes to pass. There will be no motherless children, nor childless mothers then! There will be no starving prodigals, nor broken hearted parents then! There will be no minds darkened with ignorance then! There will be no error to fetter down the soul then! There will be no discord nor strife then! But the fulness of Him who filleth all in all shall crown the redeemed family of man, and heaven's high arches will ring with the shouts of joy!

To suppose an end, or consummation of the redeeming plans and purposes of God, like that contemplated in the popular sentiments of the day, is to suppose, that heaven is a place where all sympathy is unknown; or a place of endless woe. That it is not the former, we know from the fact that the angels are represented as rejoicing at the repentance of a sinner. Heaven is a place of sympathy then. The saved will carry with them those feelings of affection which bind them so strongly to their kind; and that love which makes them like Christ and like God, and renders the sight of human misery infinitely painful. Now, suppose endless punishment to be an end contemplated in the Gospel plan—that a part are to be cast off into deep and utter woe, and you suppose that which will produce universal misery, and flood even heaven with tears.

I know we have been told, that the saints in the future world would rejoice over the agonies of the lost; but it can not be so: for being as the angels, they must sympathise with the suffering; and nothing can give them fulness of joy, save the repentance and salvation of every sinner. This we believe will be accomplished. Christ came on earth to save sinners—not from punishment, but from that which brings punishment; and we have every assurance that he will not fail in this work, but will carry it on to completion—swallowing up death in victory, and wiping the tears of sorrow from every weeping eye. The Saviour has mercy—he has love—he has power; and he will hear and answer the cries of the perishing—he will set the mourning captives free—he will bind up the broken hearted—he will make an of sin, and effect the great object of his mission, by effecting the salvation of the world.

"On that bright prospect may we rest,
Till this frail body dies;
And then, on faith's triumphant wings,
To endless glory rise."

UNION CONFERENCES.

A number of our readers have requested us to copy some of the accounts of these meetings to which we have several times alluded. We have not room for them, without crowding out a number of articles furnished by correspondents; and, besides, we doubt whether the descriptions will be as generally satisfactory, as they would be had our readers seen and felt such meetings themselves. All such reports must be unsatisfactory—a mere notice of the subjects spoken and sung; for as in our best Washingtonian meetings, which these Conferences resemble in their manner and measures, there are many speakers and much singing. However, anxious to oblige, and believing that the account itself may do some good, we have selected an account of what we deem the best one held, and give it in this day's paper.

It may be proper to remark that these Conferences were held only one day each—one a week only—and that there was nothing in measures or action to distinguish them from our ordinary Praise meetings, save the numbers congregated, by the union of a number of Universalist societies, and the attendance of many of our Partialist brethren on them, and taking part in their exercises. Their effect, if prudently managed, and not too frequently repeated or prolonged for too long a time, must be salutary not only on our own denomination, but also in removing prejudice and ill-will against us from the minds of our opposers. Indeed, the Washingtonian meetings in this section which have been attended and participated in by our Universalist clergy and laymen, have done a great deal toward removing prejudices against us, and in breaking down a narrow, illiberal and bigoted sectarian spirit generally. I refer thus to our Washingtonian meetings, because they resemble most nearly these Union Conferences of any thing we have in this section.

THE EASTERN ROSE BUD.

This is the title of a Sunday School monthly, published by Br. Colasworthy, in Portland, Me. We notice it now on account of its embellishments—particularly on account of what purport to be likenesses of three of our preachers, which a friend sarcastically suggests should be purchased by Br. Tompkins for the adornment of the next Rose of Sharon, and for after publication in the Ladies' Repository!—the latter, as many of its present readers have never seen them, and the rest would undoubtedly be rejoiced to see them again!

But that our readers may partly understand the grievance of which we complain, I will state that the Rose Bud before us contains an old, but tolerably fair copperplate engraved portrait of Sir Ralph Abercrombie.—What he has ever done for Universalism, or Sunday Schools, or any thing else, to entitle him to such a distinguished station before our Sunday schools, I can not imagine. How eminently distinguished he is above even our preachers, will now appear. Next follows a most vile, temple-shaved, bewiskered, sharp-and-hard-faced, hemlock-wood or brick-bat cut, labelled, "Rev. Walter Balfour, of Charlestown." What! that miserable thing, Br. Balfour? Why, it has not a single lineament of that venerable, warm-hearted-old man's good-humoured countenance; and the circulation of this misrepresentation (it has no resemblance at all, and can not, therefore, be termed a caricature, even) among our children, is an outrage on the feelings of all Br. Balfour's friends, and a libel on himself which should entitle him to far heavier damages than have ever been awarded to Mr. Cooper against those who have called him "the handsome Mr. Effingham." Next is a sandstone cut, labelled "Rev. Hosea Ballou," which has barely resemblance enough to the original, to entitle it to the name of a caricature of that venerated Father in Israel. And lastly follows a tolerably good looking face, though a poor wood cut, labelled, "Rev. H. Ballou 2d, of Medford"—which resembles the excellent "Cousin" no more than it does any other human being of about his size and age. If such are a sample of the portraits intended to be circulated by the Rose Bud, we sincerely hope that its temporary suspension may be continued unto a perpetual sleep.

These remarks may be considered severe. They are intended to be, for I think they are merited. would not have a friend's countenance thus misrepresented, and circulated in society, without condemning the man who did the grievous wrong—especially when (as is the fact in this case) he repeats a wrong previously committed by another, after that other had been rebuked, and compelled publicly to apologize for it. And Br. Colesworthy owes it to his readers, and to the brethren thus misrepresented, to issue a circular, stating that they are not likenesses of those three brethren. If he wants an apology for issuing those cuts, he may use the following anecdote which we once heard in relation to their first appearance, and which is doubtlessly as near the truth, as the cut for Br. Balfour is near being his likeness!

"Three notorious pirates, or felons of nearly equal enormity, were to be executed in one of our eastern cities. A newspaper editor, anxious to gratify the morbid tastes of the public, procured wood cuts of their countenances for his columns. But they were so vilely executed, and were such caricatures of the felons, that he dared not publish them. A Universalist Editor hearing of them, and thinking that what was not good enough to represent three pirates, might, with a little alteration, do to be palmed off as portraits of three of his most able and venerated brethren in the ministry, purchased them, and after altering them with his pen-knife, published them accordingly." These cuts afterward found their way to Portland, (for the people of Massachusetts would not allow them to remain in that State after,) and were used by Br. Colesworthy for the Rose Bud. That will do. A. B. G.

SYRACUSE.

After changing places wherein to hold our meetings, for a number of weeks past; the society in this place have now rented, for one year, the beautiful and spacious Hall, in the fourth story of Larned and Granger's new block. The hall has been enlarged, and beautifully finished off, and seated with comfortable settees. We have succeeded in securing it permanently for half the time, with the privilege of getting it for a greater proportion of the time if needed. Our regular meetings, from henceforth, will be held there on the first and third Sundays in each month, until further notice.

This special notice is rendered the more necessary, because for a number of weeks past, the state of the roads has prevented the attendance of many of the friends from the surrounding country and villages, until, probably, they have lost "the run" of the appointments. If they will lend their countenance and aid to the meetings in Syracuse, by uniting with and supporting the society, undoubtedly a good society can be built up there, and much aid be rendered to the cause in all that region. For by so doing, an acceptable pastor may be settled in that flourishing place, as soon as one can be procured, and a house of worship be built. But without such concentration of numbers, influence and aid, all that region, with its numerous Universalists, must be left destitute of the preached word. We hope these few facts will be borne in mind constantly by all who commenced, and thus far have aided in the good work. The first difficulties—especially the great difficulty of procuring a place in which to hold our meetings—have at last, after a few fluctuations, been overcome. The Hall, though elevated, is a beautiful one, capable of being well ventilated in summer, or warmed in winter—it is easy to speak, sing and hear in, and will seat very comfortably a large audience—say 600 or 700 persons. Let a good choir be organized, a judicious pastor be settled, and a firm resolution be manifested by the friends, and the Hall can easily be filled, not only twice a month, but every Sunday. A. B. Our ministering brethren knowing our wants, will, I am sure, attend our meetings if practicable. Therefore, to them I repeat not the usual formality of invitation and request.—To our lay brethren, I should perhaps use a little more persuasion—especially to those within the limits of this body. Come up, then, brethren—let us hear from all, without reserve. Assist in our deliberations, that we may ascertain whether we shall stand or fall.

Those from a distance, who will attend the Conference, enquire for J. H. Stevens, J. Phelps, J. Goodno, J. Healy, where they will find feed for their horses, and something (not bread alone) for themselves. I am not acquainted at Springwater, therefore can give no directions. But I will venture to say, enquire for friends, and you will find them there. A. UPSON.

MARRIAGES.

In Binghamton, March 22d, by Rev. Wm. M. Delong, Mr. ISAAC WARN, of Fairport, Chemung county, to Miss SOPHIA ADAMS, of the former place.

April 20th, 1843, by Rev. J. S. Flagler, Mr. JEROME SUMNER to Miss CLARISSA BENTLEY, both of Darien, Genesee county.

Also, April 26th, by the same, Mr. SAMUEL TANNER, of Barre, Orleans county, to Miss SARAH MULLET, of Darien.

In Lawrence, by Rev. S. W. Squire, Mr. DANIEL HARRIS to Miss CHRISTIANA LONG.

DEATHS.

In Ellisburgh, Jefferson county, March 19th, of apoplexy, Mr. EPHRAIM POTTER, aged 69 years. By this sudden dispensation, his wife and children have been deprived of a kind husband and father, society of a valuable member, and our denomination of a bright example and ornament. Possessing a mind of more than common vigor, well stored with general knowledge for one who labored constantly as a farmer, and especially well instructed in religious truth and the holy Scriptures, he was able in defending his faith on all occasions, and careful to enforce it by his example. The breath of slander never dared to assail his character.

His departure is felt by a large circle of friends and relatives, who will long deplore the breach it has made in society. Funeral on the 21st, at Mansville, attended by a large concourse. Sermon by Br. O. Willcox.

JACOB SAX.

In Hanover, April 20th, of consumption, Mr. ISAAC VAN CAMP, in the 84th year of his age.

His sickness, though painful, was endured with patience and Christian resignation. Mr. Van Camp was a member of the Congregational church of Forestville, and dearly beloved for the consistency of life. His end was peace.—Mr. Van Camp was a soldier of the Revolution. His sermon was preached from Isa. iii: 10, 11, by the Rev. I. S. Emery, of Forestville.

In Amity, March 2d, LOUISA, companion of Wm. Sanford, in her thirty fifth year. A lady of true benevolence and genuine piety, universally respected and beloved by a large circle of friends and relatives, by whom her death was severely felt. Funeral ceremonies by her request were performed by the Rev. I. B. Sharp, on the 4th.

Also, in Farmersville, March the 2d, Mr. JOSEPH MILLS, aged 77 years. Br. Mills was a firm believer in the final restitution of the whole human family, and had remained so for the long term of 40 years. He was one of the early pioneers of the western wilds, and has always been respected, loved and revered by all who had an acquaintance with him; as was truly shown by the large concourse of people that attended his funeral obsequies. Sermon by I. B. SHARP.

In South Dansville, April 8th. Mrs. LUCINDA ROBINSON, consort of Elisha Robinson, aged 49 years. In the death of sister R. a husband, and large family of children, and numerous other connexions, are left to mourn their loss.

Sister R. was an amiable member of community—much respected by all who knew her. She united with the Universalist society in this place when it was first organized, in 1822—a convert from the Baptist church—and has always maintained the character of a Christian. Strong in the faith of universal salvation, obtained by a diligent search of the Scriptures, she lived devoted to the cause of truth in which she professed to believe. As a society, we deeply mourn the loss of so bright an example of faith and practice. Long will be remembered the virtues of the worthy departed—May our bereaved brother receive the consolations of the spirit of truth to comfort and cheer him during his pilgrimage—and may the relatives enjoy the blessed hope of the Gospel. Funeral on the 10th. Sermon from 1 Cor. xv: 49, by A. UPSON.

THE PANTHER'S LEAP.

A WESTERN SCENE.

"Oh! how the mother loves the child she nursed."

It was a fine morning in August, when little Samuel Eaton was about seven years old, that he was making a dam in the brook that ran before his father's door.—He was an only and beautiful child, his mother almost idolizing him. There he was with his trousers tucked up above his knees, working like a beaver, his mother's bold eye gleaming out from beneath his sun-burnt hair, and with some of his father's strength, tugging at a large stone in the bed of the stream.

"Sammy, you'd better come in, hadn't you?" said Hannah, in a tone half mother and half mate.

"No-o-o, I guess not yet," replied Samuel.

An acorn came floating down the water. The boy took it up—looked at it—was pleased, and "reckoned" in his mind there were more up the "gully," and when his mother's back was turned, off he started for the acorns. The gorge of the mountain into which he was about to enter, had been formed (the work of centuries) by the attrition of the stream he had just been playing in—and walking on a level that bordered each side of the water, he boldly entered the ravine. An almost perpendicular wall or bank ascended on each side, to the height of a hundred feet, composed of crags and rocks, fritted by decay and storm into fantastic shapes and positions. A few scattered bushes and trees sought nourishment from the earth that had fallen from the level above, and, excepting their assistance, and the unseen surface of the rock, this natural parapet seemed inaccessible but to bird and beast. About an eighth of a mile from the entrance, a cataract closed the gorge, throwing up its white veil of mist, in seeming guardianship of the spirit waters. The verdant boughs, hanging over the bank, cast a deep gloom upon the bed below, while so lofty was the distance, they seemed to grow out of the sky, blue patches of which were to be seen peeping between them.

Hannah Eaton soon missed her boy, but as he had often wandered to the fields where his father was at work, she concluded that he was there, and checked coming fears with the hope that he would return at the hour of dinner. When he came, Joseph, nor any of the men, knew where he was. Then the agitated mother exclaimed, "He's lost, he's lost! and my poor boy will starve and die in the woods!" Gathering courage, she hastily summoned her family around her, and despatched them all but her husband to search in different directions in the neighboring forest. To him she said, "Scour every field you call your own, and if you can't find him, join me in the gorge."

"He wouldn't go into the gorge, Hannah."

"He would go any where." She knew not why, but a presentiment that the boy had followed the course of the stream, dwelt strongly on her mind.

"I can't find him, Hannah," said the husband, as he rejoined her not far from the mouth of the gorge.

An eagle flew past the mother as she entered the ravine. She thought to herself, the dreadful birds are tearing my child to pieces; and frantic, she hastened on, making the walls of the cavern echo back with the scream for her offspring. Her only answer was the eternal thunder of the cataract, as if in mockery of her wo, and flinging its cold spray upon her hot and throbbing temples. "Fool that I am, how can he hear me!" She strained her eyes along the dizzy height, that peered through the mist till she could no longer see, and her eyes filled with tears.

Who but a mother can tell the feelings of a mother's heart? Fear comes thick and fast upon the reeling brain of Hannah. "Oh, my boy—my brave boy will die," and wringing her hands in agony, she sunk to her husband's feet.

The pain of "hope deferred," had strained her heart's strings to the severest tension, and it seemed as if the rude hand of despair had broken them all.

The terrified husband threw water upon her pale face, and strove by all the arts he knew to win her back to life: At last she opened her languid eyes, and stared wildly around, and rose trembling to her feet. As she stood like a heart broken Niobe, "all tears," a fragment of rock came tumbling down the opposite bank. She looked up. She was herself once more, for half up the ascent stood her own dear boy.

But even while the glad cry was issuing from her lips, it turned into a note of horror—"Oh, mercy—mercy!"

The crag on which the boy stood, projected from the solid rock in such a way as to hang about twelve feet over the bank. Right below one of the edges of this crag, partly concealed among the bushes, crouched a panther.

The bold youth was aware of the proximity of his parents, and the presence of his dangerous enemy, at about the same time. He had rolled down the stone in exultation, to convince his parents of the high station he had attained, and he now stood with another in his hand drawing it back and looking at them, as if asking whether he should throw it at the terrible animal before him. Till then, the mother seemed immovable in her suspense, but conscious of the danger of her son, if he irritated the beast, she rushed some distance up the rock, and motioned with hand and head that he should not throw. Yet, with the feeling mind of childhood, and temper little used to control, he fearlessly threw the fragment with all his might at the ferocious beast. It struck on one of his feet. He gave a sudden growl, lashed his tail with fury, and seemed about to spring.

"Get your rifle, Joseph!" The poor man stirred not. His glazed eye was fixed with a look of death upon the panther, and he appeared paralyzed with fear. His wife leaped from the sand, and placing her hands on her husband's shoulder, looked into his face and cried, "Are you a man, Joseph Eaton? Do you love your child?" He started as if from sleep, and ran with furious haste from the ravine.

Again the mother looked towards her son. He had fallen on his knees, and was whispering the little prayers she had taught him, not in fear, but an indefinite thought came across his mind that he must die. The panther was upon his feet. He stooped to spring.—The distracted mother could keep still no longer. She rushed up the steep ascent with the energy of despair, reckless of danger, thinking only of her son. The rocks crumbled and slipped beneath her feet, yet she fell not. The sharp rocks cut her flesh, but she heeded it not. On, on she struggled in her agony.

The ferocious creature paused for a moment when he heard the wretched mother's approach. True to his nature, he sprang at the boy. He barely touched the crag, and fell backward, as Hannah ascended the opposite side.

"Ah!" said she, laughing deliriously, "the panther must try it again before he parts us, my boy; but we won't part;" and sinking on her knees before him, she folded him to her breast, bathing his young forehead with her tears.

Unalterable in his ferocity, and the manner of gratifying it, the panther again sprang from his former situation. This time he was more successful. His fore-foot struck the edge of the crag. "He will kill us, mother, he will kill us!" and the boy nestled closer to his mother's bosom. The animal struggled to bring his body on the crag—his savage features but a step from the mother's face. "Go away! go away!" shrieked Hannah, hoarse with horror. "You shan't have my child." Closer—still closer he came, his red eyes flashing fury, and the thick pantings of his breath coming in her face.

At this awful moment she hears the faint report of fire arms from the gulf below—the panther's foothold falls, his sharp claws loosen from the rock, and the baffled beast rolled down the precipice at the feet of Joseph Eaton.

The sun's last rays gleamed brightly on a little group at the mouth of the gorge. They were on their knees—the mother's bleeding hands over the head of her son, and the voice of prayer going to their Guardian for His mercy in thwarting the PANTHER'S LEAP.

NEW-YEAR'S NIGHT OF AN UNHAPPY MAN.

FROM THE GERMAN OF RICHTER.

An old man stood in the New Year's Night at his window, and looked with a glance of fearful despair up to the immoveable, ever-blooming heavens, and down upon the still, pure white earth, on which no one was so sleepless and so desolate in soul as he. For his grave stood near him; it was covered with the snows of old age, not the green foliage of youth; and he had brought out of a rich life nothing but errors, sins, and disease; a wasted body, a desolate soul, a breast full of poison, and an old age full of remorse. To-day, the beautiful hours of his youth re-appeared like spectres, and re-conveyed him to that lovely morning when his father first placed him on the cross-way of life, which leads on the right by sunny paths of virtue, into a large quiet land, full of light and harvests; but on the left, plunges down into the mole-walks of existence, and a black cave, full of distilling poison, hissing snakes, and dark sultry vapors.

Alas! the snakes were hanging on his breast, and the drops of poison were on his tongue; and he knew not where he stood. Distracted with irrepressible grief, he called to heaven: Give me back my youth! Oh, Father!—place me again on the cross-way that I may choose aright!

But his father and his youth had long since gone.—He saw the ignis-fatui dancing upon the marshes and disappearing upon cemeteries, and of which he said:—These are my foolish days. He saw a star flying from heaven, and glittering in the fall, vanish upon the earth. Thus am I, said his bleeding heart, and the snake's teeth of repentance probed still deeper into his wounds. His flaming imagination showed him flying ghosts (nacht wandler) upon the roofs; the wind-mill lifted its threatening arms for destruction; and a skull having been left behind in the dead house, assumed gradually his features. In the midst of the struggle, the music of the new year flowed down from the steeples like far-off church melodies.

His emotions began to soften. He looked around the horizon, and abroad on the far extended earth, and as he thought of the friends of his youth who, now happier and better than he, were teachers of the earth, and fathers of happy children, and blessed men, he said: O, if I might also like you slumber with dry eyes this first night of the year. Alas my dear parents! my dear parents! I should now be happy had I followed your precepts.

In the feverish remembrance of his youth it appeared to him as if the skull with his features, in the house of the dead, upraised itself, and at length, by the superstition which in the New Year's Night sees spirits of futurity, became a living youth.

At last he could look upon it no more. He covered his eyes, a thousand hot tears streamed and vanished in the snow; he sighed in accents scarcely audible: Return youth, return!

And it did return.—It was a horrid dream. He was yet a youth; his errors, only, no vision. But he thanked God that while yet young, he was able to shun the loathsome walks of vice, and turn into the sunny path which leads to the land of harvests. Return with him, young reader, if thou art standing with him in the way of error. This terrific dream would become thy future judge. And if thou shouldst call, Come back, beautiful youth, it would no more return.

CAUSE OF THANKFULNESS.—A minister was once speaking to a brother clergyman of his gratitude for a merciful deliverance he had just experienced. "As I was riding here to-day," said he, "my horse stumbled and came very near throwing me from a bridge, where the fall would have killed me, but I escaped unhurt."

"I can tell you something more than that," said the other. "As I rode here to-day my horse did not stumble at all." We are too apt to forget common mercies.

When we feel a strong desire to thrust our advice upon others, it is usually because we suspect their weakness; but we ought rather to suspect our own.

AN IDEA OF THE UNIVERSE.....NO. V.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

Having extended these articles as far, perhaps, as may be profitable or desirable to the reader, I will now come to a close after making a few reflections which the nature and importance of the subject suggests to my mind. A volume might be written without exhausting the subject, but I can only specify a few particulars.

1. I will begin by saying that all the vast systems which have been alluded to seem to claim some infinite and eternal Being as their author, whose glory and perfections are displayed in their workmanship and various revolutions. It seems impossible that such an amazing universe, arranged in such perfect order, and all the bodies it contains moving on in such regular and harmonious motions, "could have formed itself, or have been produced by a fortuitous concourse of atoms." Such an idea is contrary to the first principles of reasoning, which assert that every effect must have a corresponding cause. That such a notion should ever have found a place in minds of rational beings, is astonishing, especially if such persons had ever spent a moment in contemplation of the vastness of this material universe, with all its appendages.

2. This magnificent universe claims the serious consideration of every rational being, and more particularly of the enlightened Christian. "It contains a sensible adumbration of the divine attributes"—of the might and supremacy of the eternal God—of his omniscience, omnipresence, omnipotence, wisdom and benevolence presiding over all these scenes and movements. To overlook these things, is to disregard and refuse to acquaint ourselves with the work of our Maker. "Hearken unto this, stand still and consider the wonderful works of God"—and "Great and marvelous are thy works, Lord God Almighty"—are words of inspiration. No Christian can consistently set aside the study of the works of the Creator. For by contemplating the mighty universe as one element of his religion, the great object of his worship becomes more vivid—his mind becomes expanded—his devotional feelings rendered more rich and elevated.

3. The contemplation of the Creator through the medium of the universe, teaches us that notwithstanding the greatness of God's kingdom, he does not overlook the minutest objects or concerns of any part. The aptness of our minds at first view, to imagine that we shall be overlooked in the boundlessness of the universe, and immensity of God's works, arises from a consciousness of our limited powers and capacities. But as our minds expand, we take in the idea that the Creator superintends all his works—that his eye rests on the humblest and minutest objects as well as the largest. Every creature is continually supported by his power, and its thousand wants provided for by his overflowing goodness. Man shares in common with the higher orders of intelligent beings, the beneficence of God's blessings. The happiness bestowed on the myriads of beings which people his domains, can never diminish the resources of Him who has the mighty treasures of creation at his disposal, and who is the great center of all felicity. "Within the range of the moral government of God—if he is obedient to his laws—every intelligence may rest secure and confident," that he is not overlooked and forgotten amidst the vast concourse of worlds and beings. The presence of the Deity pervades the infinity of space, and his knowledge extends to the remotest corner of both the material and moral systems. This is an attribute, as are all others, peculiar to the Most High, which flows from the immensity of his nature, and the boundless knowledge he has of all his works, and which gives to us a more glorious and sublime idea of his character, than could possibly flow from any confined supervision of some department of his creation. And herein is the Divine Being immensely separated from man, and we may say of all created intelligences, in the display of these incommunicable attributes exercised in their interminable variations.

4. I am aware that some good, and perhaps well-meaning Christians, betray an extreme proneness to skepticism in regard to much that has been stated of the magnitude, magnificence and grandeur of the universe and all its attending movements. And I confess I am at a loss to account for it, only upon the ground that, in their estimation, the facts enumerated are wholly beyond the reach of human intellect to fathom or bring to light, or else beyond the power of Omnipotence to create and arrange. But to my mind, one thing is certain, which is, that such a universe as has been described, and such an one alone, is consistent with the character of an all-wise God, to whose omnipotence there is no bounds. And this is but the echo of revelation. For we read—"Who can utter the mighty operations of Jehovah, who can show forth all his power?"—"Canst thou by searching find out God?"—"Canst thou find out the Almighty's perfections?" "Thine, O Lord, is the greatness, and the glory and majesty; for all that is in heaven and earth is thine, and Thou art exalted above them all." "He doeth according to his will in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of earth, for his kingdom ruleth over all." "Great is our Lord, and of great power; his greatness is unsearchable." Here are some of the sublimest conceptions of our wonderful-working God. A universe, vast and unbounded—incomprehensible and eternal—is just such a one as we would naturally expect from a Being possessed of such a nature and character as the God of heaven and earth. We may turn our eyes to whatever point we please, and we shall find the Creator ever acting consistent with himself, and in no instance, perhaps, is it more strikingly manifest than in those orbs which wind their courses in the eternal fields above. "So nature, revelation and our abstract views of the material system, all conspire to show the harmony and consistency of the Creator in all his ways and works."

5. This subject affords a striking illustration of the wonderful condescension of the Divine Being, in reference to his intelligent creation, making visible his power, and might, and majesty, and sending his Son to make himself farther known to his creatures—elevate their worship above blind stupidity, and give them some long-looked-for intelligence as to man's final destination. While man was groping his way in darkness—fearing that death might not reveal a brighter existence—and fearing, too, that even while this life's feeble flame should burn, he might be forgotten amidst the immensity of God's works—oh, amazing condescension to relate!—the joyful announcement was made to mankind—"God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish but have everlasting life." This was indeed love and mercy in their purest forms. They more forcibly urge upon us the declaration of the apostle to the Gentiles, when he said there is "a height and depth, breadth and length in the love of God which is in Christ Jesus, that posseth all knowledge."

6. There is much consolation for the devout

Christian, to be derived from a consideration of the immensity of the universe, its splendor and magnificence. Because it forcibly occurs to his mind that if the Creator has reared so vast and magnificent a fabric, "there can be nothing too hard for Him to do"—and that he is able to perform in the behalf of intelligent creatures for more than they can ask for, or even more than they can conceive or desire. He is reminded that all God's gracious promises shall be accomplished, and that no obstacle can interpose to the frustration of his wise and benevolent designs. His power is irresistible, his wisdom is unerring, and the bright emanations of goodness extend over all his works.

7. From a consideration of this subject, we learn that it is both our duty and interest to learn to yield a willing obedience to the laws of Him whose universe we have just been contemplating. The moral laws of God are intended to promote the happiness of his sentient creatures, and preserve the universe in harmony and order, and that all the violators of the laws of God must suffer punishment in some shape or other. All the laws of the Eternal are fenced by a moral sanction; and who can resist the power of Him who rules the universe and all its inhabitants! "His counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure. He will cause his works to praise him with endless praises—he will open every mouth with thanksgivings, when all shall be made acquainted with his boundless perfections and goodness. No tongue shall be silent, no heart be tuneless in the great assembly in a world of redeemed spirits, when they shall gather around the throne of the Eternal Father, to go out from his presence forever. Let the people rejoice with exceeding gladness, for they have the Almighty framer of this boundless universe for their Father—their everlasting Friend—their exceeding great reward, and their portion forever; and he is eternally filling, equaling, bounding all, and they eternally filling up unto the fulness of God.

PROFANITY.....NO. IV.

BY REV. S. J. GIBSON.

There are people educated to this worse than useless habit, who use the words in a thoughtless manner. They commence the practice when young; before they were of age sufficient to be aware of its evil tendency. Then they heard people who were older than themselves, employing profane language with impunity; and, with not a solitary vicious thought, they commenced acting in the same manner, until at the years of understanding, they have found the habit exerting such a power upon their minds, that it is almost an impossibility for them to abandon it. For these we have more charity than for many others, for there appears to be no evil intention, within their minds by which they are actuated, but so far have they become given to the practice, that many times they are not aware that they have used the offensive words, until reminded of it by the kindness of a friend.

But I am compelled to say, that frequently youth learn to use profane language by listening to discourses from the sacred desk; from whence there should only come lessons of virtue and morality. Let it not be understood that I am charging those who occupy the pulpit, with the intention of encouraging this habit. This we trust is not so; but many from a want of reflection, and a proper knowledge of human nature, strengthen the very evil which they are endeavoring to destroy. There is too frequent repetition of the name of the Deity, and other words, which constitute the vocabulary, of profanity, and the child of seven, eight, and ten years perhaps, does not possess the power to distinguish between such a proceeding and that of a man swearing in the streets. As an instance in point I would say, that within the circle of my acquaintance, I have seen a boy of some five or six years old, upon a Sabbath permitted to attend meeting, which to him was something unusual, as his parents resided some distance from the village. Upon his return home, he was interrogated respecting the meeting, and he recollected very distinctly two things—he said they had singing there, “and the preacher swore like fury.” These being to him the two most important and novel things that he had witnessed, it was but a short time before he was trying his hand at them, with pretty good success, and but for the prompt correction of his parents, from that single circumstance, would undoubtedly, have become addicted to the habit of profanity.

Too great a familiarity in the use of the name of the Deity, is an impropriety into which many who occupy the sacred desk in the capacity of teachers, have fallen; and it always to a greater or less extent, exerts an evil tendency upon community—destroys partially that reverence which should fill every soul at the mention of Him who is clothed with infinity. It was but a few weeks since that I took up a paper containing a sermon by one of our ministering brethren, and though it was an excellent production in other respects, yet in no more than five and a half columns, I noticed the name of the Supreme Being above eighty times repeated! Now if we are endeavoring to persuade our fellow beings to abandon their evil habits, we must, in order to be successful, correct our own faults—we must employ the utmost care in the selection of our language, and not put it into the power of the profane man, when he is spoken to respecting the habit, to answer us, that we are more to be blamed than himself, because he became addicted to the practice by listening to the discourses of the pulpit.

But to return more directly to those who indulge in this habit from a thoughtless motive, I would say that it does seem to me, that when such men soberly reflect upon the subject, they can but form a strong resolution to abandon it forever. Let them consider one moment the situation that men sustain in the world—surrounded by childhood and youth, whose minds have not arrived at maturity, but highly susceptible of lasting impressions by external objects; and every word which we speak serves but to mould and bias those minds, whose influence may live and exert its power upon society years to come—even when we shall have been long mouldering in our graves. How necessary then that each man guard well his language—that he thus keep an eye upon the morals of youth and enable them to escape the influence of evil habits.

And to you who use profane words, from mere thoughtlessness; though there is no evil in your intention, yet we beseech of you to reflect once upon the evils which the habit exerts upon the morals of the community—the deleterious tendency which it may have upon those who look up to you for counsel and instruction, and may you ere long form and strictly adhere to a resolution to employ alone the words of virtuous refinement.

KNOWLEDGE OF GOOD AND EVIL.

On hearing a discourse not long since in which the speaker represented Adam before the fall, as being in a perfect state, that as he was made in the image of God he must, consequently, have been, in degree, like him in his perfections, knowledge, wisdom, holiness, &c., I was led into the following train of reflections. How wise must Adam have been, prior to his first transgression? And what an exhibition of his perfections was this to transgress the very first command of his Maker? It would seem that he had no practical knowledge, at least; else what necessity for transmitting to him the statement of facts, which we find recorded in Gen. i: 27-31? Yet this preacher seems to imagine Adam to have been ushered into existence a perfectly wise being, possessing an immeasurable degree of knowledge. Also, that his first sin produced all the evil which human nature is heir to. But did Adam's sin create the elements? Though the elements are good in themselves, and for the benefit of man, yet if they be not kept within their proper sphere, they may be converted into evil. Fire, for example—how much comfort does man derive from its influence? yet if it gain the ascendancy, how much pain and misery does it produce? So of the others. Man has no faculty which is not beneficial if not suffered to transcend its proper limits. It is by suffering them to digress from the strict rules of reason and prudence, that they produce sin and bring pain. Good and evil, if we believe the text, seem to have been so intimately connected, that they are represented as being the fruit of one tree, which we consider an evidence that they both existed prior to Adam's first transgression, Gen. ii: 17. “But of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it,” etc. iii: 1. “But of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God hath said, ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die.” iii: 6, 7. “And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof, and did eat, and gave also to her husband with her, and he did eat. And the eyes of both of them were opened,” etc. It appears that they had been as one blind or sleeping previously,—which we think is evidence that their knowledge was very limited. A thirst for knowledge, seem to have been implanted in the very nature of man, which, together with circumstances, led the primeval pair on to transgress the command of their Maker. We do not ask why man was constituted as he is, but we would ask what possible advantage it could have been to man, that good existed in the world if he might never arrive at a knowledge of it? It would also seem that to obtain a knowledge of good, he must necessarily become acquainted with evil, as they are represented as being the fruit of one tree. It is necessary that man should know the evil and the good which exist in the world, that he may learn to refuse the one and choose the other. The above is our view of the subject, we leave it for others to draw their own conclusion.

INFLUENCE.

BY REV. A. W. BRUCE.

In this world we have a standard for the admeasurement of character—I allude to influence. A man's intellectual, moral, political or literary character, is known by the amount of influence he is capable of exerting in the departments of morals, politics and literature. If character is dearer than life, for which a person will give “all that he hath,” the subject of influence is before us in an imposing attitude. A field is opened for the noblest ambition. Men are great among their fellows, and “great before the Lord,” in proportion to the degree and kind of influence they exert. And I may add, an unambitious Christian there can not be. He whose admiration can not be excited by the lovely, the sublime and glorious, in nature, providence and redemption—in whose breast there is no response to the manly virtue and lofty enterprise of prophets and apostles, fired by the love of their Lord, “the Prince of peace”—but who sinks indifferently upon his couch, content to live like an oyster in his shell, after a survey of all the good and ill on earth, and all the glories of heaven; I say, “The love of God dwelleth not in that man.” None can be a true believer without sympathising with the high and holy activities of God, and good men in heaven and on earth.

But the main thought forced upon us by our subject, is, that influence, being our most valuable possession, is the property of Messiah; and that he will institute the severest inquisition concerning its use, of any other item of our inventory. We need not here enter into an examination of the philosophy of this argument. It is sufficient for us to know the truth. Influence is the richest yield of the intellectual, moral, and social machine, and God claims it as peculiarly his own. Indeed, a hasty glance at all the matters embraced in the Bible, will suffice to assure us, that he places a high estimate upon human influence. He instituted our nature and the laws of its operation; he gave it its supremacy among terrestrial creations; he ennobled it, and it alone, by committing to men his will; he has glorified it by permitting his councils to be in any measure swayed, and his measures in any thing directed by our prayers; and above all, he has stamped upon it great value in incarnating his Spirit in the prophets, apostles, and Christians, and a manifestation of HIMSELF, in his Son, who was the son of a woman, that he might work according to the laws which regulate the sympathies of human beings. The most exquisite sensibilities of nature's Maker, and nature's Lord were seen in tears shed by the “man Christ Jesus.” The compassion—the love of God flowed in human tears. Nor can we cease with this observation. God has not only chosen the channel of our nature to disclose “the brightness of his glory and express image of his person,” but he has ordained that by the same means, “through lips of clay,” the story of redemption should be told, and the work of salvation effected to the end of time.—And as language is the means of communication among men, he has selected it as the medium through which to transfer the powers and benefits, and exhibit the glories of the Gospel to them. Yes, the voice, the sympathies, and the intelligence of men, are constituted instrumentalities of the divine operation to salvation.

It certainly can not be necessary for me to show that in matters of religion, one man can influence another—that the parent controls in some measure the character and destiny of the child. All the operations of society turn upon this pivot, and to deny it, would be to hang weights upon all improvement.

Courteous reader, it appears to the writer, that the most profitable use of these premises, would be to inquire how far our conduct agrees with these ideas of responsibility. To the wealthy we might turn with the inquiry, how have you appropriated that portion of God's bounty, which he has been pleased, for a time, to put within the compass of your control? Has your distribution of it been for the well being of society? How many dollars have you expended to gratify the lusts of the flesh, of the eye, and the pride of life? and how many to train the human mind and heart for usefulness, for happiness, and for God? Can you enjoy the comforts of home, and the luxuries of commerce, without giving a per cent. of your income, to carry the blood-bought message of salvation to the door and the ears of your fellows? The aggregate wealth of our common heritage, (though our societies are composed mostly of the “poor of this world,” as was the case always), is sufficient to double its influence in a campaign of twelve months. It is but necessary for us to see and feel our duty on this subject, for the world to see and feel the power of the truth.

God governs men chiefly by this feeling of responsibility. Indeed, it is the foundation of human government, and no greater calamity can happen to any people, than for the rulers and the ruled, to cease to feel, each the responsibility of his station. The spiritual growth, and success of the Gospel of salvation, depend upon the existence of a healthy tone of the disciples. We need only compare those bodies, whose peculiarity is the denial of this great truth, and those which are filled with worldly minded, contentious, and self-conceited members, with the infant Christian kingdom, described by the beloved physician in Acts, to see this remark fully illustrated and verified. The tendency of enlarged views of human, and Christian responsibility, is humbling; the sentiment assigns man his proper place, not in the dust of degradation, but in the field of humble, active exertion in the cause of universal salvation. The subject of this sentiment would not wish to feel otherwise than he does; he would not be spared the pains and anguish of spirit, arising from a consciousness of his boundless indebtedness to God, in favors from him, and duties to him, upon any compromise short of spiritual improvement! Knowing that he is not his own, but is bought with a price," with a spirit most opposite to servility, he "therefore glorifies God in his body, and his spirit, which are his." Love and gratitude, are the fountains of his moral existence.

Let those, then, who wish to see a healthy and vigorous action established in the body ecclesiastic, labor to diffuse a sense of responsibility to God, in all the offices and relations of religious society especially. Does money give influence? Then let the monied Christian exert himself accordingly. Does literature? Then let every chaste and classic thought, and every sparkling gem of oriental rhetoric, be consecrated to the upbuilding of truth in the spread of the Gospel.

Society is bound together by innumerable influences, somewhat analagous to the nervous, and arterial systems of the animal body, and in relation to these, both in the corporeal and social arrangements, every impression and motion affects in some measure its well being and destiny: Christianity, with its help-meets, those popular forces, the social affections, is intended by its Author, to be signalized before all other forces which impel the mind and heart of man. The precious deposit is with Christians, and what the Lord Jesus said to his chosen twelve, "Go, teach all nations," is virtually said to every believer, father, son, matron and maid, without changing in the least, those, and the other relations of life.

The Saviour once said—and the remark will apply with force to our subject—that the men who seek their reward elsewhere, than in religion, "are wiser in their affairs than the children of light"—It appears almost a paradox—darkness wiser than light! But the wisdom of either party, is in the use, the diligent use of the resources of the theatre of his choice. The one has chosen, as his all, this world; here his aspirations seem to end—the other "seeks the things which are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God;" yet instead of the Christian's zeal excelling the worldling's thrift, his devotion too seldom gains an advance upon his own earthly attachments. This is religious folly, and beyond a certain point, is incompatible with eternal life; "Ye can not serve God and mammon;" fealty to two masters, is an absurdity.—Earth and heaven are too far apart to keep a hand on each. Learn, then, dear reader, that "the beginning of wisdom is the fear of the Lord."

A GOOD NAME.—NO. IV.

"A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches, and loving favor rather than silver and gold." SOLOMON.

Again: a good name can not consist with ingratitude to parents; one of the most common and lamentable errors of the young. Youth is one of the most illusive periods of "the seven ages of man." We begin the world with no established characters, and experience has shown—often but too sadly—that even the best and wisest can not predict unerringly from the youth alone, what the man will be. The gentle disposition of the child, and the integrity of the youth, kindle in the future heavens the bright bow of hope; on the beauties of which the parent and the friend dwell with the intensest delight. But, alas, for human hopes!—for how often is that bright bow dissipated, and the parent's heart "smitten with wo," by the cruel ingratitude, the reckless follies and imprudencies of both son and daughter. The prospect of "a good name" with all its blessed consequences, which the devoted father had hoped would be the firm staff that should support him in his declining years; and the fond and tender mother, the ministering angel that should stay her tottering steps; cheer the slow-passing hours of her fading life, and, at last, close her dim eyes in death—that bright hope, how often has it sunk quickly in darkness, and been followed by the awful night of despair!

Ah! little do children know how much their parents' happiness is bound up in their welfare; how deep is the love they bear them; how strong is the solicitude that follows them through the day and watches over them when wrapped in forgetful slumber. For them, in summer's heat and winter's cold, for months and years, does that kind father sweat and toil; for them, through many, many years, does that mother, who gave them being, care and labor, weep and suffer; and shall we repay them for all this labor and love, with inattention, disobedience, coldness, and ingratitude! Are these the returns parents are to receive from children? Think, I beseech you, young man and young woman—think how many weary steps, after they were already worn out with labor, you have caused your parents. Look into their faces and behold the care-worn brows and deep furrowed cheeks, and read there the histories of what you have caused "a father good and mother true;" and can you still be unkind, ungrateful to them!

But even the best of us as children, how ungrateful we are—how soon forget the home that reared us! A few months or years absence from that home, and we think but seldom of that mother who remembers us in every morning chant and evening prayer. No day with its engrossing cares rolls by, but they think and talk of us around the blest altar of that once loved home; but do we think of them? are they in our hearts and upon our lips thus often? O ye, who are children, blest with parents still living, let me beseech you truly to honor them; for all the love and kindness and filial gratitude you can show them, will never pay them half the debt you owe. Forget them not in any circumstances; utter no rude or unkind word; disregard not their wishes or injunctions; treat not lightly or disrespectfully their feelings or views; for they are your parents, the protectors of your infantile, helpless years, who furnished you with the home of your thoughtless childhood, and are even now bending over you with blessings. Though their forms and features have changed, and perhaps also their outward possessions, yet their hearts have changed not, save only as they have grown strong and devoted in their love. Clouds and sunshine alter the appearance of the sky, but the stars remain forever the same. So with our parents; whatever may be their or our outward condition, their affection burns on, pure and changeless, and unaffected by any circumstances of our worldly estate. Love them, then, I repeat, and honor them, that you may prove yourselves worthy that good name which is rather to be chosen than great riches, and that you may reap the blessings of that loving favor which is more valuable than silver and gold.

"When God shall guide my soul above,
By the soft cords of heavenly love—
When the vain cares of earth depart,
And tuneful voices swell my heart—
Then shall each word, each note I raise,
Burst forth in pealing hymns of praise—
And all not offered at His shrine,
Dear parents, I will place on thine." H. B. S.

DISCUSSION IN TABERG.

DEAR SIR—At the request of some of our friends, and for the information of those abroad, I take the liberty to give you a short history of a discussion we have had in this place, on the question, "Is the doctrine of endless misery true?" and wish you to publish it if you think proper.

It took place in the latter part of March and first part of April, and was continued for six nights. The question originated in the Lyceum in this place, and was introduced by the advocates of endless misery. Some of our friends, not wishing to discuss it in the Lyceum, opposed its reception, and succeeded in laying it over for consideration; but at our next meeting it was called up and adopted, and the disputants left to take sides as their feelings dictated.

The superiority in point of numbers, was against us; eight in affirmative and six in negative. On the first evening, we met at our usual place, but it was soon found unable to contain all that wished to hear; and after the first night, it was held at the Methodist chapel in this place, which was kindly granted for the occasion. It was discussed by the members of the Lyceum, for the first two nights, after which it was thrown open to all who wished to take a part. On the third night Br. R. Queal spoke for the first time, taking up the arguments of the affirmative, tearing them into shreds, and scattering them like dust before the tempest; and giving the opinions of Partialist commentators on the disputed passages, in support of his positions. Some of the audience already (to appearance at least) began to fear, that their idolized belief would turn out to be a fable of modern origin. As all the orthodox clergy in this place (six or seven in number,) had as yet stood aloof from the arena, although urged to take part by their friends, it was proposed by a highly respectable Methodist Brother, to procure some heavier artillery from a distance to meet Br. Queal; which was assented to by him, and accordingly, on the last night, the Rev. Mr. Wheeler, (Methodist,) of Delta, appeared in the lists, armed to the teeth with essay and argument. The fourth evening was spent in skirmishes by the outposts of each side, and amounted to but little; but on the fifth evening, the Rev. Mr. Hodges, (Presbyterian,) of this place, opened his fire upon the Universalists, killing none, wounding none, and aiming at any thing but the question; and was finally called to order by the president, for asserting that "Universalists were furnishing the victims" for his fabled infernus. Br. Queal replied, and quoted a large number of texts to disprove the affirmative by proving the opposite true.

On the last evening, (the discussion being limited in extent to this night,) the gentleman expected, Rev. Mr. Wheeler, appeared, but unfortunately for him he came in at the eleventh hour—all the ground having been previously traversed. Notwithstanding, he proceeded to read a well prepared and labored essay, and to extemporize, as it was called for by the replies of Br. Queal. But it was too late. The citadel was already battered down, and the ruin could not be rebuilt with any prospect of rendering it tenable, in one short night; yet he labored hard, in a gentlemanlike manner, and with a zeal worthy of a better cause. But it was of no avail; for the almost unanimous voice of the public has given a verdict in our favor. The President, J. C. Thorn, Esq., presided in an able and dignified manner, and took till the next meeting of the Lyceum to give his decision; but on his request, was excused; the public having already decided.

Throughout there was a large and respectable audience in attendance, who by their silence, patience and deep attention manifested the intense interest they felt in the discussion. We believe there will much good grow out of it; for it has excited a spirit of inquiry whether these things are so, that we hope will not slumber until truth stands forth conspicuous above the fogs of superstition and error, in her own native beauty and grandeur. We think we hazard nothing, taking into consideration all the attendant circumstances, in saying, that no triumph was ever more complete, or victory more surely won. It was not a contest between learned critics, and consequently we had to depend on reason and revelation. Very little bitterness was engendered, and that little has passed away and been forgotten. The main dependence of the affirmative was the 24th and 25th chapter of Matthew. The arguments of the negative were hardly noticed by the affirmative; and a well written original essay for the occasion, not noticed at all. Yours in the soul-cheering faith of a world's salvation.

THE SPIRIT LAND.

BY MISS C. M. TIBBITS.

That land—O who its mysteries shall tell—
Proclaim the secret of its joy or woe;
Who shall unlock its portals strange and dim,
That we its deep dark labyrinth may know?

There, shall we meet the loved, the loved and lost;
Who have fled from us to a brighter strand—
There do they wander 'neath the whispering shade,
Of emerald branches by the zephyrs fanned?

There, do they love us still, and watch our way?
Do they hang o'er us in the still lone night?
O, do they guard us in life's darkened hours,
And shed around us dreams of rosy light?

There, is each tempest hushed no more to rise?
Does there no shadows wreath the dreamer's soul?
Does the rich music of celestial throngs
Through Heaven's eternal vault unceasing roll?

There, is all sadness banished—all the woes
That circle round us in our earth's dim home?
Does no remembrance of the far off past
With its dim shadows o'er the spirit come?

There, shall we meet the loved ones of our youth,
And see united love's dissevered chain?
Will they look on us in other days—
O, will youth's trustfulness return again?

Will there be none to hate—to fill our souls
With all the deepening anguish of despair?
Can we look forth upon each joyous scene,
Nor fear that storms will gather darkly there?

PARTIALISM AND UNIVERSALISM AT THE DEATH-BED.

The self-styled orthodox have a morbid appetite for publishing horrid death-bed scenes and conversions of Universalists. It is a pathognomic or characteristic symptom of all believers in Partialism. It often devolves upon the medical practitioner to witness the melancholy scene of departing man, to his final and eternal home. I have been engaged in that practice for several years. My opportunities for witnessing the last hours of those that have been called hence, have been somewhat extensive.

Being a believer in the glorious doctrine of the Restitution, and not altogether an idle observer, I have sought to fathom the boasted superiority of Partialism in the last hours of man's existence. If I should be allowed to generalize, or draw a deduction from my observations, I would reverse the latter portion of the old axiom, "That Universalism will do to live by but not to die by," and the least I could say of Partialism would be, that it is neither fit to live or die by. If the limits of this letter would admit, I might narrate several horrid death-bed scenes of believers in Partialism—believers, too, so perfect as to be honored with the epithet of saint—but I have neither time nor inclination, so to do. I always view the publication of such horrid scenes of an excited or diseased imagination, as a mark of weakness in the doctrine and minds of our Partialist brethren. I can not stretch my mind to such a height of credulity, as to believe that they in candor resort to such sophistry and subtlety, to demolish the temple of Universalism. Grant for a moment that there have been instances of death-bed renunciations of Universalism, I ask what has that to do with the Bible? or with any established truth? They can not even solve a common problem in Mathematics with their death-bed conversions; yet notwithstanding, they can interpret the mysteries of Heaven.—A strange solecism indeed!

All persons possessed of common sense do know, or ought to know, that the peculiar state of man's mind, in the last hours of his earthly existence, is no evidence in support of Universalism, and especially none in vindication of Partialism.

The human system is so organized and constructed, that if disease invades any one organ or faculty, the diseased action is immediately communicated to the rest of the system, through the medium of the nerves and circulation of the blood; all febrile affections, more or less affect the mind. Diseases which have their seat within the cranium, impair or destroy the healthy harmony of the human intellect. If any person doubts the above physiological facts, let him give me the rational of the ravings and delirium of a person laboring under acute Encephalitis! I also would refer him to persons laboring under the following mental derangements, viz., Fanaticism, Hypochondriasis, Melancholy, and Misanthropy, which are species of insanity caused or produced by the withering sting of disease. I ask what individual is ready to sanction as law and Gospel, the wild fancies of a diseased or excited imagination? I will venture to say he is not to be found. Yet notwithstanding, the bigoted believer in the corrosive doctrine of endless misery, assails the Universalist with arguments and evidence, the emanations of a misguided or diseased understanding! Man is a fallible being, and to err is human; God is immutable. The voice of inspiration declares that "God will have all men to be saved;" Partialism declares that God will save only a part of the human family. Whose veracity shall we dispute, God's or man's?

But, I am wandering too far from the object of the letter. When I took my pen in hand, my intention was to give you a succinct account of Partialism endeavoring to convert a Universalist upon his death bed. To the circumstances of this disgraceful attempt to convert a dying mortal from the "hope that is as an anchor to the soul," I was personally an eye witness.

Not many months ago, I was sent for, to visit Nehemiah Platt. The messenger supposed he was dying. I with all possible haste repaired to his residence, some four or five miles distant. I found him laboring under a severe attack of cholera morbus.

From the previous debilitated state of his system, the severity of the morbid action, and the present exhaustion, my prognosis naturally and necessarily would be unfavorable. I prepared and administered some medicine. Apparently it made no impression upon the disease. I tarried with him several hours, in order that whatever the exigency of his case would demand, might be supplied. It now was evident that he soon must bid adieu to all earthly things, and yield to the power of death. Strange to say, his mind during his sickness was calm and composed. He seemingly was conscious that his "body soon must return to dust, and the Spirit to God who gave it." He expressed a wish to get well, but felt disposed to submit to the decrees of Providence. Many of his friends and relatives had collected, all anxious for his recovery. I informed them that it was not possible for him to recover; despair usurped the throne of hope, and the most heart-rending drama commenced that I ever beheld.

From this time forward the dying man was molested with imprecations, interrogatories and exclamations. A complete description of this dramatic scene, together with a repetition of the many unnatural expressions, I must acknowledge is altogether out of the sphere of my mental capacity.—However, I must give you a sample of the comfort that was administered to the dying mortal, by self-styled and infatuated orthodoxy.

"Nehemiah do you pray? Nehemiah you are a going to die, you must pray! Nehemiah you must pray to God to pardon your sins? Why don't you pray? Pray all the time, for you are dying! God will forgive you your sins if you will only pray! You never will get to heaven if you don't pray?" with these and numerous other expressions, the dying man was haunted, to say nothing of the horrid gesticulation and physiognomical expressions.

In this company of soul-savers was also a Methodist clergyman. He desired me to tell Mr. Platt of his approaching death, and the necessary preparation for another world, which I declined. But this storm of despair which was in consequence of fear that Mr. Platt should go to hell, assumed such a fearful aspect, that I concluded I had better inform him of his probable fate. I approached his bed-side, and commenced talking. Whilst I was speaking there was a profound silence. I took a glance over my congregation; their countenances plainly betrayed their feelings as to the nature of my conversation. Up to this critical epoch they were ignorant as to my being a Universalist. Neither did I know that Mr. Platt was one. Suffice it to say, that my talk was not as their talk. Why? because I quoted from the Bible—I quoted 1 Tim. ii: 3-6; iii: 9, 10; Rom. vi: 23; Isaiah xxxv: 10; lxx: 22-24. From the nature of these passages of Holy Writ they learned that I, also, was a great sinner. No sooner had I left the bed-side than the Rev. Gentleman spoke, "Let us pray." Here, brother Grosh, is something again, which is out of the power of my intellectual faculties to describe. The sage Theologian called it prayer, but my English, Latin and French dictionaries have no names for such mental abortions.

Mr. Platt formerly belonged to the Methodist Church. Through the agency of some Universalist he obtained some Universalist books, which he read; by reading these works he was led to search the Scriptures more closely. I was informed that he had said, the more he had studied the Bible, the less he cared for Methodism. Mr. Platt was a man respected and beloved by all who knew him. Dignity, and integrity and his ever readiness to oblige and forgive, were his peculiar characteristics.

Notwithstanding the great exertions made by the Orthodox to deprive him of his faith, he died confiding and trusting in Him who came to seek and save those which were lost. Thus it is shown, and conclusively proven, that Universalism rightly understood and practiced will do both to live and die by. Yours, etc., JOSEPH WALRATH, M. D.

MEMORY OF A DEPARTED PARENT.

It was sun set, and night was throwing her dark mantle over the earth, hiding the habitations of men from the passing traveler's view; and the hitherto cloudless canopy of heaven was being over-spread with clouds, and all nature presented the appearance of an approaching thunder storm. Such were the external circumstances on a memorable evening, in the spring of 1840, as I was proceeding on horse-back from the pleasant and delightful town of L—, to the bleak and rugged hills of the town of F—; expecting to be overtaken by the tempest, long before reaching my place of destination. But it seemed as if the raging elements had been delayed on my account. I urged on my way-worn animal through the surrounding darkness, which I was enabled to penetrate by the frequent flashes of vivid lightning, giving, for a moment, all surrounding objects the appearance of one continued mass of fire. Proceeding in this manner, till at length passing around the brow of a hill, a long stream of light proceeding from the window of a dwelling not far distant, burst upon my anxious vision, and told me that my journey was nearly ended. This light came from my once happy home, which in former days I had visited so often with feelings of the most pleasing character. But how different were my thoughts at this time on approaching the parental dwelling. A sad change had taken place. An untimely messenger had made a long expected though sudden visit; and one from the once happy circle had obeyed his call. Death, "the king of terrors," had been there, and I was about to witness its ravages. Gladly would I have delayed this interview; but the raging storm pursuing me close, I was obliged at once to introduce myself to the melancholy group within. But what a meeting was that! Surely I was received with the tenderest affection, and a hearty welcome:—but where was the lively conversation and hilarity with which we used to spend the flying hours on such occasions? All were exchanged for the melancholy realities of the house of mourning. Every countenance bore the impress of the deepest sorrow, and a heaviness of heart which I had never before witnessed. All seemed lost in meditation. The once pleasant and happy family circle, was now deprived of its brightest ornament. And, thought I, am I always to witness such scenes as these on visiting my parental roof? If so, how can I ever enjoy the peace and happiness that usually spring from the recollection of home and friends? Such were the thoughts that were passing in my mind, when, being conducted into an adjoining room, I beheld the cause of all this unhappiness. There, by the dim light of a lamp I was enabled to behold the pale and stiffened corpse of my once dearly beloved mother; now wrapt in that sleep from which no human being ever awakes. Oh! what a moment was that! What being in all the universe could describe my feelings! It seemed that my heart was dying within me. There lay the ever idolized form of a parent, wrapt in the cold embrace of death; she that had watched over me in childhood, and turned my unguarded steps when well nigh in the slippery paths of vice; she that was my soother in affliction, my comforter in sickness, and in short, under all circumstances, my most affectionate friend on earth. She had gone to be with us on this earth no more for ever. I gazed on the form before me for a short time, but could not withstand the sight. I was forced to leave the room, and give way to a burst of grief, which with me is indescribable, and which feeling I have to the present day, when memory makes me a spectator of that heart-rending scene.

I soon after retired to rest, but no rest could I get. The house-clock told the hour long after midnight, before sleep (that soother of all sorrows) visited my eyelids. On the following morning the sun had commenced his apparent course in the skies, long before I was delivered from the strong bands of slumber, or made conscious that I was still an earthly being. This was the day, that I for the first time in my life, was to attend the funeral of a near connection. I prepared myself for it with feelings "at once awful and tender." But I forbear giving particulars; suffice it to say, that the services being over, a melancholy group were seen wending their way to the silent church yard, there to deposit the last remains of an inhabitant of earth, to moulder and mingle again with their native dust. Such were the appearances while I was following to and standing by the narrow habitation of a departed parent. Things went silently but rapidly on; the coffin being lowered, the grave was soon filled, and covered with neatly cut turfs, which formed a sort of grassy mound over the relics of the departed. Then came the trying time of leaving my mother's grave. I lingered, while one and another left the place; till I stood solitary and alone. Oh! I could have drenched the turfy mound with my tears. I seemed riveted to the spot; and could not bear the idea of going back into the world, (for it seemed to me while standing there, that I was beyond the precincts of mortality,) without the tender advice, and soothing consolation of the dear departed. But summoning all my resolution, I turned from the spot in all the agonies of grief, to follow the mournful company to our once pleasant but now desolate habitation. At this moment something seemed to say, in a small but audible voice; "why all this sad lamentation? hast thou no hope?—yes, I know thou hast."—This seemed to break the spell, and I found myself again on earth, with feelings much more pleasant, and a mind perfectly settled and serene.

Yes, dear mother, I have a hope,
And ever true to that hope I'll be;
With superstition and error I'll cope,
Assisted by God, and the memory of thee.

Easton, Md., April 24th, 1843.

DEAR BR. GROSH—After a long absence from home, and friends, and parent, I will break the silence by offering an article for publication. Should this meet a kind reception, you shall hear from me again. I have many things treasured up which, if communicated, might be useful to your readers.—As I pursue my travels South, where the name of "Universalist" is scarcely known, opportunities will be offered for witnessing prejudices. In subsequent numbers I may relate instances which have already come under my observation. [Send them on Br. Perry—they will add much to our needed variety.] Yours, W. PERRY.

FILIAL LOVE A CHRISTIAN DUTY.

BY REV. W. PERRY.

It is mentioned by Miss Pardoe that "a beautiful feature in the character of Turks, is reverence for the mother. Their wives may advise or reprimand unheeded, but their mother is an oracle consulted, confided in, listened to with respect or deference, honored to the latest hour, and remembered with affection and regret even beyond the grave. "Wives may die," say they, "and we can replace them—children may perish, and others be born to us—but who shall restore the mother when she passes away and is seen no more?" The above beautiful extract contains sentiments of the most chaste and holy nature; they can only be appreciated by those deprived of a home, and then only by the feeling heart. Long years of toil and study are forgotten, and the varied changes I have witnessed, the gilded castles hope has reared up, the thousand attachments and dear ties of friendship, sink to insignificance as that sweet word "MOTHER" wakes the slumbering memories of my childhood. Mental triumphs, with the long list of honors won, the trumpet tongue of fame and the thundering applause elate the heart—charitable acts winning the approval of the world and its Creator, may speak peace to the soul—memory may be flooded with a life of honorable and noble actions; but all will fail to inspire happiness as full, emotions as pleasing, opinions as exalted, as FILIAL LOVE. Other love is attended with regret—other affections create anxiety; but filial devotion and regard only throw care and perplexity aside, and open the way to God. Like the sun of heaven it sheds around our path a brilliant light which makes our footsteps sure and our earthly pilgrimage pleasant. It is the germ of all that is great and noble—adding lustre to actions recognized as graces among the most enlightened of savage nations.—It is the nucleus from which human greatness borrows its brightest glory. It is the only affection capable of perpetuating tranquility, and handing our names down to posterity unblemished with the charge of ingratitude. It is a love every person in Christendom should cherish, to show that the doctrines of Jesus inculcate as pure virtue as the Koran. Every thing sacred enjoins the duty upon Christians. Blessed with a revelation from the Almighty, and a country teeming with tokens of a father's regard and benevolence—with a government bounteous as Providence, privileging us to go out to study the great volume of the world and creation as free unshackled mind may dictate. Thus carrying revelation in one hand, and the light of nature in the other, we find a right interpretation of both—and both lead us to lay upon the altar of filial love the heart's best affection. None can realize the strength of filial love, until he leaves his home and mother, to wander in distant climes. Then often, as I do, he will turn back the page of life, to read the kindness beaming in the eyes and countenance of his absent parent. Though I continue to wander over the fields of this transitory globe in quest of wisdom, and hide my sadness from the world, I shall ever turn from my pursuit to think of thee, my mother. 'Twas but last night, in troubled dreams I saw thee, and joy lighted thy aged brow. I fancied the wanderer had returned to his home, fondly enjoying the bright smiles of an only parent. I knew my father and brother, and three sisters, had gone to God on high. But I found others that filled their places. The thought passed through the mind, and a deep melancholy brooded over me, and nature was fast yielding her charms, as a realizing sense was given, that one dearer than all others must follow. "Who shall restore the mother when she passes away and is seen no more."

SUSTAINING THE CAUSE.

What an impetus might be given to our cause, if every professed Universalist would cast in their mite in sustaining the nearest preacher to them—and as far as possible, attending on his ministrations during the coming year. Brethren, the "time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land." We have the promise of seed time and harvest, and the "Bow" has been set in the heavens, as a pledge that our earth shall be no more deluged by a flood. Miller's day of probation has passed, and we have no good reason to believe, that the material universe is to be destroyed. This is a good time to form new resolutions for the future, and put them into execution—to break off from bad habits, and form those which shall benefit ourselves and the community in which we reside. The preachers in your vicinity, would be much pleased with your presence in church—they need your countenance and support, and you would be wiser, better and happier for time to come. The cause which you profess to love would be greatly benefitted by this course, and you would show to those who differ from you in sentiment, that respect for Truth, which would win their respect for you, and the cause you have espoused. Whoso readeth let him understand. T. J. W.

THE WORLD AS IT IS.

BY MISS CELIA M. TIBBITS.

Reader hast thou ever known the world as it is? not astronomically, geologically, or physically, but morally? Hast ever heard of man, endowed with most noble and god-like capacities? of disinterested benevolence; unchanging friendship; deathless love, and a thousand other most beautiful fancies? Ay, very possibly heard of them; but hast ever met them? not in the pages of a novel, or a silly girl's dream of life; but in thy own, actual, everyday intercourse therewith? Ah, methinks I behold thee seated by thy quiet fire-side, with thy head resting upon thy hand, scanning most rigidly the annals of the past for an affirmative answer to my question. List to me, my good friend; thou hast not found them, nor wouldst, though ages should roll over thee, till thy years were like those of Methuselah, and thy hairs white as the blossoms of the almond tree. Dost start at the assertion? Yet 'tis even so. The world is a lie;—man, the noble, the gifted is, Oh how great a lie! Woman is a lie—the heavens stretched over us—the earth beneath us—the winds that blow around us, are all a lie. Hast ever listened to their tales in youth? did they not promise pleasure? Behold thee, friend, didst find it in after years? Hast ever loved—and felt that peace, happiness, ay life itself, depended upon some frail being, fickle as the ever changing wind? and didst not recover from the blighted hopes occasioned by her inconstancy, and love again, and again, with the same intensity!—Ah, was it not a lie? And lastly, friend, hast never met with those who talked of all the sacrifices they would make for thy advancement—and learned in the sequel 'twas their own interests, and not thine, they sought? Was't not a lie?

UTICA, FRIDAY, MAY 19, 1843.

ADAM'S IMMORTALITY.

The common opinion, that Adam and Eve were created with immortal constitutions for their earthly existence, is nowhere supported by Bible testimony. God created them male and female, and ordered them to be fruitful—to multiply and replenish the earth—thus plainly showing that their descendants might have room to live on the earth. For had none of mankind ever died, and had this command been obeyed, the earth would soon have become, or would yet become, over-run with inhabitants.

Is it urged that immortal beings need no food, and therefore my argument is unfounded? I admit that immortal beings do not need food; for there can be no waste or decay where there is no final dissolution—and on this ground, I argue that Adam was created mortal; for in Gen. i: 29, 30; God expressly declares that he created the herbs and fruits to be food for them. This implies that there were the elements of decay in their constitutions, so that if the waste had not been replenished by sustenance, they would have wasted away by famine, and died. And on this very fact, is based the command of God in Gen. ii: 16, 17—and the duty assigned to man, to dress, and till, and keep the garden.

Another proof that man was created mortal at the first, is found in the sentence pronounced on Adam.—He was to eat of the fruit of the ground in sorrow all the days of his life—implying that his natural life had a limit. Is it argued that his life was thus limited because he had sinned? I answer, Not so; for in Gen. iii: 19, it is expressly declared, that he should eat bread till he returned to the ground; and the reason given, is not, "for thou hast sinned;" but, "for out of it thou wast taken—for dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return." Hence, man is to return to dust, not because he had sinned, but because he was created of the dust—he is earthly by creation, and all that in him is earthly, must, of course, return to earth again.

I must also state my belief, in accordance with these arguments, that natural death, of itself, formed no part of the sentence pronounced on man. Natural death is made the limit of the sentence; but is no part of the sentence itself—"in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life"—here is the duration of the penalty. "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground"—here is the limitation of the penalty; and it agrees exactly with the duration of it.

I admit that transgression, and its consequences, by embittering existence, may shorten life, or violently terminate it; and, in this case, natural death becomes a portion of the penalty; but as may be seen, in the sentence pronounced on Adam, in the penalty named in Gen. ii: 16, 17, natural death is not the penalty of the command. So, also, is the common notion false that endless, or, (as it is called) eternal death is a part of the penalty. This is evident from the fact, that natural death is the limit of the penalty. This is evident from the fact, that natural death is the limit of the penalty—that natural life is its utmost duration.

I may also state my opinion that the fall of our first parents is figuratively described, and is emblematic of the fall of each of us from purity and happiness, into sin and misery. The serpent, I consider emblematic of the cause of temptation and sin—whatever that cause may be—and consider the common view of a war in the eternal heaven, the change of a perfectly holy angel of God into a personal immortal devil, and the devil's using the body of a toad, or a snake, as Milton represents, or of a monkey or orang outang as Dr. Adam Clarke declares, to be a mere poetic fiction, unsupported by Holy Writ, and having its origin only in the wisdom of this world. I have not time now to give my reasons in full, for these opinions—nor is it necessary; for no proof of such notions can be adduced that is not capable of a more easy, rational and Scriptural explanation; because whatever may be meant by the serpent, or the word devil, in the Bible, it will be destroyed, and cease to exist as a cause of sin. Heb. ii: 14. Suffice it then to say, that St. James declares most positively, that "every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lust and enticed. Then when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin; and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death"—the death named in our text. St. Paul also declares, "to be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace." And again—"The wages of sin is death." I am aware that this last passage is urged in proof that the wages of sin is "eternal death" in the immortal state, because it is contrasted with "eternal life." But as the phrase "eternal death" is not in the Bible, we regard it as an invention of man's wisdom, and not God's; and as the "eternal life" is to succeed, or follow after and terminate this death, it must, of course, be a death limited in duration.

And though the words, devil, satan, etc., are used in different senses to denote a deceiver, a false accuser, a slanderer, an adversary, yet the flesh, the works of the flesh, the carnal mind, the lusts and animal propensities are well personified by those terms, and the subtle serpent is a good emblem of them all.

What, then, is the meaning of God's commandment, and the nature of the penalty? "Of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." What says common sense, in view of the fact that a loss of innocence, and that guilt, remorse and shame are called death in the Bible?—in view, also, of the fact that our first parents did not die a natural death in the day they partook of that fruit?—in view, also, of the admission that Adam and Eve are not considered as being endlessly miserable? In view of all these things, I again ask, what does common sense understand of this passage of Holy Writ? What says the Bible itself, of the meaning of this passage? The context contains a detailed account of the feelings of the guilty pair—of God's examination of their conduct—of the sentence he pronounced upon them, the penalty of the law he inflicted on them—and of the duration, limitation, and nature of that penalty, and the reasons for inflicting it.—See Gen. iii: 7-20.

Here you have the whole law and penalty, as suffered by the guilty, as explained by the Lawgiver; as pronounced by the Judge, and as inflicted by the Executive. And what is there in it, about "death temporal, death spiritual and death eternal," declared by the wisdom of this world as the meaning of God? What is said about man's "falling under the wrath and curse of God, and becoming liable to all the miseries of this life, to death itself, and to the pains of hell forever?" My beloved friends, I beg of you not to become wise above what is written—not to depend on the commandments of men—but to adhere to God's own explanation of his meaning. Our first parents died a moral death in the very day of transgression—they died to innocence, purity, peace, and the enjoyment of God's favor and blessings. They were driven forth from the garden of peace and joy, and subjected to shame, remorse and the cares that attend conscious guilt.

But God did not curse them; but only the ground for their sake—God did not cease to hold communion with them—and God expressly limited their punishment and its consequences to the days of their mortal pilgrimage. "He remembereth our frame, that we are but dust," says the Psalmist.

We notice, then, that God's command and penalty embrace three special points—1. Death—death to innocence, and to that enjoyment of God's favor and blessings which innocence and obedience only can give.—2. Death in the day of transgression.—3. A certainty of death as great as that they have eaten of the forbidden fruit—"thou shalt surely die;" or, as the Hebrew has it, "thou shalt die—die"—or "dying thou shalt die"—an intensive form of expression in all primitive languages, denoting greatness, positiveness, or certainty.

BORROWED BOOKS.

I have loaned my books freely to persons asking for them—there are a few of my books that I have refused to lend to any one—but few persons indeed have ever been refused the loan of the remainder. But not as freely have they been returned in all cases. Some volumes have been out for years—I know not where. I have purchased a duplicate of some, and in some cases that, and even a third copy, has gone after the first, to return no more. In this way, I am deprived of more than a hundred volumes that cost me money, and which I now need. Can not some of them, at least, be regained? Must the total loss be added to the past privation? I hope that those who have borrowed books from me, will take the pains to look carefully over their book cases, &c., and to lay aside for an early return whatever volumes of mine they may thus discover in their possession. Carelessness in returning borrowed property can be excused—and thus far, I believe it is only carelessness;—but detain that property altogether from its owner, and the act becomes morally worse than carelessness. Will a word to the wise be sufficient?

STATE CONVENTION.

The undersigned Committee of the Universalist society of Cooperstown, hereby extend a cordial invitation to ministering brethren and friends to meet with them at the coming session of the New York State Convention of Universalists. Come, brethren—let there be a general attendance from all parts of the State, and we will have a rich repast of love, a pure Gospel feast. You will find us, as a society, united and prosperous, and glad of an opportunity to extend to our visiting friends, those rites of hospitality which should ever characterize Universalists.

Our brethren in the vicinity of New York city, by taking the boat for Albany, on Monday, may be in Cooperstown the next afternoon. Cooperstown is 22 miles from Fort Plain, (the nearest point to it on the Rail Road and Erie Canal,) and 38 miles from Utica. A stage leaves Fort Plain daily at noon; and Utica, daily, in the forenoon, (on the arrival of the cars East and West, at each place,) for this village. Extras can also be had at either place, on moderate terms if a full load can be made up.

Friends will please call, on their arrival, at the Universalist church, where the Committee will be in attendance to receive them.

W. H. WHISTON, JOSEPH BENNETT, SETH DOUBLEDAY, LEVI WOOD, JAMES I. PAUL, HARVEY CLARK, HOLDEN CORY, Committee.

Cooperstown, April 20th, 1843.

N. B.—There will probably be three daily trains of cars, and two daily packets, running East, and the same number West, by that time.

A. B. G.

The Central Association meets in Morrisville, Madison county, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday (7th and 8th) of June next. Each society will remember to select two lay delegates who will attend.

Without order,

A Conference of the Steuben Association will be held in South Dansville, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday (7th and 8th) of June next, at the Baptist Meetinghouse.

The Steuben Association will meet in annual session at Springwater, on the first Wednesday and Thursday (5th and 6th) of July next.

Our ministering brethren knowing our wants, will, I am sure, attend our meetings if practicable. Therefore, to them I repeat not the usual formality of invitation and request.—To our lay brethren, I should perhaps use a little more persuasion—especially to those within the limits of this body. Come up, then, brethren—let us hear from all, without reserve. Assist in our deliberations, that we may ascertain whether we shall stand or fall.

Those from a distance, who will attend the Conference, enquire for J. H. Stevens, J. Phelps, J. Goodno, J. Healy, where they will find feed for their horses, and something (not bread alone) for themselves. I am not acquainted at Springwater, therefore can give no directions. But I will venture to say, enquire for friends, and you will find them there.

A Conference of the Hudson River Association will be held at Braham's Corners, the second Wednesday and Thursday in June. Services will commence Wednesday morning, at half past 10 o'clock. An invitation is extended to the friends of the cause generally, and to all who can consistently be with us. The ministering brethren of the Association will of course feel it to be their duty to be present if they possibly can.

DEATHS.

In Sodus, Wayne county, April 28th, of consumption, Mrs. ELIZA, wife of Joseph Proseus, aged 38 years. During the protracted fanatical excitement, which was kept alive by Millerism, it was stated by ministers in the pulpit, and laymen in the streets, that Universalism would not do to die by, or go over Niagara Falls with; and that all Universalists renounced their belief on their death beds.—Fruitless attempts were made by a few officious persons to proscribe the deceased during her sickness. They told her that she must renounce Universalism if she wished to die in peace; and if she did not, she would be endlessly miserable. She said her faith had cheered her in the hours of sorrow and affliction, and she felt that it would enable her to triumph over the sting of death; and she could not give it up. Three hours before she died, she requested her husband to send after one or more of those, who tried to persuade her to give up her hope; that she might testify that Universalism was good in a dying hour; "and if I do not see them again," said she, "tell them that I found Universalism good to die by." Her husband told her that he could not send that evening, but would send early in the morning. "Then," said she, "it will be too late; for I shall be in heaven singing praises to God and the lamb, with the angelic hosts, before another day dawns upon this earth."—She requested her funeral sermon to be preached by a Universalist minister, and soon after fell asleep in the arms of her Saviour, like a confident child on the bosom of its mother. Br. N. Sawyer, of Wolcott, cheerfully obeyed the request, and tendered the consolations of the Gospel to the afflicted mourners and sympathising friends. We would tender our thanks, in behalf of the Universalists of Sodus, to the Episcopalians, for the liberality they exercised in opening their church for us on the above occasion. If any of those who have told that all Universalists renounce their faith on their death beds, should see the above, may they hereafter learn to tell the truth, and "go, and sin no more."

C. L. C.

In Perrinton, April 12th, of epidemic sore throat, Mrs. MARY BLANCHARD, (formerly the wife of Mr. Hanford, who fell in the struggles of the Revolutionary War,) aged 94 years. "Strange that a harp of a thousand strings should keep in tune so long," when millions of our kindred nature have fallen on her right hand and on her left. She was sick about three days, which closed up the scenes of time, and opened her way to a higher, holier, and happier world. She has left two sons to mourn and lament her death.

The old lady never united herself to any sect or denomination of professed Christians. She trusted alone in her dear Saviour, in whose arms she fell asleep to wake and rise to everlasting bliss. May God, our common Father, bless all the surviving friends of our kind and Christian mother.

S. MILES.

In Massena, Oct. 10th, 1842, LAURA, eldest daughter of Enos and Diana Beach, aged 8 years, 2 months and 4 days. She was truly a lovely child. Never has it been my lot during my short ministry, to meet with one so young, who seemed to possess the holy principles of religion so understandingly as she did. Often has my heart burned with inspiration of Heaven's love as I have conversed with her about her Sabbath School, and the things associated therewith.—But she is gone, and she is the third child which they have lost in a short time. Though they are often called to mourn, they mourn not as those without hope. In this hour of grief and affliction I led them in imagination, saying as they gazed upon her features still lovely in death,

Laura, round thy lips are blending
Smiles, though death his seat has set;
While around thy coffin bending
We in sorrow linger yet.

O! we loved thee much, but how soon
From thee, dear one, we're called to part;
But thy loved image ne'er can fade
So deeply shined within our heart.

Thy years on earth but few have been;
Yet lately pain thou too hast seen—
But freed at last from pain and sin,
Thou art with sisters welcomed in.

Thy body in the grave must sleep,
While we for Laura lonely weep;
But Emeline and Josephine
Thy soul now greets its home within.

Farewell! ye lovely girls, farewell—
With us you would no longer dwell;
Yet hope we there with you to tell
That Jesus hath done all things well.

S. W. SQUIRE,

[A number of obituary notices unavoidably crowded out—will appear next week.]

The following little poem from the pen of Lieut. PATTEN, entitled "The Seminole's Reply," struck my mind so forcibly, that I have been compelled to copy it for the gratification of such of the readers of the "Star," as admire such pieces. I admire it, especially, for the strength of the language-used, and the well sustained expression of the Indian's feelings of determined bravery, revenge, scorn, hate, defiance, etc. The piece is copied from the "American Magazine," for May, 1836—p. 313.—[Star in the West.

Blaze! with your serried columns,
I will not bend the knee!
The shackle ne'er again shall bind
The arm which now is free:
I've mail'd it with the thunder,
When the tempest muttered low:
And where it falls, ye well may dread
The lightning of its blow.

I've scared ye in the city,
I've scalped ye on the plain,
—Go, count your chosen where they fell
Beneath my leaden rain—
I scorn your proffered treaty,
The pale face I defy;
REVENGE is stamped upon my spear,
And "BLOOD!" my battle cry!

Some strike for hope of booty,
Some to defend their all—
I battle for the joy I have
To see the white man fall!
I love, among the wounded,
To hear his dying moan,
And catch, while chanting at his side,
The music of his groan!

Ye've trail'd me through the forest,
Ye've tracked me o'er the stream,
And, struggling through the everglade,
Your bristling bayonets gleam:
—But, I stand as should the warrior,
With his rifle and his spear:
The scalp of vengeance still is red,
And warns ye—"Come not here!"

Think ye to find my homestead?
I gave it to the fire:
My tawny household do you seek?
I am a childless sire.*
But should you crave life's nourishment,
Enough I have, and good:
I live on HATE—'tis all my bread,
Yet light is not my food.

I scorn ye with my bosom,
I scorn ye with mine eye—
And I'll taunt ye with my latest breath,
And fight ye till I die.
I ne'er will ask ye quarter,
And I ne'er will be your slave:
But I'll swim the sea of slaughter,
Till I sink beneath its wave.

* It will be remembered that many of the Seminoles killed their children; they being considered an incumbrance in the war.

Br. Grosh—As variety renders a paper more interesting to many readers, I have concluded to send you another extract from my diary, which I shall call

THE BAPTIST DEACON'S EXPERIENCE.

While I was teaching school in the State of Connecticut, and "boarding round," it happened to be my lot to spend the Sunday with a close communion Baptist deacon, by the name of Caleb D—. After the exercises of the morning were closed, he took a seat by my side, when the following conversation took place.

Caleb. There are a great many denominations in the world which will come short of heaven, without they repent and be baptized or immersed. The Bible says, "repent and be baptized." It does not say any thing about sprinkling. All those societies who do not baptize by immersion may as well join the Universalists, because they will all go to hell together. The Presbyterians perform the solemn mockery of sprinkling infants by way of baptism! They might as well go to a den of black snakes, take and baptize them, as to baptize infants; because infants are no more nor less than vipers.

Roland. How such sentiments would agonize the bosom of the fond mother, as she wipes the death damp from the brow of her dying child! Yes, they would touch a chord that would vibrate in the deepest recesses of her heart with intense misery, as she bends over, and imprints the last kiss on, the pallid cheek of her darling infant, ere the cold earth covers its lovely form forever from her sight. How very different such sentiments are from the opinion our Saviour expressed, or heaven must be a miserable place.

C. How so? Did not Jesus say, "ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?"

R. Our Saviour was addressing Pharisees and hypocrites then, and denouncing them for their self righteousness and hypocrisy, and showing them that they could not escape deserved punishment; which was fully verified by the calamities which afterwards befell them. The same threatening would be applicable at the present day, to those self righteous denominations, who think that all others who do not believe and perform as many ceremonies as they do, will go to the regions of endless despair. Jesus said, "suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

C. Hem!—Hem!—What book have you?

R. A Grammar.

C. I do not allow any other book but the Bible, or some religious book or tract, read in my house on Sunday. If you wish to read, here is Haynes' Sermon against Universalism. It may do you good; for I should judge by your quotations of Scripture, that you were inclined towards that damnable heresy. Before you commence reading it, I will relate my experience, that you may see what various means God employs to bring the sinner to repentance. I used to be a very wicked and mischievous young man.* Several years ago, while on my way to a protracted meeting, on a very cold day in the month of January, I caught a blue jay, and picked off all its feathers except from off its wings; I then let it go, and it flew up, towards heaven, crying, Caleb!—Caleb!—Caleb! It sounded my name so distinctly, that it produced conviction on my mind that I was a sinner. When I arrived at the meeting-house, the minister had just commenced his sermon, which was directed particularly to impenitent sinners. He was describing the situation of the damned in eternity. He pictured out hell in all its horrors. It appeared to me that I was standing on the very brink of hell, with its liquid and fiery billows rolling beneath my feet. It seemed as if I could hear the shrieks and wailings of damned souls as they gnashed their teeth and gnawed their tongues in bitter agony. I thought if God had dealt justly with me, I should have been in that direful abode long ago; but thanks be to God, his mercy interposed and snatched me, as it were, a brand from the burnings; for as soon as the minister invited sinners to come forward to the anxious seat, I went there, and got religion that very day, and went home rejoicing.

R. You did not love God, then, because he first loved you; and you were not led to repentance through the goodness of God, or because the kingdom of heaven was at hand. It appears that your conversion was all brought about through the fear of an endless hell.

C. There is more of your Universalism! Let me tell you, Sir, the love of God may be preached to all eternity to sinners, and then they would not repent.—The only way to bring sinners to repentance, is, to preach God Almighty's wrath, the endless misery of the damned, and their awful situation throughout a long and never ending eternity, if they do not flee from the wrath to come. I do not wish to have any more conversation with you till you have read that sermon. ROLAND.

Sodus, Wayne county, N. Y.

* "Thinks I to myself," you hold your own well, if I am permitted to judge you by your fruits. R.

A friend who would tell a falsehood, to exterminate your faults, is an enemy to himself, to you, to mankind and to God.

FOR YOUNG MEN AND YOUNG WOMEN.

We find the following excellent article in "The Offering," edited by the Factory Girls of Lowell, Mass. It breathes the right spirit—every mother and daughter, father and son, should read it. We would advise the beaux who are taking the preliminary steps for entering the married state, to cut it out and hand it to their intended. There is too much ignorant prejudice in certain circles of society, against honest labor—a prejudice which must be eradicated from the minds of intelligent people. Health, long life, and happiness are the companions of industry.—[Bradford Argus.

"From whence originated the idea that it was derogatory to a lady's dignity, or a blot upon the female character, to labor? and who was the first to say, sneeringly, 'O, she works for a living?' Surely, such ideas and expressions ought not to grow on republican soil. The time has been, when ladies of the first rank were accustomed to busy themselves in domestic employment. Homer tells us of princesses who used to draw water from the springs, and wash with their own hands the finest of the linen of their respective families. The famous Lucretia used to spin in the midst of her attendants; and the wife of Ulysses, after the siege of Troy, employed herself in weaving until her husband returned to Ithaca. And in later times, the wife of George III, of England, has been represented as spending an evening in hemming pocket handkerchiefs, while her daughter Mary sat in a corner, darning stockings. Few American fortunes will support a woman who is above the calls of her family; and a man choosing a companion to jog with him through all the up hills of life, would sooner choose one who had to work for a living, than one who thought it beneath her to soil her pretty hands with manual labor, though she possessed her thousands. To be able to earn one's living by laboring with her own hands, should be reckoned among female accomplishments; and I hope the time is not far distant when none of my country women will be ashamed to have it known that they are better versed in usefulness, than they are in mental accomplishments."

CARE OF THE HUMAN FIGURE DURING INFANCY.

The beauty of the human figure depends essentially on skilful and careful nursing during infancy. At this delicate period, the bones are soft and the joints easily displaced; and therefore, deformities and dislocations are frequently occasioned, for which no subsequent care or skill can offer any remedy. In passing along the streets, how continually is the eye offended and the heart pained at the contemplation of objects whose life is rendered miserable by the unpardonable carelessness, or even wanton cruelty of nurses? How often does it happen that accidents, which immediate surgical skill might have remedied, are kept secret from parents, merely to screen some domestic from well deserved censure, until they assume a character in which all knowledge is quite unavailing for the purposes of cure? Care is necessary to guard limbs and vertebrae against heedless and unnatural exertion; as the body may easily (if not actually humped) be stunted and dwarfed in its full growth, and limbs misshaped and weakened by too much walking or standing before the bones become sufficiently hardened and consolidated to endure pressure. Whenever fatigue is produced either to the infant or the nurse, no more rational or beneficial plan can be adopted than the Indian fashion of laying the child on the mat or on the floor, where it may roll about at pleasure, bringing all the muscles and joints into healthful and natural action.

CONFERENCE AT WEST CAMBRIDGE.

This interesting meeting was holden on the 2d inst., in the new and beautiful Universalist Meetinghouse at West Cambridge. The day was clear, and there was but one circumstance to mar the joy of the occasion, viz., the sickness of Br. Waldo, the resident pastor, who was too unwell to leave his house through the day. The services consequently were led by Father Ballou, who a little before 11 o'clock opened the meeting. He referred to the sickness of Br. Waldo, which he said had been painful and apparently dangerous; but he was convalescent, and he entertained the hope, that he might be present in the afternoon; [a hope, however, which was not gratified.] Br. Waldo had requested him (Father Ballou) to welcome the friends to West Cambridge, and to wish them a joyful meeting. He then read the 55th chapter of Isaiah, after which the hymn commencing, "When sinners quit their wicked ways," was sung by the congregation. Br. Fay, of Roxbury, addressed the throne of grace in solemn and devout supplication. Father Ballou called the attention of the brethren to the particular design of this meeting. It was free to all, young and old, rich and poor; all had liberty to speak; it was free to all sects; he wished all to feel at home. The laymen were specially invited to take part in the meeting;—and they must not seek to make great speeches; but to speak out, without ornament and without restraint, words of Christian experience, exhortation and love. After singing, Br. Whittemore, of Cambridgeport, addressed the meeting, referring to the exhortation of Br. Streeter at the late meeting in Roxbury, that we should all come prepared to speak, that there might be no delay. He proceeded to speak of the history of Universalism in West Cambridge. He remembered the state of the cause there twenty-one years ago, when he used to preach each alternate Sabbath in an obscure hall. After many years of indifference, the brethren here had come forward to the enjoyment of their high privileges, and were now in a truly prosperous state. They have shown what a few men can do, when moved with zeal and love. From these circumstances he proceeded to a series of profitable moral reflections. After him, Br. Cunningham, layman, of Boston, arose, and showed that the influence of the Gospel was to wean us from the world,—to convince us that while we remain in this world we are not at home, but are pilgrims and sojourners. Our home is beyond the tomb. There dwells the Father that loves us, and nothing can separate us from his love, neither death, nor life, nor principalities, etc., etc. Although so young, he had seen much sickness, and he knew the value of religion in times of sorrow. He commended it to the young with deep feeling.

After Br. Cunningham, Br. Adams, of Malden, took the floor. He came to enjoy a lively, profitable, elevating occasion. He wanted heart to meet heart, and soul to meet soul. He made an allusion to the chapter read at the beginning of the service, especially the 10th and 11th verses, in which the prophet compares the word of God to the snow and rain. He thought the comparison beautiful.—What do we learn from the rain? 1st. God's impartiality. 2d. The rain is beyond the reach of human control. Man sometimes murmurs at the scantiness and sometimes at the profusion. But God's ways are best. Just so with God's doctrine. It is above human control. In Christ's day, God had his own way in the establishment of his truth upon the earth. 3d. God has a definite object in sending the rain—to fertilize the earth. So with his doctrine. He sends it to fertilize the barren mind. The grace of God is rich and full; and when poured out upon the heart, produces the happiest effects.

The dews and rains in all their store,
Drenching the pastures o'er and o'er,
Are not so copious as that grace,
Which, sanctifying, saves our race.

Have you faith in this doctrine? If so, what shall you do? Will you wait for God to do every thing? No, you must do something. Look around, and see the farmers all at work. God gives them the sunshine and rain, but still they must work, or they can reap no good harvest. So in regard to spiritual things—we must make use of the means of grace, or we can derive no spiritual advantage.

Br. Fay, of Roxbury, had been thinking particularly of the remarks of Br. Adams. He had been thinking too of the first verse of the chapter. The broad invitation, and the freeness with which all might come, and buy wine and milk without money and without price. The farmer does not purchase the rains and dews; still without them he could have no harvest; and thus we see that our greatest blessings are free—altogether so,—without money and without price. Just so with the Gospel, it is free. If we thought of these things as we ought, we certainly should feel gratitude. How often the farmers forget what great blessings the sun and rain are. Are we not also forgetful of our spiritual blessings? God has given us spiritual powers, free, unasked; these are capacities from which we derive much happiness. It is a great blessing, that our highest happiness is consistent with the most faithful discharge of our duty. The speaker's whole object was to show that all our greatest blessings are free. Let us awake and enjoy these blessings. If we would do this, ten thousand sources of joy would be ours, which we now do not know. If the worst man in existence could see God as he is, he would love him.

Br. Allen, a young layman, from Waltham, said he was much interested in this meeting. He thought there was no need of being afraid of each other.—There is such a vast difference between ourselves and our Creator, that all smaller distinctions are lost. This idea was referred to and farther carried out by Br. Whittemore of Cambridgeport, and Willis, of South Reading. The latter closed by saying, that God was indeed above us, infinitely so; yet we are not neglected by him. Take the microscope and look at the myriads of beings we can not discover with the naked eye; none of them are neglected; not the least is forgotten. Take also the spiritual telescope—faith. O look and see what glorious scenes arise to view. After Br. Willis had closed his interesting address, we sung the hymn, "Sweet the moments rich in blessing," and closed the forenoon service.

AFTERNOON.

The services were commenced by singing the hymn,

"Happy is he whose early years, Receive instruction well," &c.

Br. J. G. Adams, took the lead in prayer, after which, Br. Partridge, of Watertown, spoke, and gave an account of the rise and excellent effect of the Conference Meetings in Providence, R. I., at the time he was a lay member there;—and endeavored to impress upon the audience the excellent effect of Conference Meetings in general. After singing the verse,

The sorrows of the mind
Be banished from this place, &c.

Br. Waite responded to the sentiment. Do Universalists realize the advantages they have over all others in regard to the sorrows of the mind? Is there any thing in pure religion to destroy our peace? The Psalmist said concerning Jehovah, "My meditation of him shall be sweet;" and he proceeded to show, that with correct views of the divine character, meditation is always pleasant.—Br. Cunningham (layman,) said he had a desire to commend religion to the young. It was true as the poet said, "Religion should our thoughts engage,

Amid our youthful bloom,
'Twill fit us for declining age,
'Twill fit us for the tomb.

"She guides the young with innocence,
In pleasure's path to tread,
A crown of glory she bestows
Upon the hoary head."

He illustrated the truth of his positions, by a reference to his experience as a young man.

Br. Sherman took up the theme of the morning again, and spoke of the Gospel as compared to snow and rain. He referred to Paul's admonition, "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom; teaching and admonishing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord." This, he said, was our duty. Remember the language of the prophet,—"Then shall ye go forth in peace." The mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing. Is there any doctrine that will give peace like that of the world's salvation? When Br. Adams spoke, he referred to the rains and dews. We read of a little cloud about the bigness of a man's hand. Murray saw it. So it was seen in Elijah's day. It gave great joy to those who saw it. There is a little cloud now in this region, giving signs of abundant rain.

Br. Whittemore, of Cambridgeport, addressed the meeting on the testimony which had been given by old and young this day to the excellence of religion. The youth had spoken, and given us the experience of youth; and the aged, who embraced religion in youth, and who had tried it both in youth and old age, had also spoken. And what did they say? It is good for all, in every season of life; in sorrow and in joy. He here dwelt at some length on the excellence of religion; on its complete adaptation to meet all the spiritual wants of man, to guard him in danger, to fortify him against temptation, and lead him onward in the way of virtue.

Father Ballou, having been referred to by the last speaker, arose and made reference to his early life. He had professedly lived a religious life from his youth; and when he looked back upon it, all he had to regret was his omissions and short comings. He never had been sorry that he had made the religion of Jesus his guide; but he was sorry he had come so far short of living agreeably to its injunctions. In his youth, he was a Baptist, and a member of a Baptist church; and he had one thing then which he had endeavored to cherish ever since.—What was it? It was love to God, love to Christ, and love to all men. His love of Christ made him love all men; and his love of all men prepared him to embrace Universalism. Now, as to encouraging youth to embrace religion—it was right; he wished ever to do it. Suppose a large company had agreed to set out on a journey from New England to the far West. To the place whither they are bound, there is an open highway, a delightful road, lovely and pleasant, roses blooming on either hand. Shall we say, we will not go into the road now; we will wander along the crags and steep places, we will ford the rivers, and wade through the bogs; and seek to penetrate impervious swamps; this course will be the best for the present; but we will be sure to get into this good road by and bye, just before we come to the journey's end? Would this be wise? No. Travel always in that way which is pleasant, and in that path which is peace.

Come into the good road now. The spirit saith unto us, to-day is the time. A day lost is lost for eternity. That day can never be regained. Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation. Pursue wisdom, give your heart wholly to it, and you shall be happy all the journey through.

At this point, Br. Fay, of Roxbury, arose, and said, our blessed doctrine teaches that at last all shall be reconciled to God and made holy and happy in his presence forever: and when I reflect, said he, on the ways and means Providence has appointed to bring this about, it seems to me Universalism contains the means of producing that result. It contains the spirit of love, and by that spirit all must be touched, before they can be converted.—He once had some misgiving in regard to Conference Meetings; but having given more thought to the subject, he now believes them beneficial, inasmuch as they promote Christian union. The great difficulty in the way of Christian union is the difference of opinions among the different sections of the church. Such things have much force. We must endeavor to get down to the great platform of Christian love; not love to a sect, but love to all sects. Social meetings are the means in the hands of God of bringing Christians together. Let us send our invitations to others; they will come in by and bye. The disciples said to their Master,—“Thou hast the words of eternal life.” There was an affinity between their desires and the doctrine of God. All men have the same moral wants; and different sects may therefore meet and dwell on those great moral truths which are so deeply needed by all.

Br. J. G. Adams followed. He had been deeply moved by what the youthful and the aged have said this day. Let us take their words into our souls. He rose principally to speak of the power of the sentiments we hold. We even are not aware of it,—we do not see it. What shall we do? Talk well? tell what a good meeting we have had? what raptures? We must do more than this. Every one must see to it that he is right; that his state is what it should be; he must apply the Gospel to his heart. Every individual must do this.

Br. Whittemore, of Cambridgeport, carried out more fully this principle of individuality; and after him, Br. Eaton, of Waltham, arose. He could not, he said, sit still any longer, and therefore he was not to be blamed for getting up. He loved the cause of Christ; we do not yet see the whole glory of it. We see now in part. One Br. had said, we only had one eye open. But remember, we see through a glass darkly; and if we look through such a medium with one eye only open, our sight must be dim indeed. But the comparison is made, between our poor perverted vision in this world, and the perfect sight of eternity. If seeing now only in part we behold so much glory, O what will it be, when we see without a cloud, face to face. He had been recently to see Christ preaching to the multitude, and also to see him on the cross; the blood trickling from his hands, and feet, and side. O it was an impressive scene; but it was a mere representation in wax. He silently prayed to his God while viewing that scene, that he might be more like his Master. He wanted to see Christ nearer. But there is something better even than that, viz., to see Jesus in our lives. We should seek to be like Christ; we should seek to serve God. The Christian looks first for the praise of God; but the worldly man looks first for the praise of men. This, he said, was having both eyes closed.

Br. H. Ballou, 2d, next took the floor. There had a series of thoughts passed through his mind as others spoke, which he was afraid he should not bring properly together. It had been insisted upon by all, that there was a great moral power in Universalism. It was this, love to God and love to man. We are in the habit of expatiating on this topic; but we know but little of the matter. Did it ever strike us, that the only power in the universe is love? i. e., the only permanent power. God is love, and he is all the power in the universe. Jesus Christ is the power of God, and the wisdom of God. Do we want to see the power of God? look at Jesus, gasping on the cross; there is God's omnipotence.

This is not deception, but solid truth. In the eyes of man, when Jesus prayed, “Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do,” there was but slight exhibition of power; but omnipotence was then at work. The enemies of Christ thought that hour to be the expiring hour of Christianity; but Christianity did not then die. The power of God has worked; and Christianity is spread over half the globe.

Bring this down now into the sphere in which we act. How little we think of the power of love! We are apt to think we can do more with fear, in driving men from sin; but this is wrong. Where love has been tried, it has been efficacious. He referred to the Washingtonian reform, as an exhibition of the power of love. It was once believed that the confirmed drunkard could not be saved; he must, it was thought, be given over to destruction. They had tried terror upon him, and produced no effect. As soon as love was applied, it was seen to be the power of God. This is fully proved by the operations of the prison discipline societies. Even the worst of criminals are moved by the power of love. He referred to the experience of Howard; and more especially to that of Mrs. Fry, of London, whose labors in Newgate prison produced surprising effects. She used only gentleness and love; and she performed literally miracles in the way of regeneration. All religion should be based on love.

After Br. Ballou, Br. Usher spoke; but our attention being taken up at the time in the selection of a hymn, we were able to get but few notes of his address. At the conclusion, the tune Ganges was sung with the hymn of Newton, with great effect. Rarely have we ever heard any thing sung better. The Second Book of Conference Hymns was used. The Orthodox clergyman of the town was present, and gave devout attention to all that was done; but he took no active participation in the services. We ought to observe, that all the services were interspersed, in the customary way, with singing, and were opened and closed with prayer.

EVENING.

The exercises commenced by singing the hymn,

“Had I the tongues of Greeks and Jews.”

Prayer was offered by Br. T. Whittemore. Father Ballou repeated what he had said in the morning, and invited all to participate. He spoke of our following Christ. Many were desirous to witness the scenes of the Saviour's ministry—to behold the brook Kedron, to ascend Olivet. It would be pleasant and exciting, as we looked on those scenes, to know, that Jesus walked in them. But there is something far more important; and that is to follow Christ in his holy walk in life. Walk with him in the valley of humility; follow him in the paths of wisdom; remember that these are the paths in which he walked;—and then we shall have Jesus present with us. Let us endeavor to love like him; for love is the essence of all pure religion.

Br. Cunningham, (layman,) spoke on Christ's going about doing good; showing that active benevolence was the distinguishing trait in the Saviour's life.

Br. Sweetser, (layman,) of South Reading, spoke. He pointed out the contrast there was, between the spirit that reigned in this meeting, and the spirit which prevails generally in the world.—O what scenes of contention, ambition, cruelty and wrong we see. What a grand object is it to meet together to cultivate the good spirit as we do here. He recommended prayer as a means of grace and improvement, and spoke of his own experience in this particular.

Br. Waite said there were two ways of determining what is good; one is our reason, and the other our feelings. He gave rather a preference to the latter. He went on to speak of taste as a criterion. The Psalmist says, “O taste and see that the Lord is good.” The moral appetite is at times depraved,—but when the tone is good, and the appetite right, the Gospel is sweet. Present the true Gospel to a person in such a state, and is it not good?

Let both preachers and hearers take the hint from this. He spoke also of the benefits of partaking of Gospel food.

Br. Partridge referred to the fact, that Gospel food could never waste. It was like the meal in the house of the woman of Zarephath, who fed the prophet Elijah,—it could not be consumed. He spoke also in favor of prayer. Prayer, he said, would make us cease sinning, or else sinning would make us cease praying. He gave illustrations of the benefit of prayer. We then sung that truly appropriate hymn, “What various hindrances we meet,

In coming to a mercy seat,
Yet who that knows the worth of pray'r,
But wishes to be often there.”

“Prayer makes the darkened cloud withdraw,
Prayer climbs the ladder Jacob saw,
Gives exercise to faith and love,
Brings ev'ry blessing from above.”

Br. Sherman said he had been thinking that God had a great demand upon us for the many blessings we have enjoyed. “We are a happy people; we have many privileges; we enjoy great prosperity; for all this God has a demand upon us. We ought to be grateful that we have this opportunity of Christian improvement. What have we come here for? To do good. In the places where these Conferences have been holden, people have been converted. Let it be so here. Shall we not have a heaven here below?”

Br. Stevenson repeated the question asked by the last Br. Now, said he, “will we serve the Lord?” “Will we break off our sins?” Let us form good resolutions and live up to them. It will not do to trust too much to mere feeling—we must be governed by enlightened reason and the word of God.

Br. Willis, of South Reading, spoke further on the subject of prayer; and illustrated the benefit of it by an incident that occurred to certain travellers in the Western country.

Br. Usher, of East Lexington, followed on the same theme. All who believed in God and in Christ, must be persuaded of the importance of prayer. He spoke of the Lord's prayer, and the sentiments it contained. Jesus also enjoined it upon us to pray for our enemies. If we pray for them, shall we not love them?

Br. J. G. Adams desired to speak a few words on prayer and a few on love. The object of prayer is, to lead us to live quiet and peaceable lives in all godliness and honesty. There is too much indifference in this matter.

“Restraining prayer, we cease to fight;
Prayer makes the Christian's armour bright;
And Satan trembles when he sees,
The weakest saint upon his knees.”

We want praying Christians, and then we shall have no dead, dull meetings. Why should men neglect prayer? Some think they can not pray, because they have not the gift of speech.

“Have you no words? ah! think again,
Words flow apace, when you complain,
And fill your fellow creature's ear
With the sad tale of all your care.”

“Were half the breath thus vainly spent,
To heav'n in supplication sent,
Your cheerful song would oft'ner be,
Hear what the Lord has done for me.”

He spoke also of love. Love is the greatest of all the Christian graces, or fruits—sweeter than faith, or hope. Without it, the Christian is nothing.

Father Ballou followed on the subject of prayer. His words were words of deep admonition. We must, he said, cultivate a praying spirit. We must pray without ceasing. We must not offer a vocal prayer at a particular time, and then go away and forget all about it; but we must live constantly in a sense of our dependence upon God, feeling grateful for all his mercies, and desirous to do his will.

Br. J. H. Willis related a thrilling incident that he witnessed, and that illustrated the power of the Gospel over the youthful mind to give comfort in the hour of death. It being now somewhat passed nine o'clock, it was thought proper to bring the meeting to a close; which was done by a very appropriate prayer from Br. Hosea Ballou, 2d.

This meeting at West Cambridge was a good meeting. It was largely attended, especially in the afternoon and evening. At the last service, the venerable Mr. Damon, pastor of the Unitarian Society, was present, and his son, also a clergyman of the same faith. They made no address; but the elder was pleased to express his approbation after the benediction, and to observe that he had spoken, it would have been only to approve in the main the sentiments that had been advanced. There were three applications for the next meeting, viz., one from Woburn, one from Waltham, and one from South Reading. The preference was given to Woburn, because it was thought the meeting was most needed there; and in all probability it will subsequently go to Waltham and South Reading. We opine, that the meeting at South Reading will be a peculiarly interesting one—we hope it will be equally so at the other two places. It was at first thought the next meeting would not be holden under a month; but so long a delay was not consented to; and let it be remembered, that the next Conference will be holden at Woburn, on Tuesday next, May 16th, commencing at half past 10 o'clock, A. M.

IDENTITY IN HEAVEN.

BY REV. Z. BAKER.

Man is an inquisitive as well as curious being; he is ever prying into or desirous of knowing the future. Such desires are accordant with his nature. "If a man die, shall he live again?" is a very natural query. Nor is the mere fact of another life sufficient. The condition and circumstances of that existence are matters of thought and deep emotion to many anxious souls. The ties of nature, the "one blood" relation, being very strong, induce anxious inquiries in regard to the welfare of departed spirits. When a friend leaves us, the first and most natural question is, whither has he gone? Is it a healthy country? Will he find friends with whom he can associate—in whom he can confide? If we can assure ourselves that enjoyment will be the lot of our departing friends, we become reconciled to their departure; but if otherwise, nothing will pacify the soul; an irresistible fate may fix his poisonous fangs upon the heart, and shroud the soul in black despair too deep to be washed by tears, but hope anchors not that soul, nor will her frail bark find a haven in such views.

Grave questions have been raised touching our future life, and among the more important may be classed our identity. Some have argued, or tried to argue, that we shall not know each other in heaven—no, nor even ourselves. It is supposed we forget all the past, and enter upon an entirely new existence. But how are we ever to know that it is ourselves that exist in the new state, if we are totally unconscious of having ever lived? How shall we praise God for forgiveness of sins we are not conscious of having ever committed?

It does appear, if there is a heaven for us mortals, in which we are permitted to hope through a faith in the Gospel of our salvation, then, there we must be conscious of our identity, else we no more exist there than if there were no heaven. It is through consciousness that we recognize ourselves here, from some body else of like form and feature. If we do not recognize ourselves in heaven, salvation is a delusion—heaven less than an idle dream. If we recognize ourselves, we may know others known to us here. Abraham, David, Isaiah, in short, all will "know even as they are known."

Some are fearful that a recollection of all that has transpired of our lives here, will so much mar the serenity of heaven as to militate against, if not destroy, all enjoyment. This is a groundless fear or assumption, forgetful alike of divine forgiveness and redeeming love. The thought or reflection of evil doing enhances every emotion of the redeemed soul. A forgiven sinner is, at the Lord's table, received and treated as though he had never sinned. Every remembrance of his evil acts is no more named; and all are placed upon equal footing in the presence of the divine Father. Therefore the sinner feels that all his debts are swallowed up or cancelled in the book of God's remembrance, and guilt ceases to corrode the mind, and praise and thanksgiving fill the whole soul. It is a false theory that accords to sin a power to eternally paralyze the affections. Man is proved to be as capable of love after profligacy, as before. Who knows but the talent of a Hawkins is to be found in that inebriate who is now vainly trying to raise himself from the filthy gutter? Who can tell but that same being that is to-day uttering the most cruel and bitter imprecations, may to-morrow praise God and invoke the richest of Heaven's blessings upon the now devoted victim?

If correct views of forgiveness and divine love were more prevalent, men would not be so reluctant to admit a perfect identity in the immortal world. It is so perfectly obvious that, in so far as the forgiveness and the salvation of the Gospel is concerned with us here, we are rendered the more happy by a conscious identity: it would seem no one would dream of the same cause producing misery in the immortal world, where God is better known and redeeming love the theme of the great song of the Universal Heart.

So far as this subject has engaged my thoughts, I must say I can see no reasonable objection to a full and perfect identity; the preponderance of argument is so entirely upon this side of the question. Heaven is but carrying out and perfecting our destiny. The mind is but partially developed here; those ennobling powers and faculties, God has given to man, are seen here only in their embryo state. This life is a beginning, but not an end of man; and this beginning, making part of the whole, must be connected to form that whole. But certain it is, there is no connexion if this life, sinful though it be, is forgotten in the next! What individual, personal comfort can there be in the idea, that somebody will live somewhere else than here, in the full enjoyment of angelic powers, providing we can not assure ourselves that that somebody is our identical self. Such a doctrine is too visionary to merit attention on its own account. It is for the adherents or votaries of such notions, that these few thoughts have been penned.

There is ample scope in every department of divine providence, for the full and free exercise of reason; and may we not hope this divine attribute in man will have a more full and perfect control of the mind? Does not it teach us, our destiny is in God as conscious beings?

ELDER KNAPP'S RETRACTION ENDORSED.

It will be remembered that in Elder Knapp's retraction in reference to the bold and gross public declamation against Mrs. Handy, of this city, he implicated another individual. He says that the "statement" made by him "at a public religious meeting, from the pulpit," was made "on information received from another person." We stated that that person was a Baptist clergyman of this city, and his name may now be given—Rev. T. C. Jameson. The friends of Mrs. H. and the public papers demanded an honorable retraction from him, and she was perfectly just to herself and family in insisting upon his giving a written document testifying the falsity of any "information" on which any statement such as Elder Knapp made could be made. Mr. Jameson was informed by Mrs. H.'s legal adviser, that a complaint had been legally lodged against him, and asked his attention to it. He subsequently called on Mrs. H. and very freely declared that he knew nothing against her character, and that he simply remarked to "Br. Knapp" that he understood she was an excluded member from an Evangelical Church, because, as he supposed, she had become a Universalist. This was all he said, and did not dream that Br. Knapp would use it in the pulpit. He was unwilling to give a written statement to that effect, because the Universalists would use it against Br. Knapp, and it would "injure the cause of Christ!" He was very earnest in this matter, and declared he would suffer martyrdom before he would do any thing more than say what he then had said. But what is a Baptist minister's say as a retraction of a libel on a Universalist? Who among our opponents would believe the report? And how easy it is to qualify such a say as one pleases afterwards. The writing, therefore, was insisted upon, calmly and courteously. At last he was respectfully informed that the law must take its course unless he should give the required document previous to the first day of May. The next day after the transmission of the note, an answer was received from him. The following is a true copy:

Providence, April 27th, 1843.

To Mrs. S. A. Handy:

Madam—Your note was received last evening. In reply I can only repeat what I have frequently told you—that I have never known or said ought that in the least impeaches your moral character.

Having incidentally stated to Br. Knapp that you had been excluded from an Evangelical church, (because, as I supposed, you had changed your religious opinions,) as soon as I had learned that I had been led into a mistake, I promptly informed him and cheerfully on several public occasions corrected the impression which had gone abroad. I see no other reparation in my power to make.

Respectfully yours, T. C. JAMESON.

To Mrs. S. A. Handy, Providence, R. I.

This certainly does not place Elder Knapp in a very enviable light, and we do not believe that "the cause of Christ" will be injured by telling the truth respecting him, however the cause of Baptist proselytism may suffer. It will be noticed that Mr. Jameson certifies that he incidentally stated to the Elder that Mrs. H. "had been excluded from an Evangelical Church, because, as he supposed, she had changed her religious opinions." This is what the Elder styles information on which he made the gross and libellous statement which he did make "at a public religious meeting, from the pulpit!" It certainly shows very plainly, how a slight incidental remark in reference to a Universalist, will fire the Elder's imagination, and make "something as black as a crow" to be a real flock of terrible black crows!

We are pleased with the emphasis of Mr. Jameson's testimony that a person's moral character may be above reproach, although a change of religious opinions may have taken place to the conversion of a Baptist to a Universalist. We regret that he did not give this writing some time since, but the whole case is an illustration of the defective morality of Partialism, and that in order to produce a just result, judgment must be brought near. We nail the whole with the Scripture—Prov. xxv: 8—"Go not forth hastily to strive, lest thou know not what to do in the end thereof, when thy neighbor hath put thee to shame."—Gos. Mess.

"THE EXPOSITOR."

As the brethren who last conducted the Expositor have failed to continue it for five years, as they proposed, the work, of course, falls back into the hands of the original proprietors of fifty shares, and as one who had two of those shares, and being extremely anxious to see the work revived, I propose that the publication of it be resumed on the following plan.

Let there be fifty shares, as before—every person who takes a share bind himself to one fiftieth of the pecuniary responsibility of carrying the work through ten successive years—if the sale of the work should not meet the expense of publication, let the deficiency be made up by an equal tax on the shares.

As a help to start the work, five dollars should be paid upon each share—in advance. Br. Ballou, 2d, should be engaged as Editor, as heretofore. I will take two shares upon the above plan. I know of many more who would do the same. Let their names be sent to some of our newspaper offices, as soon as convenient, that it may be known who will engage in the enterprise. We hope the Expositor will be revived forthwith.

Universalist Editors by copying the above will oblige

A GOOD NAME.....NO. V.

"A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches, and loving favor rather than silver and gold."—SOLOMON.

The subject which, in the preceding numbers, we have been considering, appeals to the young as one of great importance to their earthly welfare. I have read somewhere, substantially, that in the commerce of life a good character is essential to significant and ultimate success. To those who are to make their own way either to wealth or honor, a good reputation, resting on virtue as its basis, is as necessary as address and ability. Though human nature is often degenerate, and corrupts itself by many inventions, yet it usually retains to the last an esteem for excellence. "Bad as the world is, respect is always paid to virtue." But if it were possible for us ever to arrive at such an extreme degree of depravity as to lose our native reverence for virtue, still a regard for our own interests and safety, will lead us to apply for aid in all important transactions, to men whose integrity is unimpeached. When men choose an assistant or partner, their first inquiry is concerning character. When they have occasion for a counsellor or physician, whatever themselves may be, they always choose to trust their property and their lives to men of the best character. When they fix on a tradesman who is to supply them with the necessities of life, they are influenced by fair reputation and honorable dealing.

The young therefore, whose characters are unfix'd as they are untarnished, and who, consequently, may build them up a reputation just such as they like, ought to pay the utmost attention to the first steps they take on entrance into life. But, alas, such is not even generally the case! Usually they are too careless and inattentive to such matters. Elate with youth's illusive hope, they strike out their plans and pursue them with ardor, but neglecting the opinions that others entertain of them; and not infrequently is it the case, that by some thoughtless action, they suffer a mark to be imprinted on their character which no subsequent merit will entirely erase. By the invidious it will now and then, be pointed out to them in after life, and the tell-tale blush will reveal their feelings.—Every individual will meet with some mean spirits, who, though they are not always professed enemies, yet regard him with jealous feelings; and who will exult in reviving any tale that will stir up hated recollections and excite injurious prejudice.

But if these indiscreet steps are not taken, these consequences will be avoided. But they are often taken; and even more perilous ones, which are followed by more lasting evil consequences, sometimes darken the page of the history of the young.

Look at that young man yonder, jeered and scorned by all who know him. Why is it thus? But a few days ago and he was the innocent and loved child, playing the sunny hours away around the hearth-stone of "sweet home"—listening to the hallowed accents of a mother's song as she strives to gladden his little heart; or to the soberer instructions of a father, teaching him wisdom's ways and the blessedness of its peace. But little time has stolen away since he was moving in respectable circles, beloved, gay and happy. Then he lifted up his head and was proud; then he commanded attention and had influence; then, indeed, by some he was even envied for the high social station he was reaching, and the growing popular influence by which he was lifting himself up. But look at him now, the scorned, the despised! ah, how changed his fortune. Those eyes that once beamed kindness and affection, now look daggers that shiver contempt. And the hand that used, but little while ago, to give his the hearty shake, is now coldly and even exultingly withheld. No longer is he admitted to the social circle where he used to charm with his grace, or captivate with his conversation. Piteable man!—but why is he thus? A brief tale his. He listened to the syren of vice—he gambled—became inebriate—committed crime—and has just returned from paying the penalty of his dark deed within the cold prison walls. And what, think you, reader, he would not now give for the "good name" which once was his—that gave him admittance to the world's favor and enabled him to bask in its smiles? Ah, it were worth more to him "than great riches, and loving favor than silver and gold."

But look again, and see that female, neglected and passed by. It was not always so. Once she was the brightest ornament of a delightful and happy home. She was beautiful; possessed a warm heart, and was admired and praised. A large circle sought her company as the most agreeable pastime. She lived in a world of action and excitement. But how altered now!—her head droops; her eye is sunk and set in sadness; the bright hue of her cheek has faded into paleness; melancholy is written on her brow; and floods of seething tears have left the sad traces of their deeds on her countenance. For her, her father has wept, and her mother is broken-hearted. Forsaken, she sits in solitude and wears out the slow drudging hours of a cheerless life.

And how brief the history of the cause of all her woe. She listened to the deceiver's song—she stepped aside from virtue, and her "good name" vanished from her grasp; and by an unrighteous custom of society, she is doomed to life-lasting disgrace and perpetual exclusion from the social world. Go ask her the wealth there is in "a good name;" and would she not tell you amid gushing tears, that "a good name is rather to be chosen than great riches, and loving favor rather than silver and gold"?

As, then, we love our own welfare, let us who are young, see to it that our ways are ordered aright; that we resist every temptation; that by a virtuous course of conduct, we secure and preserve that which is above all price, a spotless reputation.

But I must bring these articles to a close; and in fine, I would say that this subject of reputation appeals to all.

If what I have said be true, that "a good name" is the result of strictly virtuous conduct and right moral feelings, then it is incompatible with vice in any form. No intemperate man can long wear this crown of glory; "a good name" is virtue's reward, but virtue never revels at the intoxicating bowl. It does not agree with a lying or tattling tongue; they are both mischief-makers; they stir up strifes and dissensions. Not so virtue; she is a lover of truth and maker of peace. Neither does a good name consist with profanity. Profanity is no flower that blooms in the garden of moral beauty. It bears no kin to virtue; for virtue never swears. Virtue is too pure, too holy, too god-like to stoop to profanity. A true "good name" is the crown of glory which virtue bestows, but profanity is not a gem that glitters there.

I ask you to pause, readers, and think of the station you hold in the universe of being, and I beseech you not to treat it lightly. Remember the dignity of your nature, and the great interests of life, and live worthy of them. Remember that the station you hold, however humble it may be, is yet stamped with weighty responsibilities and pregnant with long-lived influences. You are surrounded by a generation of youth; and among them, perhaps, your own children; all eager to catch your example and follow in your footsteps. Do you wish them well? would you have them enter on the theatre of active life, with spotless characters and good and happy influences? would you secure them weal and avert them from woe? Then guard, I beseech you, your heart and your life, your speech and your actions. Remember that you can not talk or act before the rising generation, that are gazing at you with intense and never-weary interest for your instructions and example, without touching some chord which may vibrate long after your voice is hushed in silence, and your head rests in that "deep urn" where dust mingles with its kindred dust.

"So live, that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan, that moves,
To that mysterious realm, where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry slave at night,

Scourged to his dungeon, but, sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him and lies down to pleasant dreams."

LETTERS OF THE NEW-ENGLAND
SPY.....NO. IV.

—, Feb., 28, 1843.

MY DEAR F.—I again resume my pen to say something more to you relative to the general subject of these letters. I feel my incompetency to discuss properly such a subject; for of all subjects that ever engrossed the attention of the good and wise, that of human suffering and the destiny of our race, is the most important. But I am satisfied that you will not expect of me what I can not perform, and therefore I write as I am moved to write, and with all freedom.

He who sets himself up as a critic and makes it his business to find fault with every thing around him, is certainly engaged in no very honorable employment. But he who, with his friends, speaks confidently, yet with regret, of the great crying evils around him, and deplores deeply their existence, is to be set down not in the category of soulless and merciless critics, or the fault-finding, properly speaking. Hence you must not suppose that I am given to fault-finding, because I dwell so exclusively upon such topics in these letters. You must bear in mind that I have assumed the character of a Spy in this correspondence, and hence must endeavor to carry it out, at least to some extent.—But to the subject promised you in my last. I am to show you, then, to use the language of that letter, what a jewel consistency is. To the work, then.

Mr. N. is a great Anti-Slavery man. He is not merely an Abolitionist, but he is a downright fanatical Abolitionist. He can not fellowship common, rational anti-slavery men, who feel that slavery is a dreadful evil, but who nevertheless have not forgotten that there are other evils in the world besides domestic slavery. If he hears a sermon, it must be an abolitionist sermon. If he hears a Temperance lecture, it must be an anti-slavery lecture. And if he attend a charitable gathering and the speaker by any means neglects to speak of the "poor slave," he feels himself quite enraged. In politics he is equally rigid and exact. If an over-seer of roads is to be voted for, he must be an Abolitionist—genuine and true, else he can not have Mr. N.'s vote. In short, Mr. N. is what is sometimes called a red-hot Anti-Slavery man; he seems all absorbed in this one subject.

Well, this same Mr. N. has, living with him, a white girl of some thirteen or fourteen years of age. This girl he makes work in the garden with a wheel-barrow, without any sleeves to her dress, in the summer; and with no shoes to her feet in the fall, when vegetables are to be collected. He makes her black the boots and shoes of the family when they are on, and while they are sitting at their ease.—He makes her carry all the water used by their own family and one or two of their neighbors, pumping it herself, and carrying it some distance. He makes her load hay and stow it away. When an Abolitionist lecture is to be delivered in town, he lights up the house; and on such occasions they are often seen crossing the road together, he carrying the lamp-filler, and she the ladder. He never sends her to school a day; nor does he allow her any society whatever, but confines her at home exclusively, unless sent on errands. In fine, Mr. N. makes of his white servant girl a worse slave than nine out of ten of the southern slave-holders would think of making of their black slaves of such an age and sex, even allowing them to be as cruel as they are represented to be sometimes, by their enemies.

Now I have no disposition to apologize for slavery any where or in any sense. As an individual I am opposed utterly to slavery of all kinds, and among all kindreds and colors, and in every nation under heaven. I am opposed to it in this world and the next, among the white population and the black, in the north or the south, any where and every where, and over body or mind. But how can men expect to benefit the cause of Abolitionism while practicing such gross and iron-souled inconsistencies as we have set forth in the above faithful picture? While practicing such inconsistencies, need Abolitionists wonder that they sometimes meet with such language as the following, as a too often deserved rebuke? The passage alluded to is from the pen of a deep thinker; it is as follows: "If an angry bigot assumes the bountiful cause of Abolitionism and comes to me with his last news from Barbadoes, why should I not say to him, 'Go, love thy infant; love thy wood-chopper; be good natured and modest: have that grace; and never varnish your hard, uncharitable ambition with this incredible tenderness for black folk a thousand miles off. Thy love afar is spite at home!'"

I say this is too often a deserved rebuke, although it may be taken as the sneer of an enemy. The truth is, there is a great deal of such inconsistency as we have in the above outline. Mr. N. is not the only inconsistent man in the world, nor is Abolitionism the only thing that men are inconsistent about. The world is full of jewels of the above description; and happy are we if we are without them. Adieu.

RESPECT YOURSELVES, AND OTHERS WILL RESPECT YOU.

BY REV. T. J. WHITCOMB.

If all professed Universalists would but do their duty to themselves, and the cause they profess to love, by a regular attendance on the preached word; if they would but show a proper respect for themselves, by openly avowing and sustaining what they believe to be truth, the opposition they meet with from unbelievers, would not prevent the progress of the cause. If any of the members of your family do not agree with you in sentiment, treat them kindly, and oblige them in every way, consistent with the duty you owe to yourself, to your conscience, and your God. Meet them half way; but do not so far make a compromise with what you deem to be error, as to sustain it by your presence every Sabbath, for the sake of popular favor—or, on the contrary, by remaining at home, for the sake of peace—for if you pursue this course, you may be assured you will finally lose the confidence and respect of all. Neither your wife nor your children, can have much respect for you, or your sentiments, if they discover on your part, an indifference, whether you lend them your countenance and support, or not. Let love be the governing principle, in all you do—love God and the religion you profess, too well, to be afraid, or ashamed to openly avow it, "for fear of the Pharisees," or lest you should be "put out of the synagogue." In this way, you will enjoy the love of God, and the respect and confidence of all good men—and the cause of righteousness and truth will be onward!

PROFANITY.....NO. V.

BY REV. S. J. GIBSON.

In former papers, having spoken respecting the different classes of profane men; or the causes which prompt them to indulge this habit, and leaving it for the reader to say to which, if to either class he belongs; I shall now pass to a consideration, more directly, of the evils arising therefrom. This object I am aware, might have been accomplished in the preceding numbers, but a desire for brevity in each, to prevent tediousness, is the reason that the subject has been thus divided.

In the present instance, then, let us consider that profanity, and especially when it is the offspring of heated passions, serves to cultivate and increase ones' temper, until at last he becomes in possession of a vicious and revengeful disposition. There is that within the mind of almost every individual, which is not disposed to bend quietly to an insult from an other. And when thus assailed, the first thought is one of a revengeful nature—the only inquiry is, how there may be meted out to the offender an award, not equal to the act merely, but far beyond it, with seemingly but little if any regard to the consequences which are to follow therefrom. When in truth the man should only adhere to the second and more candid thought, which generally is a desire for the amending of the matter—the bringing of the offender to a proper knowledge of the injustice of his action—the proper atonement made, and the former good feeling restored between the parties. A proceeding like this, is of a nature calculated to subdue the passion of anger in both the offender and offended—to destroy the enmity existing within the mind, and is productive of the most pleasing result. It enables one in that hour when his bosom is unruffled by passion, to rest under the agreeable satisfaction that he has acted in agreement with the requirements of justice, and as one citizen ever should act towards another.—It also speaks powerfully to the heart of the individual who has been so unwise as to treat a neighbor with injustice. He compares the sentiments and feelings which prompted the offensive deed, with the kindness which he has received in return, and while in reflection upon the contrast thus exhibited, he firmly resolves to "go and sin no more."

But generally, a course far different from the one mentioned above, is pursued by the man who uses profane language. While the first burning thought is raging within the mind—before he indulges a solitary reflection respecting the consequences which are to result, or thinks a moment upon the cause, which induced his supposed enemy thus to act toward him, he opens his mouth and pours out his store of hard sayings—belabors the offender with his crooked sentences and knotty epithets—traduces him in the most unmeasured terms, until at last all self-command is nearly or quite lost, and one beholding him, would almost believe him to be a maniac. Under such a system of cultivation as this, his temper increases and gathers strength daily, until he soon becomes in possession of a sour and revengeful disposition—lost to the kind respect of many, and furnishing us with a melancholy instance, that by far the best course to pursue, is to speak alone the language of sobriety.

Reader, are you aware of the progressive manner in which one's passions daily gather power; and would you wish to be at all times in a situation to exert over them a proper control? If so, guard against the indulgence of this evil habit, for in this manner you will be greatly aided in maintaining a proper government over all the passions of your mind—you will be saved the evils arising from a vicious temper if you have the proper care respecting both thoughts and words, and never will experience any regret that you shunned the habit of profanity.

LEARNING—WISDOM—CUNNING.

There is a vast difference between being learned and wise, as there is also between wisdom and cunning.

Learning, properly speaking, relates merely to the theoretical knowledge of things—of many things, too, which are unimportant and unessential in the great pursuits of mankind. But wisdom is practical knowledge—the judicious application of learning to the various emergencies and wants of man.

Cunning is the wisdom of idiots and of brutes—the discretion of instinct, but the folly of learning. As it is the creature of instinct rather than of rationality, so like instinct it is short sighted, regarding the present time—confined to the little and limited sphere of present exigency, and blind to the distant and wide spread regions of futurity.

But wisdom, the child of cultivated reason and the provident director of science, learning and knowledge, unites in its most salutary embrace the source and the end—the beginning and termination of all acts, and designs, and events. It avails itself of all the cautions of rationality and of all the lore of practical knowledge, and looking beyond the boundary of present events, it sees with clear-eyed ken the contingencies that may arise, and coolly and composedly it prepares and awaits their (to her) terrorless approach.

Hence, if these definitions be correct, the fool may be cunning and the learned man may be a fool while the ignorant may be wise, and the unlearned possess a directory in action far above any which the schools can furnish or science bestow. It is true, the learned may also be wise—but his learning will not be the source, but only the auxiliary of his wisdom. For the wise man, however ignorant or learned he may be, will consult his reason and avail himself of the aid of every store which education has laid up for his use—but he will consult learning only as the assistant, not as the master of his wisdom. He will also discard cunning, base, low-born, selfish and grovelling, from his councils, while he blends the fears and hopes of present events with all the advantages of future consequences.

Remember then that a cunning man is not a wise man—for though a wise man possesses knowledge more than sufficient to be cunning, yet if he be merely cunning—if he practice on the dictates of cunning in preference to wisdom he is not wise—he is foolish—and that rod for transgression which his own acts will infallibly bring down in chastisements, must and will bring him to see this fact and to put cunning far from him. ## BONDAGE IN ERROR.

How many are in bondage to the most torturing fear, and the most palsyng hatred, through ignorance of the character of God! From early childhood, they have heard of him only as a being of wrath and vengeance to the great world of mankind, and of partial and exclusive love to his few peculiar favorites—as a being more fit to call upon to curse men, than to pray to for blessings on our race. In words, they may speak of his infinite goodness; but in their hearts they conceive of it as a goodness entirely different in kind and character from all they call goodness in other beings. Or if, for a moment they admit God's goodness to be really and truly goodness—the same in kind as any other being's goodness—they limit its infinity—they confine its exercise to a few general, temporal blessings in this life so far as mankind in general is concerned—and suppose that all other goodness—endless, spiritual goodness is extended only to a few chosen ones of our race—to those who have complied with certain so-called conditions of salvation.—Such persons do not realize the force of the endearing appellation "Our Father who art in heaven"—the title by which Jesus has taught us to address God. They talk about our heavenly Father, but they do not feel the sentiment in their souls,—their misconceptions of his infinite and adorable character, prevent them from sensibly realizing that God is, in very truth, the Father of every created spirit—that all men are, indeed, his offspring, the children of his infinite, unchanging and most tender affection—for "God is love." They are ignorant—greatly ignorant of these views of God's real character—they see in him a mingled stream of light and darkness—of hatred and love—of good and evil—because they look at him through the medium of mingled truths and falsehoods that compose their creeds—and hence it is that such a mingled sensation fills their souls whenever they fix their minds on their Creator. They are anxious to love him; for though they do not in fact think him lovely, yet in words they have always been taught he was lovely, and in words they declare that he is supremely so. But, alas, they also desire to love him; for they are solemnly assured that if they do not, he will consign them to an endless hell, fill them with unutterable despair, fix them in endless unholiness, and pour out upon them the fiercest fires of his insatiable and endless wrath. And this reason—this infinitely solemn reason why they should love God, sends a bolt of ice across their soul's warm affections, and convulses them with horror, and though in words they say they love God, they feel that it is not with any affection like that with which they love any other holy, benevolent and lovely being. And thus dreading God's wrath—flattering themselves that they believe God is good, and that they truly love him—they go through life, with no real love for Him—no submission to his will—no warm delight in obeying his commands—no joy in his worship, and no rational faith in his infinite goodness! How many—alas, greatly too many! there are among professing Christians, who are thus held in bondage to ignorance of the lovely character of our Father and God!

Some of these feel the bondage daily, and would gladly be freed from it, but fear that to doubt is to be damned. Others there are who, with the Jews, boast of their freedom while they are servants to error. And a few others there are who at times break free from the awe that holds them in restraint, and neither loving nor fearing God, they work all iniquity and uncleanness with greediness—hating God and defying man.

Now from all these slavish doubts, and errors, and fears and desolating vices, the truth only, can make us free—free indeed. God is infinite, truly infinite in all his attributes and perfections. He is not love to one, and justice to another, and mercy to a third, and holiness to a fourth; but he is a God of justice, mercy, holiness and goodness to each and to all his intelligent creation. His whole nature is goodness—Good is his name, and his very essence is described by LOVE, LIGHT, TRUTH. Of course, such being his entire nature, there can be in him no malice, no darkness, no falsehood—no attribute, in short, which can be evil in itself, or the cause of evil in its operations, or the producer of evil in its results.

It follows, then, as a necessary consequence, that the more we see, and learn, and know of our heavenly Father, the more lovely he will appear to us—the more lovely he appears, the more will we love him—the more we love him, the more readily will we keep his commandments; and the more willingly we keep God's commandments, the more will we realize that in keeping of them there is great reward. For the Magazine and Advocate.

BR. GROSH—Do you suppose our Saviour ever organized a church as an ecclesiastical body (earthly in its nature, of course,) to do that kind of business which is transacted in our ecclesiastical councils and churches (legislation?) Does not the expression, "my kingdom is not of this world," forbid such a course? Is not his kingdom of a purely spiritual or intellectual nature? Z. B.

REPLY TO Z. B.

I can not find that Jesus "organized" any "church"—using "organize" and "church," in their most common meaning—that is, I do not suppose he united his followers in a body under a written compact, or by any peculiar form designating such union. And the reason why he did not, may have been, and probably was, that his kingdom on earth had not been established as a distinct kingdom. He had called his apostles, and gradually instructed them in the nature of his mission and kingdom—and disciple after disciple learned along with them, and embraced and professed the truth as rapidly as it became unfolded to their minds—but neither apostle nor disciple fully understood the nature of that kingdom, until after the ascension of the Teacher; when, on the day of Pentecost, the holy spirit of love and truth enlightened their minds and warmed their souls. And even after this, they did not yet seem to understand clearly the extent, or means of extending, the kingdom. They probably supposed that the Gentiles must first be proselyted to Judaism, before they could enter into the kingdom of heaven under Jesus. At all events, Peter had to be taught by a vision, that what God had cleansed, was not unclean—that Gentiles could become Christians without first undergoing a legal purification—and then, only, were the others instructed in the same lesson by Peter. And yet, it was many years after that, before the Gospel was proclaimed to Gentiles generally, and churches organized, or (as we might say) "assemblies of believers" gathered together for instruction—for the word "church," in the New Testament, frequently, if not always, means no more than assembly or meeting.

The first assembly or church of Christians, was undoubtedly the believers in Jerusalem. Their meeting was not a formally organized society, but a gathering or assembly of believers, (more or less in number, and frequently changing,) drawn together when, and as, convenience and inclination permitted them to assemble. Probably, also, many of the other and later churches were gathered or constituted in the same way.

In regard to the legislation part, it appears that even that first church or assembly in Jerusalem, did legislate on spiritual and temporal matters. They directed Gentiles what to eat, or, rather, to abstain from eating.—They also appointed certain officers to attend to the poor. They also, among the Gentiles, took up collections of money to aid their brethren in Judea. And certainly, while the church in Jerusalem possessed all things in common, there must have been some common direction (or legislation) in regard to the use and disposal of their lands, houses, goods, and money.

That the kingdom of Jesus is wholly spiritual, is undoubted—but it is to be advanced by beings in material bodies, and by the use of their material means. We must have meetinghouses, at least, to meet in; and their use, alone, involves the necessity of raising money to erect and furnish them; and of societies, and society legislation, to take care of them. But in regard to the doctrines and precepts (or principles) of that spiritual religion, and the forms of its worship, I think that the better we understand the principles, the simpler and the fewer will be the latter. Such, at least, is my opinion—and I would extend this characteristic of purity and simplicity to our organizations and discipline, and legislation—bringing all to the nearest possible conformity with the principles of Christianity, and the correctness of its practice. A. B. G.

WASHINGTONIAN STATE CONVENTION.

We hope that our readers who are Washingtonians, (and we earnestly wish all were such,) will not forget that this interesting and important meeting is to be held in this city, on the second Wednesday (14th) of June next. It is recommended that, in all counties where the society at the county seat does not call a County Convention, each society select and send two or three delegates—and these several delegations of each county will undoubtedly be received as the delegation of such county, the same as if they had been selected by a County Convention. Remember this—make it known to your societies—for it is very important that a full representation be present from every part of our State. A. B. G.
